The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] did me the honor to reply to me in a rejoinder which had been prepared for the occasion, as appears from his remark that, "hearing that this attack was to be made, I have asked information from two sources in order to test the correctness of the Commissioner's position." His reply would, I doubt not, have been more candid had it been prepared after he had heard what I had to say. His misrepresentation of my position was not intentional. It arose from his misconception of the point I would make when I should have an opportunity to express my convictions. In view of the passages from my remarks already quoted, especially of my announcement that I did not mean to examine the question whether the figures embodied in the report are, in themselves, false, but did "mean to say that they are so detached from their correlatives as to lead to conclusions utterly at variance with facts which are notorious and familiar to every gentleman on this floor," he was hardly justified in saying that I had admitted "in the first place that the facts stated are generally correct; that the statistics collected and arranged in tables are true and correctly stated." I certainly did not admit the truth or correctness of that which the single purpose of my remarks was to deny, and which every fact I presented contradicted. I am sure, from the gentleman's well known character, that he would not have made this assertion had his remarks been prepared after he had heard me. After he had thus charged me with admitting all I had been denying and disproving, the gentleman pronounced the conclusion that "it must be, then, that he refuses to print this report because its facts and deductions do not square with his theories and notions," and exultingly proclaimed my opposition to the printing "a most damaging admission."

I resume the discussion in pursuance of a promise made when the fall of the Speaker's gavel announced the expiration of the brief time allowed me, and in the hope of showing by an array of facts, many of which were not then in my possession, the dangerous fallacies the Commissioner has attempted to sustain by "doctored," "manipulated," "garbled," "marshaled," or in other words, artfully arranged figures. The correctness of the figures set forth in the report I am willing, as I then was, to admit for argument sake, but not in fact, as time has not yet permitted me to test them fully. They may in themselves be true; but there is a falsehood known as the suppesio veri—the statement of part of the truth in such a manner as to produce the effect of a positive falsehood; and of that I charge that the Commissioner has been guilty in almost every part of his voluminous report. He who denies the existence of Deity, and from the exclamation "the fool hath said in his heart, there is no God," and in support of the denial quotes the last four words as a complete sentence, misrepresents the teachings of the Psalmist, though he correctly quotes that particular portion of his language. The falsehood is in the manner of the statement, and not in the thing stated. This illustration is not inapplicable to the document under consideration.

Gentlemen who read the report from pages 14 to 21 inclusive, will find an abundant array of tabular comparative statements which, if they are true and in themselves constitute the whole truth, prove most adequately its assertion:

"That for the year 1867, and for the first half of 1868, the average increase of all the elements which constitute the food, clothing, and shelter of a family has been about seventy-eight per cent., as compared with the standard prices of 1860-61."

And that the rate of increase in wages for the year 1867 as compared with 1860-61, was put as follows:

"For unskilled mechanical labor, fifty per cent.; for skilled mechanical labor, sixty per cent."

I pause for a moment to deny the correctness of these figures, and to assert that the price of the necessities of life enumerated in these tables are, on an average, not more than fifty per cent. higher than in 1860, while labor is now immeasurably more fully employed at an advance of from eighty to one hundred per cent. over the wages of that year. But this is a point about which ingenuity may cavil, and is not essential to the support of my argument. To give these figures any practical value they should have been accompanied by another column for each year, in which should have been stated the number of working people employed in each of the several branches of business referred to, and the number who, though skilled workmen at those branches, were unable to obtain employment of any kind by which to earn any wages. The omission of these elements from the calculation vitiates the Commissioner's figures, even though they are in themselves true as Holy Writ, and conceals the fraud this report was intended to perpetrate. Let the gentleman from Ohio glorify the memory of 1860 as he may, I confidently reiterate what I said in the former discussion:

"Eighteen hundred and sixty and 1861, and from 1857 to the autumn of the latter year, was one of the darkest periods ever seen by the laboring people of America. Not one out of five of the skilled workmen of the country was steadily employed. In Philadelphia, when they wanted to build a street railroad they advertised for two hundred and fifty hands at sixty cents a day, and more than five thousand offered, a majority of whom were skilled artisans who could find no other employment. In the neighborhood of one of the establishments, the statistics of which go into this report, a rolling-mill, the number of unemployed men was so great that the county authorities, to save its skilled workmen from open pauperism, determined to build a turnpike, and experienced hands from rolling-mills were employed at breaking stone and road-making at fifty cents a day rather than become paupers. For the comparatively few who had employment the wages are, I assume, honestly given in the report; but of the many who were picking up a precarious living by getting an occasional day's work at half wages or quarter wages no account is taken; and thus facts that may be true in themselves, by being separated from those which would have explained and interpreted them, are made to libel our country and the Congress that carried it through the war.

"Let me in this connection bring the attention of gentlemen to some facts:

"Look at the palatial buildings erected in this city during the last year and the comfortable dwellings for mechanics and laborers. How many of them there are you have all seen. They are built by squares and blocks. I have endeavored to ascertain how many were built in 1860, and can hear of but four dwelling houses built in Washington in that year. In 1861, so far as I have been able to learn, but one dwelling house and one public school-house. The contract price for which was $3,500, were erected. Leaving Washington, I go to my own city, and by turning to the report of the building inspectors find that in 1860 twenty-four hundred and seventy-two houses were built. The decline had commenced, and in 1861 but sixteen hundred and seventy-three were built. In 1860 we enlarged five hundred and eighty-eight buildings; in 1861 but two hundred and four were enlarged. But in 1868, when the Commissioner tells us labor was not as prosperous as in 1860, we erected forty-seven hundred and ninety-six buildings and enlarged twelve hundred and fifteen. In 1868 there was an active demand for labor, and its price was high. It could determine its own wages. In 1860 labor was begging employment and wages were low. As a general thing mechanics had to accept whatever wages were offered, though in a few instances favored establishments were able to run, continuously and pay fair wages. These exceptional cases have furnished the Commissioner data for what he announces as a general law.

"The low rate of wages that ruled in 1860 would have led a proficient in political economy to look for the facts I am now about to lay before you. It is a law of social science that when employment is scarce labor must accept low wages and loses time; but when employment is quick and active labor regulates its own wages and is constantly employed. The tables presented by the Commissioner ignore this law, and are consequently a fraud upon Congress and a slander upon our country, the working people of which were never so prosperous as now.

"Let me exhibit some other comparisons between 1860 and 1868 which bear upon the question at issue. In that blessed year, 1860, when the Commissioner eulogizes, the sheriff of Philadelphia received seven hundred and forty writs for the sale of real estate, while in 1868, the year of congressional wrong and pecuniary depression, the sheriff of that city received but seven hundred and six writs for the sale of real estate, a falling off of largely more than fifty per cent. though in the interval there has been an increase of forty per cent., in the population and vastly more than that in the wealth of the city."

In connection with these statements I brought to the attention of the House on that occasion such figures drawn from the reports of the savings-banks of seven States as I happened to have at hand. Since then I have been able to add much to my collection of that class of facts, some of which I will proceed to exhibit. I have the official statement of the total amount of deposits in the savings-banks of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, of the Philadelphia Saving-Fund Society, which is allowed to receive but $200 from any one depositor in a year, and of the savings-banks of the city of Newark, New Jersey, for 1860 and 1861, and of those institutions, and a third at Newark, a dime savings-bank, which has since come into existences for 1867 and 1868. I have also reports from other states, but as they do not cover the four years designated they could not be embraced in the table I have compiled. That I have not been wanting in diligence in my endeavors to procure such official information as would enable me to make a general comparative table for these years will be attested by gentlemen on this floor and in the Senate, of whom I have requested the names of the proper parties to whom to apply, and by Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, to whose industry and courtesy I am much indebted.

All the information obtained shall be fully presented, and I think the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] though he may remember 1860 as a pleasant and prosperous year, will be persuaded that millions of his countrymen remember it as a year of ceaseless agony, during which gaunt want entered their homes because the last dollar of their past earnings had been extorted from them by enforced idleness.

I have not been able to ascertain the number of depositors in all the institutions to which I am referring for each year, but have them from the Saving Fund Society of Philadelphia and the savings-banks of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. These are, however, sufficient to indicate the general condition of the class of people who are depositors in such institutions, and whose relative poverty in 1867 Mr. Wells so deplors. On the 1st day of January, 1860, there were twenty-one thousand two hundred and sixty-five depositors in the institution at Philadelphia; and on the 1st of January, 1861, there were but twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-two; and the total amount of deposits had gone down from $4,083,450 to $2,251,646, or little more than one half. In Massachusetts, as an official statement before me shows, the number of depositors has fallen off in but two years from 1834 to 1868, inclusive. In 1865 the total decrease was one hundred and twenty-eight, an almost incalculably small fraction of one per cent., but in the year 1861, in consequence of the want of employment in 1860, the number fell off five thousand and ten, or two and one sixth per cent, and the deposits remaining at the close of the year were reduced $268,797.

The number of depositors in the savings-banks of Rhode Island has receded in but one year from 1855 to 1868 inclusive, which was 1861, when they fell off five hundred and ninety-eight, notwithstanding which the aggregate deposit increased $119,119 33.

The extreme force of the depression which, as the result of our adhesion to free trade and an exportable metallic currency, overtook the country in 1857, and terminated only with the issue of the currency known as greenbacks, and the passage of the protective tariff of 1861 seems to have fallen upon New Hampshire as early as 1858. From 1850 to 1868, inclusive, the number of depositors in savings-banks of that State has decreased in but two years, 1858 and 1866. In the latter year the number of depositors fell off about one per cent., notwithstanding which the deposits increased $26,265 81; but in 1858 the depositors fell off seven per cent., or thirteen hundred and twenty-three, and the deposits were reduced $159,627 40.

While recounting the manifold blessings that period brought to the working people of the country the gentleman from Ohio reminded me that the working people were docile in that year, and indulged in no strikes either for higher wages or against a reduction of their pay. He said:

"It was a year of plenty, of great increase. I remember, moreover, that it was a year of light taxes. There was but one great people on the face of the globe so lightly taxed as the American people in 1860. Now we are the most heavily taxed people except one, perhaps, on the face of the globe; and the weight of nearly all our taxes falls at last on the laboring man. This is an element which the gentleman seems to have omitted from his calculation altogether.

"The gentleman says that at the present time laborers are doing better than in 1860. I ask him how many strikes there were among laborers in 1860-61? Were there any at all? And how many were there in 1868? Will the gentleman deny that strikes exhibit the unsettled and unsatisfactory condition of labor in its relations to capital? In our mines, in our mills and furnaces, in our manufacturing establishments, are not the laborers every day joining in strikes for higher wages, and saying that they need them on account of the high price of provisions, or that the capitalists get too large a share of the profits?"

The gentleman has my thanks for bringing this significant fact, so destructive of his own argument and that of Mr. Wells to my attention. He knows that it was not until Jeshurun waxed fat that he kicked; and he ought to know that unemployed workmen, who had drawn the last dollar from the savings-bank, and parted with furniture in exchange for food and fuel, were not in a condition to strike, and had no employers whose decrees they might resist. I need no more powerful illustration of the absurdity of the assertions of the Commissioner than the fact that the workmen of to-day, in contrast with their abject condition in 1860, find so wide a market for their labor and are so comparatively easy in their condition that when their rights or interests are assailed they are able to offer resistance to the assailant.

Our positions are fairly taken, and as the condition of savings-banks furnish the truest and most general index to the condition of the laboring people, the facts I am about to present will overthrow him who is in error. Be the judgment of the general public what it may, I am confident that the memory of every American workingman who remembers the experience of 1860 will sustain me in this controversy. Having shown the loss of depositors and deposits in the only banks from which I could obtain information on those points in or about 1860, let me compare the condition in these respects of the same banks in 1867 and 1868:

State or City.	Year.	Increase in number of depositors.	Increase of deposits.
New Hampshire.....	1867	4,967	$2,672,250 05
New Hampshire.....	1868	7,476	2,705,242 01
Massachusetts.....	1867	31,740	12,669,519 40
Massachusetts.....	1868	34,501	14,406,752 83
Rhode Island.....	1867	6,845	3,651,934 11
Rhode Island.....	1868	6,429	2,984,988 81

Philadelphia.....	1868	2,224	761,901 00
		94,682	$40,402,034 24

The contrast these figures present to those of 1860 does not give the Commissioner's theory much support, and casts a shade of doubt over the accuracy of the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio. It may, however, be regarded as exceptional, and I therefore propose to present a broader range of facts, embracing the amount of deposits in the banks of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and the only institution at Philadelphia from which I have been able to obtain this information for the years 1860-61 and 1867-68. I have sought for corresponding facts from all the other New England States and New York, but have not been able to obtain them. These tables are, therefore, as complete as industry and the broadest research possible in so limited a period could make them. As, however, they present so general a correspondence for both periods it is fair to presume that they indicate the condition of the savings-banks and their depositors throughout the country. The total amount of deposits in these banks in 1860-61 was as follows:

Maine.....	$1,466,457 56	$1,620,270 26
New Hampshire.....	4,860,024 86	5,590,652 18

HO. OF REPS.

Report of Special Commissioner of the Revenue—Mr. Kelley.

By this statement it is shown that the savings-banks in these three States and two cities in one year, during what the Commissioner calls a season of great prosperity for working people, lost deposits amounting to $1,239,304 69.

The total deposits for 1867 and 1868 in the banks of the same cities, the same institution in Philadelphia, the same in Newark, with the addition already referred to of a dime savings institution which was not in existence in 1861, were as follows:

Maine.....	$5,998,600 26	$8,132,246 71
New Hampshire.....	10,463,418 50	13,541,534 96
Massachusetts.....	80,431,583 74	94,838,336 54
Rhode Island.....	21,413,647 14	24,408,635 95
Philadelphia.....	5,003,379 42	5,765,280 63
Newark.....	4,405,726 46	5,430,874 60
	1,116,762 26	1,338,596 94
	325,920 57	468,160 74
	$128,759,038 32	153,823,667 07
		128,759,038 32

Increase.....$25,064,628 65

This exhibit is as unfortunate for the Commissioner's facts and theories as that which preceded it, for they show that in spite of all his rhetoric about the crudities and oppressive character of the legislation of Congress the deposits in these banks, which fell off so largely in his season of prosperity, have increased $25,064,628 65 during the last year, and that the aggregate deposit at the close of 1868, his disastrous period, is largely more than double that of 1860, which he says was so prosperous. In the pursuit of a complete comparative table for these four years I have obtained an amount of information which, though it does not relate to the particular years alluded to, will not be without interest to the House and the country, and I will therefore proceed to present the figures with as much method as I can.

Through the kind assistance of the honorable gentleman from the Troy district, New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] I have authentic statistics from the savings-banks of his State; and though we were unable to obtain the figures for the years 1861 or 1868, I can present the number of depositors, the total amount of deposits, and the amount deposited during each year for the years 1860, 1866, and 1867. They were as follows:

1866.....	488,501	131,769,074	84,765,054
1867.....	537,466	151,127,562	99,147,321

From Vermont I have been able to obtain only the total amount of deposits for 1867 and 1868. They were as follows:

Year.	Total amount of deposits.
1868.....	2,128,641 52

From Connecticut I have only been able to obtain the total amount of deposits for 1860, 1861, and 1866. They are as follows:

Year.	Total amount of deposits.
1866.....	31,224,464 25

Thus the figures derived from every quarter are consistent with each other, and the contrast between the condition of things that prevailed between 1857 and 1861—for the return to which the Commissioner sighs—and that from 1861 to the close of 1868, which he so deprecates, is in itself sufficient to show the grotesque absurdity of his theory, that the head of every family could save money and make deposits in 1860 and that none but unmarried people could do so in 1867 and 1868. Let me repeat his language on this point:

"Unmarried operatives, therefore, gain; while those who are obliged to support their own families in hired tenements lose. Hence deposits in savings-banks increase, while marriage is discouraged; and the forced employment of young children is made almost a necessity in order that the family may live."

The country will hardly believe that when every head of a family among the laboring people of New York could save money the whole number put at interest but $34,000,000 per annum, and that when their condition had been so sadly impaired by the unwise legislation of Congress that people feared to marry because their wages would not enable them to support families they deposited $99,000,000 annually, or nearly three dollars for one, and that the number of depositors nearly doubled, and the total amount on deposit to their credit ran up one hundred and twenty-five per cent.

Thus, in defiance of the Commissioner's facts, heartily as they are indorsed by the gentleman from Ohio, the returns from savings-banks prove that, with our labor protected and a cheap and expanded currency, our small farmers and workmen have been able to lay up hundreds of millions of capital upon which they receive interest and for their support in age or adversity. They are happily corroborated by other facts, which in a striking manner prove the superiority of the present condition of the classes of people to which I allude over that to which the Special Commissioner of the Revenue would lead them back. While accumulating capital in savings-banks they have felt themselves able to make still more ample provision for their families after they shall have been called away by the dread summons, death. In the course of the former discussion of this subject I invited your attention to the fact that in Massachusetts alone there were policies of life insurance outstanding on the 1st of January, 1868, for the enormous sum of $1,234,630,473. Through the further kindness of the gentleman from New York I have been able to obtain the life-insurance statistics for that State for 1859, 1860, 1866, and 1867. The tables show the number of policies in force at the close of each of these years, and the total amount of the policies and the number of companies issuing them.

Year.	No. of companies.	No. of policies.	Amount of policies in force.
1860.....	17	56,046	163,703,456 31
Increase.....	3	6,429	$22,205,477 69
1866.....	39	305,390	$853,105,877 24
1867.....	43	401,140	1,161,729,776 27
Increase.....	4	95,750	$296,623,899 03

From this table it will be seen that the increase in the number of policies and the amount insured during 1867 was nearly a hundred per cent. in excess of the total number insured and the amount of insurance at the close of 1860, and that the percentage of policies for such small sums as small farmers or workmen may maintain had increased, as the average amount of policies in 1860 was $2,920 88, and had fallen to $2,896 07 in 1867.

I had hoped to present results from the life insurance companies of Connecticut, but have failed to receive them. I have, however, some facts from one company chartered by New Jersey whose office is at Newark and its principal branch at Philadelphia. Through the kindness of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HALSEY] I am able to present the number of policies issued by the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, the company referred to, on the 1st of January of four years. They are as follows:

Date.	No. of policies outstanding.
January, 1861.....	7,575
January, 1862.....	7,026
January, 1867.....	29,858
January, 1868.....	34,317

I have also been favored with the number of policies outstanding for substantially the same period by the American Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia, together with the number of its policies which were for $3,000 or less. They are as follows:

Date.	No. of policies.	Amount insured for.
December 31, 1860.....	991	$1,090,450 09
December 31, 1861.....	1,120	1,206,000 00
December 31, 1867.....	7,656	18,312,478 93
December 31, 1868.....	10,282	24,759,901 59

The number of these policies in each year which were on the lives of people of limited or moderate means, and were for $3,000 or less, were as follows:

Year.	No. of policies.	Amount insured.
1861.....	938	920,600 00
1868.....	6,689	13,021,878 93

The relative magnitude of our national debt disappears before these statistics; for if the policies existing be maintained the companies of Massachusetts and New York and the two referred to outside of those States will pay to the widows and children or creditors of the parties insured a sum vastly in excess of our total debt, and it is not unfair to assume that the greater portion of the whole amount will be paid to that class of people whom the Commissioner describes as so oppressed by a protective tariff and the cheap and abundant currency now in use. When in my former remarks on this subject I invited your attention to the figures relating to life insurance then in my possession, I said:

"When people in addition to laying up money at interest are insuring their lives, they are living well; but when, as in 1860, past accumulations in savings-banks are running down, and they are wasting their time in enforced idleness, they cannot live well and contribute freely to the support of the Government. Accept the recommendations of the Commissioner and you will paralyze industry, reduce wages, throw the producing classes upon their deposits for support, and deprive them of the power to keep up the insurance on their lives. Such facts as I have presented are sufficient to refute a thousand fine-spun theories. It may, with the ingenuity that fashioned this report, be said that the policies to which I have referred are on the lives of wealthy people. But such is not the case; two hundred and sixty-five out of each thousand of them are for $1,000 or less; five hundred and forty out of each thousand are for $2,000 or less; seven hundred out of each thousand for $3,000 or less. Only three hundred out of each thousand are for amounts over $3,000. These policies are the precautions taken by well-paid industry to provide for widowhood and orphanage after the head of the family shall have paid mortality's last debt."

It is not improper, Mr. Chairman, that in concluding this branch of my subject I should say that I have presented no statement which is not warranted by official indorsement, and that I hesitate not to assert that could the business of the savings-banks and life insurance companies of the whole country be investigated the results would conform to those I have produced. They are truly surprising, and should they through our widely diffused periodicals find their way across the waters, will prove an abundant antidote to the Commissioner's notice to those who have thought of emigrating to this country, but who desire to live in wedlock, that they may not hope to do so under the legislation of that Congress which has for several years been in such absolute government of the country as to render the veto power of the Executive nugatory. They are, in my judgment, important enough to produce some effect upon the credit of the country, for they show that our laboring people are saving and putting at interest hundreds of millions of dollars annually, and that the people at large are paying from their abundance more, largely more, than the interest on our national debt to life insurance companies, as a provision for their widows and orphans when they shall no longer be able to provide for and protect them.

The Commissioner's theory that our legislation is making the rich richer and the poor poorer is that which was hurled at us by every copperhead orator, from Horatio Seymour down, during the last canvass. We also encountered it in every rebel paper in the South, and there were those who feared that it might produce an effect upon the popular mind. I was not one of them. The American people are intelligent enough to know when they have the toothache, or are involved in a lawsuit, or are being stripped of property through the medium of a sheriff's sale, and remembering the disasters of the last free-trade and hard-money era of the country, I contrasted it with their present condition and relied confidently upon their judgment. In order to test the accuracy of my memory and judgment on this point, I appealed during the canvass to the statistics of my own city, and among other telling facts found, as I have already told you, that in 1860 the sheriff of Philadelphia had received seventeen hundred and forty writs for the sale of real estate, and that in 1867 he had received but seven hundred and six—a decrease of more than sixty per cent., although the population of the city had increased more than forty per cent. What makes this fact more significant is, that under our system of selling land under ground rents the purchase of a homestead is the savings-bank of the Philadelphia workingman. I also ascertained the number of suits that were instituted in the years 1857–58–59 and 1865–66 and 1867, respectively, in our local courts. The evidence from this source is not less significant than any that has preceded it. The court of common pleas is emphatically the poor man's court. It obtains jurisdiction by appeal from the judgments of magistrates, and the amount at issue before its jury is for sums less than $100. The result of my investigation showed that the number of the suits brought in the latter years, notwithstanding the increase of population which had taken place, was but little more than one half the number instituted in the former period. The figures are as follows:

Suits in Common Pleas.
1858.....	2,651
1859.....	3,041

1865.....	1,500
1866.....	1,461
1867.....	1,672
	4,633
Decrease of cases.....	3,562

The jurisdiction of the district court extends to all cases involving more than $100. Its records are consistent with those of the common pleas. The figures from the records of that court are as follows:

I am sure I do Mr. Wells no injustice when I complain of his palpable negligence in omitting to appeal to such sources of information as I have indicated, and attempting to deduce general laws by which to guide our legislation from the lame and impotent array of facts he has digested. We pay him a salary which he deems adequate. His traveling expenses are at the cost of the Treasury, and he is surrounded by a competent clerical force, and that he should have rested all his theories upon an array of facts so meager and so easily disproved is, to say the least, not creditable to his industry or judgment.

The gentleman from Ohio told us that hearing of my intended attack he had asked information from two sources in order to test the correctness of the Commissioner's position

That was an idle waste of time. Had he spent it in examining Mr. Wells's figures, he would have discovered from their own manifest incongruity that no two or two hundred authorities could give them a character for respectability or the weight of authority. The gentleman is an arithmetician and knows that $111,000 are not twenty-one and forty-nine hundredths per cent. of $5,164,500, and that $37,000 are not seven and twenty-six hundredths per cent. of $5,053,500. Yet the Commissioner tells us they are, and so impairs the value of the important table on page 111 of the report. I invite the gentleman's attention to the two elaborate tables to be found on page 16 of the report, the first purporting to show in parallel columns the "average weekly expenditures for provisions, house-rent, &c.;" the second, "average weekly earnings," and the third, "surplus for clothing, housekeeping goods," &c., of families in 1867; the other in corresponding columns purporting to show "average weekly expenditure of families of varying numbers in the manufacturing towns of the United States for the years 1860 and 1867, respectively."

More remarkable tables than these never were prepared by statistician. I had supposed that Mr. Delmar, late chief of the Bureau of Statistics, was a paragon in his way; but he must look out for his honors, for in these tables the Special Commissioner of Revenue has beaten him roundly in his own department. Unhappy Delmar! Happy Commissioner Wells! For Delmar's report Congress had nothing but an indignant vote requiring its suppression, though it lay ready printed and bound; but for Wells's budget of more egregious blunders it has such admiration and approval that no love of economy could restrain it from voting to print it for the widest possible circulation. The tables to which I refer must speak for themselves, for no man can describe or characterize them. As evidence of the want of care with which the report has been sent to the country I call attention to the fact that one column of figures which ought to be in the latter table has been omitted and that another appears twice. It is so in both editions. The tables are as follows:

I hope the gentleman from Ohio will give these tables a reasonable amount of consideration, and if he still thinks they may be correct refer them to another authority—the ancient matrons of his district. But before making this reference I beg him to advise the ladies of the fact that he draws his question from an official document; for if he fails to take this precaution they will hold him guilty of perpetrating a practical joke at their expense by submitting to their judgment so absurd a proposition. They will doubtless be able to tell him that parents with two children cannot live so well on the same money as parents with but one, and that as a general rule it costs more to maintain parents and three children than is required for the support of those with but two or one, and that the same is true with reference to parents and four children; but they will probably doubt his sincerity in asking whether parents with five children can live just as well on less money than is required to support in the same communities parents with but three, and will laugh at the proposition that parents with six children can live as well on less money than parents with but two; and I think I hear them crying out, "Why, sir, what do you mean by asking us whether parents with six children can live for less than parents with two, and yet in the same breath telling us that if they happen to have a seventh, be it boy or girl, it will more than double the expenses of the whole family? Unwelcome seventh child! According to Wells you come into the family of every laboring man to double the household expenses, though all your six predecessors be still sheltered by the paternal roof! Lucky children numbers five and six!—henceforth you will be welcomed everywhere; for the Special Commissioner of Revenue has proved that in all instances your coming reduces the expenses of the family to less than they were when the household flock consisted of but two! According to the Commissioner this law of social life, hitherto undiscovered, is absolute, and prevailed alike in 1860 and 1867.

To invite attention to these tables is to subject them to ridicule; and yet, Mr. Chairman, they are the foundation-stone and the keystone of Mr. Wells's entire structure; upon them he rests all his argument, and from them he deduced his conclusion, so disparaging to the Republican party in Congress, and so damaging to the interests of the country, that as a result of unwise legislation marriage is a luxury the laboring people of America cannot safely enjoy. Happily for the country they are so flagrantly and absurdly false that Mr. Wells' deductions and conclusions will be received but as the vain imaginings of a dreamy and indolent theorist.

In view of the surprising facts I have brought to the attention of the committee, and the urgency of the Commissioner for a return to the revenue tariff and contracted currency of 1860, I am forced to the conclusion that he regards poverty and idleness as supreme blessings to the laboring people of a country, and I rejoice that I succeeded in obtaining the floor upon the motion to print his report, and sounded an alarm to the masses of my countrymen that it is an insidious plea for their impoverishment.

In my judgment the first duty of an American statesman is to watch and guard the rights of the laboring classes of the country. They produce its wealth, they fight its battles, and in their hands is its destiny; for at every election they cast a majority of the ballots, and upon their intelligence, integrity, and manly independence rest the welfare of the country. To make republican government an enduring success we must guard the productions of our laborers against competition with those of the ill-paid and oppressed laborers of Europe, that each head of a family may by the wages he can earn maintain a home and be able to support his children during the years required to give them the advantages of our common-school system. If the Commissioner's report proves anything to those who are able to detect its fallacies and test the fullness and accuracy of its comparative tables, it proves that under the influence of the cheap and abundant currency we now have and the system of protection which the war forced us to adopt, the American people are consuming more of the necessities and comforts of life than they were ever before able to consume; are producing more of what they consume than ever before and in spite of the taxes imposed by the national debt and other incidents of the war, are rapidly coming to be commercially independent of other nations. Yes, sir, under the influence of a tariff which though it levies duties on raw materials and commodities which we do not and cannot produce, is still in a measure protective, and an adequate amount of currency. We are slowly emerging from our commercial dependence upon England, as is shown by the fact that our imports have steadily diminished since 1865. Thus in 1866, 1867, and 1868, respectively, the amounts of foreign merchandise imported into the country were as follows:

Year ending 30th of June, 1868.....	344,873,433

Thus it appears that notwithstanding the facts that the increase of our wealth is unparalleled, and the natural increase of our population is very rapid, and that "from the 1st of July, 1865, to the 1st of December, 1868, about one million natives of foreign countries have sought a permanent home in the United States," our purchases of foreign commodities are steadily diminishing. The sapient deduction of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue from these facts is, that we are unable to trade with foreign nations, and that to stimulate foreign trade we must reduce the wages of our laborers and diminish the amount of currency now profitably employed in the development of our productive power. His theory is that "all commerce is in the nature of barter or exchange," and his complaint is that:

"We have so raised the cost of all domestic products that exchange in kind with all foreign nations is almost impossible. The majority of what foreign nations have to sell us, as already shown, we must or will have (?) What foreign nations want and we produce, cotton and a few other articles excepted, they can buy elsewhere cheaper. We are, therefore, obliged to pay in no small part for such foreign productions as we need or will have, either in the precious metals or, what is worse, in unduly depreciated promises of national payment."

The Commissioner's exception of "cotton and a few other articles" leaves Hamlet out of the play and surrenders his whole case, for we can raise enough of the articles he excepts, and of which we have a natural monopoly, to pay for every foreign production "we must or will have."

The beneficent results of free labor in the former slave States are an agreeable surprise to its most sanguine friends. The South is abundantly rich in mineral and special agricultural resources, but she is suffering for the want of currency to develop them. Were she adequately supplied with currency, and the season should be a favorable one, her production of cotton, and the few other articles excepted by the Commissioner, would more than double that of 1868, and as other nations must have her cotton, tobacco, rice, and other semi-tropical productions which they cannot procure elsewhere, it seems to me that the true way to stop the flow of precious metals and Government bonds is to stimulate production by protecting the wages of labor and avoiding any contraction of the currency. In support of this view let me call attention to the fact that we send from eighty to one hundred million dollars abroad annually for sugar. If capitalists will lend the planters of Florida, Louisiana, and Texas the means to cultivate their sugar fields they will produce crops that will save a large percentage of this vast sum to the country.*

I showed in the former discussion of this subject, we bought about forty-five per cent. of the entire amount of railroad iron exported by Great Britain during the first ten months of 1868, saying:

"I hold in my hand a circular which reads thus: 'Fifty-eight, Old Broad street, London, November 30, 1868, from S. W. Hopkins & Co., exporters of railway iron. Monthly Report of Exports of Rails from Great Britain, extracted from the Government returns.' By this report it appears that in the ten months ending October 31, 1868, Great Britain exported five hundred and nine thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight tons of rails. Gentlemen probably think that England's colonial dependencies took most of this iron; that British India, British North America, and Australia took it. No, gentlemen; we are her chief commercial dependency. She is our mistress, and we maintain her throne and aristocracy. No; the British dependencies took but eighty-four thousand tons, and her American dependency, the United States, took two hundred and twenty-eight thousand tons. Of the five hundred and nine thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight tons of rails we took twenty-one thousand tons more than were taken by British India, Russia, British North America, Sweden, Prussia, France, Spain and Canaries, Cuba, Brazil, Chili, and Australia."

The Commissioner makes no note of such facts as this, but finding some fortunately situ-

*Since my remarks were delivered I have received from Messrs. McFarlan, Straight & Co., commission merchants of New Orleans, their trade circular of February 1, from which I extract the following corroboration of my views:

"Receipts of the Louisiana sugar crop this season to 30th ultimo, inclusive, foot up 47,419 hogsheds sugar and 109,518 barrels, 4,692 half barrels, and 17 quarter barrels molasses. But for lack of promptness in commencing grinding early and of adequate preparation on the part of the producers for securing a large yield, and the early severe frosts succeeded by floods of rain, the Louisiana sugar crop of 1868 would probably have reached 115,000 hogsheds at least, or about three times the product of 1867. The yield of 1868 must have been reduced by mere waste, caused by lack of wood, lateness in beginning to grind, and the unfavorable weather during the latter part of the grinding season, say 25,000 hogsheds or more, leaving perhaps 90,000 hogsheds to be realized. This great waste from a bountiful crop is greatly to be regretted, and we may hope it will not be repeated."

The production of domestic cane-sweets properly protected and encouraged might be increased far beyond the ideas of many who are directly interested. We believe the sugar lands of this State and Texas might be made to produce the entire 650,000 tons of sugar said to be required annually by the people of the United States, saving the $100,000,000 of specie paid yearly for foreign sweets, including charges and import duty, or perhaps fifty to sixty millions actually paid to foreign producers. We have space only to ask the genuine financier to consider this important instrumentality in aid of a return to the specie basis."

ated manufacturers of pig-iron guilty of making profits almost equal to those merchants' and bankers' average, he holds them up to contempt and ridicule, and wonders—yes, in an official report, sneeringly expresses his surprise—that they have not petitioned Congress to legislate for the reduction of their profits! He probably does not know that the high rate at which pig-iron is now selling is stimulating the production of that primary article to an extent that promises an early home supply and such competition among our own people as must inevitably cheapen the price of iron and reduce the profits of those whose product is now in unusual request. In proof of this assertion I not only point the Commissioner to the rapid increase of the means of producing pig-iron in Pennsylvania, but appeal to all the gentlemen on this floor from districts in or near which coal, iron ore, and limestone are found. Districts hitherto unknown to the iron trade are now producing large quantities of pig-iron; and I ask gentlemen from New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, southern Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Georgia, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, and Oregon, whether there are not more furnaces erecting in their States, respectively, than ever were in process of erection at one time before, and whether those already existing are not in full operation? Virginia has no voice on this floor with which to respond to my appeal, but it is within my knowledge that Pennsylvania iron men have constructed and are constructing furnaces, forges, and rolling-mills in various parts of that State. If we would turn the balance of trade in our favor and put our bonds at par and stop the outflowing of gold interest by receiving them in the hands of immigrants, or in pay for our cotton, rice, tobacco, provisions, &c., we must avoid the Commissioner's nostrums, free trade and hard money, and promote the developments of the boundless natural resources of the country. By no other means can we arrest the export of specie and bonds in exchange for foreign commodities.

There are many points in the Commissioner's report that I would glad review, but having addressed myself to a single one I will leave them for the consideration of others. Meanwhile I congratulate the country that it is so strong, and the currents of its prosperity are so broad, and moving with such increasing volume, that no official report or the vagaries of no theorist can impair or arrest its progress.

Railroads in the States.SPEECH OF HON. J. R. DOOLITTLE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

January 22, 1869.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill (S. No. 554) to promote commerce among the States, and to cheapen the transportation of the mails and military and naval stores, being a bill to grant charters of incorporation to build three railways, one from Washington to New York, another from Washington to Pittsburg, and a third from Washington to Cincinnati, and the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE, to insert after the word "empowered," in line two of section eight, the words "with the consent of the Legislature of the State or States through which said railway may be located"—

Mr. DOOLITTLE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Without this amendment I can hardly understand how any Senator can bring himself to believe that, within the powers granted by the Constitution, Congress can pass this bill. Even with that amendment there are considerations, in my judgment, so strong against the exercise of the power, if we possessed it, that I should feel constrained to vote against the bill.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Railroads in the States—Mr. Doolittle.

SENATE.

I repeat, sir, I can hardly conceive how any Senator can find in the Constitution the power, express or implied, to pass this bill. There certainly is nothing in the language of the Constitution as it now stands, or as it was originally made, or as it was understood by the Convention while making it, or as it was always construed by the great men who took part in that Convention, which gives to Congress any such power. But, first of all, are we bound by the Constitution? Notwithstanding what we have heard during the last ten years of the revolutionary times through which we are passing about a dispensing power above the Constitution, which can release our consciences from the oath we have taken to support the Constitution, I have never persuaded myself to believe in any such power over the Constitution and our oaths to support it. I have no faith whatever in the plea sometimes heard from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] that, "for the sake of God and humanity," we may, without violating our oaths, step over the boundaries of the Constitution; nor in that other plea sometimes made, that "we are bound by a higher law than the Constitution" in the performance of our duties here; nor in that other plea sometimes urged, more specious and delusive than any other, that "the logic of events" compels Congress every now and then to step over the boundaries which the Constitution has thrown around them in the exercise of their power.

And, sir, I have just as little faith in that idea, often advanced by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] that in the midst of war we are in the exercise of powers "outside the Constitution" or "above the Constitution." No, sir; no; I have never yielded to these ideas. I trust I never shall yield to them the convictions of my judgment, nor suffer my action as a Senator to be controlled by them. The Constitution as it stands, as it was made, as it was understood by those who made it, and by those who construed it for more than half a century, is the law and the highest law binding upon us, upon our consciences, and upon our oaths. Twice, sir, during the period that I have been here have I been called to that desk, in the presence of this Senate, and in the presence of Him who liveth and reigneth forever, to take a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States; and, sir, as I understand it, I swore that I would support it in war as well as in peace, in storm as well as in sunshine. No higher law, no higher obligation than this can be pleaded. No plea of "war necessity," no "logic of events," nothing in the war or in the purpose of the war, can lead me to think for one moment that I am not bound by the Constitution as a Senator upon my oath and upon my conscience.

The purpose of that great war through which we have just passed was to maintain that Constitution. It was not enough that we ourselves should obey it. We resolved to compel every other man in the United States and in every State of the Union to obey it also. To maintain its supremacy over every man and over every foot of the soil of this Republic we entered upon that great struggle of arms. To maintain its supremacy in the States of the South, where it was attempted to be overthrown, we struck every blow, we fired every shot, we spilt every drop of blood of our sons and of our brothers. It was our avowed purpose in the beginning and before the beginning. It was our avowed purpose in every step of our progress. If now in words or in acts we are to admit that purpose to be false, that the Constitution is no longer supreme and binding upon our consciences and our oaths, then it follows that this war which we waged and carried to success at an expenditure of half a million of lives and more than five thousand million dollars was in all its progress a huge and monstrous lie. No, sir; there is nothing in the war, nor in the purpose of the war, nor in the results of the war, which gives to "the logic of events," or to "war necessity," or to any "the higher law," any dispensing power over the Constitution to release any Senator from his oath to maintain that Constitution as it stands, as it was formed by our great ancestors and construed by them. I yield to it, therefore, Mr. President, my willing, my hearty obedience without any mental reservation.

In saying this, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not question the patriotic purposes of any other Senator who may have differed with me in his view of the powers granted by the Constitution, or who may even have persuaded himself to believe that for some reason based upon "war necessity," "the logic of events," or other cause, the Constitution was for the time suspended.

Mr. President, while upon this subject allow me to say that I regard my allegiance to the Constitution as higher and more sacred than any allegiance to party. Upon this point, and upon this point alone, have I been severed from the Republican party. Upon new questions, which had not arisen or been discussed at all previous to my first or to my second election to the Senate, upon which I was compelled to choose whether I would follow the demands of party or keep my oath and my allegiance to the Constitution, my relations to that party were sundered. It was because I believed and now believe that many of the measures proposed and adopted by this and the last Congress are openly and palpably unconstitutional that I have openly, earnestly, and persistently opposed them here and elsewhere.

Being about to leave my place in the Senate, as I look back upon the past I have no regrets for any resistance which I have made to the passage of unconstitutional laws demanded by party policy or party necessity. There is not one single instance from the beginning to the end of my course here in which I have opposed the passage of laws on account of their unconstitutionality that if called upon again, this very hour, to cast my vote or declare my opinion I would not give the same vote and declare the same opinion in stronger terms if possible. In full view of all the personal consequences which might come to me I took the responsibility. I would do so again. I knew full well, sir, that I should be subjected to denunciation. I knew that what has already come would in all probability come, that the people of my State would refuse to sustain me and would elect another in my place. Yet, sir, after all these consequences have come, I distinctly repeat, that on no occasion in this body have I resisted the passage of any law upon the ground of its unconstitutionality that I would not now, if possible, resist it more firmly and more earnestly. My only regret is that I have not done so with greater ability and with greater success.

But, Mr. President, I congratulate myself that in the discussion of this question now before the Senate none of these exciting topics of political strife arise. I shall not reopen their discussion. I shall not even refer to the cases in which I believe that Congress has transcended its constitutional powers. Let those dead issues pass; they are a part of history. "Let the dead bury the dead," and around their tomb let us have peace; at least let us have truce long enough to cool our passions and calm our judgments and wisely meet the living questions of the present.

I repeat, Mr. President, I think we may congratulate ourselves that in the discussion of the railroad question there will be no opportunity for my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to rise in his place, and, with eloquent voice and imposing manner, urge the Senate to make no distinction on account of race or color. My honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] will have no occasion to rise and say the "war necessities of the country require the passage of this bill." Nor will my other honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] rise and say, as he often does, when he would close his eyes to constitutional objections, "I do not profess to discuss or to understand constitutional questions, but I believe the cause of God and humanity requires me to vote for the pending measure." Nor do I believe that on this subject at least there will be any Senator to appeal to the "war power outside the Constitution" in favor of the passage of this bill. Nor will there be any appeal to "the logic of events," that hackneyed phrase of radicals and revolutionists, in which they seek to find an inexhaustible source of unlimited power in Congress to do everything it may desire to do on any subject whatever, the limitations of the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding.

The only thing calculated to prejudice the mind and prevent a calm consideration of the questions involved is what I will denominate, without disrespect to any, a clamor about monopoly. This clamor has been long, loud, and deep, both in the press and in Congress. I do not know all the facts. Some things may have transpired in the railroad operations of New Jersey and Maryland to give some occasion for this clamor, and to produce the discontent which manifests itself here. But whatever there may have been in the past, I believe that for some reason, whether from the fear of interference by Congress, or whether it be because the States of New Jersey and Maryland, the first to enter upon the construction of railways, resting upon their early laurels, suffered themselves for a time to get a little behind the age, but have now awakened to the true situation of affairs, one thing is certain, they have learned what all other roads, both at the West and the North, will learn, that their true interest and best policy is to be found in reducing rates and affording the best possible accommodations to the traveling public.

In justice to these States we are bound to say that the facility of communication from Washington to New York has been greatly improved within the last ten years. The route is made much easier, the journey is made quicker, and I think cheaper, than it was ten years ago. The Delaware has been bridged, the Susquehanna bridged, the Gunpowder bridged. There are now through trains, without change of cars, from here to New York, with very good sleeping cars for the night trains, though on some of our western railroads they may be in some respects superior. But that is only a question of a little more time.

Mr. President, the first question that arises is this: suppose Congress has power to grant an act of incorporation to build a railway from here to the city of New York, what is the necessity for now exercising that power? Surely there is no greater necessity upon us now than there has been at any time within the last twenty-five years. The necessity is not as great to-day as it was ten years ago, and that necessity is growing less and less. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WYTHE] has just read in the Senate a letter from the Governor of Maryland, who is himself a president of a new railway company already incorporated by the State of Maryland to build a railway from Baltimore to this city, in which he declares that it will be finished by January, 1870—within twelve months. That railway is to be a competing railway with the Baltimore and Ohio road, connecting at Baltimore with the Northern Central railway, and over that to Harrisburg, with the great railroad system of Pennsylvania; so that at the end of one year from this time we are to have in fact competing railways from here to the North and West, and that, too, by the action of the States and the citizens of the States, without any interference by Congress or the exercise of any such doubtful and extraordinary powers.

I insist, therefore, that even if we possessed all the power which is claimed by the Senator from Ohio there is no such necessity pressing upon us to open new railway communications from the city of Washington northward as to justify us in entering upon this dangerous policy. The people of this city, if they would depend less upon the Government and more upon themselves; if they would rely upon their own industry, energy, and enterprise; in a word, if they would do in Washington as the people have done in Baltimore and other cities, take their own interests into their own hands and open new railway communications with the other great railways of the country, there would be no difficulty in its accomplishment and in making Washington a city of commercial importance.

SENATE.

Mr. SHERMAN. They cannot now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I grant that the people of this city have no legislative power; Congress is to legislate for this District; and there is no difficulty in Congress granting acts of incorporation to build railroads within the District of Columbia. These things we do every day, because we have exclusive jurisdiction to legislate for the District. The people of this District, having obtained a charter for a railroad company through the District, can apply to the States of Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and other States, and obtain acts of incorporation for the building of railroads wherever they are practicable or may be desired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire not to interrupt my friend or prolong his argument, for I wish to get a vote on this bill to-day, but I desire to say that I am informed by credible persons here that they have applied to the State of Maryland for charters for roads in various directions from this city and they have always been beaten, and it was with great difficulty, by taking advantage of doubtful phraseology of a very doubtful law, that they finally got one road under way from here to Baltimore.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That may have been so in years past. I do not profess to understand the history of the legislation of Maryland; but certainly, if we can rely on the statement of her Senators and on the statement of her present Governor, there is a road now being built between this city and Baltimore under a charter granted by that State, which is to be a competing road with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, the great railroad corporation of that State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say to my honorable friend that that very road referred to by him will probably be a part of the line for which this bill provides. It is authorized by this bill to form part of the new road.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. So far, then, the Senator is agreed that the monopoly exercised by the State of Maryland, or the restrictive policy pursued by the State of Maryland, has been overcome.

Mr. SHERMAN. By Congress.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not by Congress. It has been overcome by the granting of this charter by the Maryland Legislature, which authorizes a road from Baltimore to this place; and the Northern Central road, which comes to the city of Baltimore, is standing ready to connect with it, so that from the city of Washington there will be a through, direct route, without change of cars or baggage, to Harrisburg; and there you intersect the great Pennsylvania Central and the whole railroad system of Pennsylvania. From Harrisburg there are several routes to the city of New York. Having succeeded at last in relaxing the former policy of Maryland, and the Baltimore and Potomac road now being in process of construction and so soon to reach this city, what necessity is there for the exercise of this power, which all must regard as doubtful, and which, in my opinion, was expressly denied to Congress by the convention which framed the Constitution? Bear in mind the statement of the Governor of Maryland, that nearly every mile of the road is being rapidly graded, some sections are completed, and that it will be done by January, 1870.

Mr. President, I repeat, it is perfectly clear the necessity for entering upon this policy by Congress now is not as great as it was twenty years ago, nor as great as it was ten years ago. In fact, there is no necessity at all. Even the question of inconvenience will be removed when we have this competing line connecting with the Northern Central running to Harrisburg. All who come from the West will have the choice of two routes, one by Pittsburg to Harrisburg, and thence by this new line to Washington, the other by the Baltimore and Ohio from Wheeling to Washington; and all going west can go by the Baltimore and Potomac, Northern Central, and Pennsylvania Central, to strike the Ohio system of roads at Pittsburg, or by the Baltimore and Ohio direct to strike that system at Wheeling.

Mr. SHERMAN. By either route we go around seventy-five miles.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It might be well if the people of Washington and all who are interested in the growth of this city should wake up to their true interests and seek to open a shorter route to the great West. They could undoubtedly, if they attempt it, obtain a charter from the States of Virginia and West Virginia and Pennsylvania which will allow them to build an air-line railway, if the mountains will permit it, to the nearest point on the Ohio river. I believe that Washington, from its natural location, might be made a great commercial city. It is as near, if not nearer, than any other point upon navigable waters running into the Atlantic to the navigable waters of the Ohio. Why, sir, the railroad mentioned by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] the Chesapeake and Ohio railway, is the one, in my judgment, in which the city of Washington is more interested than any other. By a direct connection from here to Staunton, upon that road, in Virginia, and thence by the Kanawha valley to the Ohio river, there to connect with the navigation of the Mississippi and with all the great railroad systems of the West, is, above all others, the most important route for this city. But, Mr. President, for Congress to charter a new railroad from Washington to New York at the very time when all necessity for it is disappearing is, in my opinion, very unwise. I see no good reason for it. I see many, many reasons against it even if we had the constitutional power.

As to the inconveniences mentioned by the honorable Senator, the refusal to check baggage or sell through tickets, I believe they might be remedied under the power which we undoubtedly possess here in Congress over the District of Columbia. When a competing road reaches this city from Baltimore, connecting with the Northern Central and Pennsylvania Central, there will be no longer any difficulty on this point; it will regulate itself. Competition will compel the checking of baggage and the selling of through tickets to all the North and all the West; but even if that does not, the authority of Congress over the railroads within this District could impose such terms and conditions upon them as would be just and reasonable on this question. We could make it for their interest to be reasonable. There is nothing in these inconveniences, therefore, to make it necessary to enter upon the exercise of this great, this gigantic power of building railways through the States by act of Congress.

Mr. President, before I go to the argument of the question of power I will call attention for a few moments to a portion of the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] In some things I agree with him; I will go so far as to say if any restriction is imposed upon either the carrying of freight or passengers across the States of Maryland and New Jersey which is not imposed equally upon the citizens of New Jersey and the citizens of Maryland it would be a clear violation of the Constitution of the United States, and must be held so by every court where the question is presented; and Congress, in the regulation of commerce between the States, might go so far as by enactment to prohibit the imposition of any duties or tolls upon travelers or merchandise through the States of New Jersey and Maryland other or greater than are imposed upon their own citizens; but, sir, if the States of New Jersey and Maryland treat their own citizens upon precisely the same footing as they treat the citizens of other States, levying no heavier tolls for the use of their railways, I think it is within the power of those States to levy tolls upon merchandise and upon the transportation of passengers.

Let us see, for one moment, how far this doctrine of the Senator would go. Suppose the State of Maryland authorizes a toll-bridge across Gunpowder river for travelers, and says to the company making it, "You may collect twenty-five cents per capita of every traveler who crosses the bridge," is that an unconstitutional exercise of power? Is that levying such a tax or toll on passengers that the Congress of the United States would be authorized to interfere, and by a penal provision make it a crime on the part of those who undertake to collect such a tax? Or if a ferry across a river is chartered by the State, is it an unconstitutional tax upon passengers or merchandise if the State allows that corporation to collect toll for crossing the river? Or suppose a State, instead of chartering a company to build a bridge across a river, should charter a company to build a railroad across a portion of its territory, and should say that the company, in lieu of taxes imposed upon the real estate belonging to it, should pay a certain portion, if you please, of its net receipts or of its gross receipts into the State treasury, would that be an unconstitutional tax? Or let me suppose another case—and this will bring the question home: suppose the State, instead of chartering a corporation, builds the road itself and runs it and takes all the tolls for passengers and all the tolls for freight, instead of taking one fifth or one seventh, would that be an unconstitutional levying of tolls upon travel and merchandise through a State? If the State deals with all the citizens of the United States precisely alike, if it says to those who cross a toll-bridge, whether they live in New Jersey or Pennsylvania, "You shall pay a certain sum, and no more," it is not, in my opinion, a violation of the Constitution of the United States. If this new doctrine is carried out what shall we say of the great State of New York, which levies tolls on the Erie canal, the great highway of commerce between the West and the East? That State has expended probably a hundred millions to open these channels of commerce. Has she no right to any remuneration whatever for all this vast expenditure?

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. If the State of Maryland has the right to require that the railroad company shall pay into the treasury of the State thirty cents for every passenger carried between Washington and Baltimore, I ask if it has not the right to require that the railroad company shall pay thirty dollars for every passenger between here and Baltimore? I ask, further, whether such a tax as that would be constitutional, and what would be the effect of it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Suppose the State of Maryland had never built a railroad? Suppose the State of New Jersey had never built any railroads? This putting of extreme cases, cases which are in themselves impossible to be supposed, even, does not test the question. But suppose a State, by its own exercise of eminent domain in opening its own thoroughfares, builds a road itself; according to the Senator's doctrine the State cannot impose a single cent of tax upon a traveler for traveling over it. If the State taxes one fifth of what the passenger pays for the privilege of going over the road, he claims that to be a tax on passengers; but if the State had built the road itself and taxed five fifths, that is no tax on passengers at all.

Mr. MORTON. How was it in the Nevada case?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will come to the Nevada case in about five minutes.

I do not believe that either the State of New Jersey or the State of Maryland has obstructed the transit of passengers or freight or merchandise. I believe what is stated by the Senators from both of those States, that they were among the first, I think the very first, to enter upon the experiment (for it was then an experiment) of railway communication. It proved to be a success. But it cost the State of Maryland a large sum of money. It involved the State in debt. It was compelled, and I think it was but just that it should do so, to require the railroad in some way or other to pay a portion of its proceeds into the treasury. How does the railroad acquire any proceeds? It must acquire them either upon merchandise or passengers; for that is all their business. If you require them to pay two per cent. or five per cent. or any other per cent. on their receipts it is a tax on their business; and what is their business? Receiving tolls for freight and receiving passage money for passengers; and if the State collects anything of the railway company you take a part of the receipts from each source. Whatever is collected from the company is of necessity collected by the company on freight or passengers. If the State had built the road, as it had the undoubted right to do, it would take the whole of them; but as the State charters a corporation to do it, it gives to the men who furnish the money for the enterprise a share of the proceeds, reserving something to the State in lieu of taxation and to pay the indebtedness incurred by the State in aid of the construction of the railway.

Now, sir, I am discussing the question of constitutional power, not of good policy. I admit that it would be better policy for every State in the Union to adopt the policy pursued by the State of Indiana, and not to impose, if you please, any direct tolls upon passengers and travel; and yet even Indiana is compelled to get taxes out of these railroad corporations in some way, and those taxes, whatever they are, must come out of the earnings of the corporations, and those earnings come from the carriage of passengers and freight, and from no other source.

And now, sir, let us come to the Nevada case. Although there was some general language used by the judge delivering the opinion in that case looking in that direction, it seems to me that the principle contended for by the honorable Senator from Indiana is not involved in the facts of the case. What was that case in Nevada? That State levied upon a stage company a tax per capita upon all men going out of Nevada. It was a kind of ne exeat regnum to stop a man going out of the State. It was an assertion, in a modified form, on the part of this young State of Nevada of that old, exploded doctrine of Great Britain, "once a subject always a subject." There was no tax levied on men going into Nevada. It was a tax levied on their going out. The court very properly decided that a man who went into Nevada had a right to go out of Nevada without being taxed for going out or coming in. But let me ask my honorable friend from Indiana, suppose Nevada had authorized a company to construct a tunnel through the Sierra Nevada mountain and had said to the company, "You may charge twenty-five cents a head on every traveler that goes through it," would that have been unconstitutional? Or if Nevada had built a bridge across one of its rivers, would it have been unconstitutional to require the company to pay so much a head for every passenger that crossed it? If the Supreme Court have decided that, they have decided a great deal that they did not decide in the Nevada case, I am quite certain. They simply decided in the Nevada case that a man had a right to go out of Nevada without any restriction being imposed upon him by the State.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator right here if the State of Nevada has no right to levy a tax upon a man going out of Nevada has it a right to levy a tax on a man going into Nevada, or one going clear across it? The Senator seems to place it on the ground that the State had no right to levy a tax on a man going out of it, but carrying with his argument the implication that if he was going into it, or clear across it, the State would have a right to tax him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not say that Nevada has a right to tax a man for going into it. The Supreme Court have decided in the case referred to a little while ago by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] where the opinion was delivered by Justice Grier that no State has a right to tax a passenger for coming into it. Neither the State of New York nor the State of Massachusetts has a right to impose a tax on immigration into the State, nor has Nevada a right to impose a tax on emigration out of the State; but in traveling upon the roads built in Nevada, or under the authority of Nevada, if the State of Nevada puts no other or greater tax or restriction upon the people who do not live in Nevada than it does upon its own citizens we have no right to complain, and the Constitution is not broken, in my opinion; and that, I think, is the distinction.

Mr. MORTON. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Supreme Court does not base its decision at all upon the fact that it is a tax on passengers going out of Nevada any more than on those coming in or going across; but that it is, in substance, a tax upon passengers at all is the very question decided.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have stated my view of the substance of that decision, and I think all that it will bear upon full consideration, and I shall pass on without further discussing that point, as I do not wish to occupy too much of the time of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, let us come to the great question, the question of constitutional power. I maintain, first, that there is no express grant of power in the Constitution to Congress to grant an act of incorporation to build a railroad within the States. I think no person on the floor of the Senate has contended that there is any express grant of such a power. If there be any grant in the Constitution it must be implied from other clauses of the Constitution. It must be upheld as an incident to some of the powers which are granted. The words which are relied upon by those who contend for the exercise of this power are these:

"Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads;" * * * "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States;" * * * "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare."

How was this question understood by the men who made the Constitution? I undertake to say that it was unanimously understood in the Convention which made the Constitution that the clauses of the Constitution then agreed upon contained no such power. Every person who took part in that discussion understood that the clauses then adopted contained no such power. Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, perhaps the most distinguished man that Connecticut produced in the revolutionary period, and whose brother, I believe, was in the direct line the ancestor of the honorable Senator from Ohio, understood that it contained no such power and he was opposed to granting any such power when it was proposed by Doctor Franklin.

Mr. Sherman was opposed to it because "the expense in such cases would fall on the United States and the benefit accrue to the places where the canals may be cut." There were no railways then. The debate arose on a question about canals as a means of opening a new and easier means of communication. Mr. Madison understood that such a power was not granted. This is certain; for in the Convention he proposed to give Congress the power to grant charters of incorporation, avowing that his purpose in giving that power to Congress was to give the power to open means of communication. Mr. Rufus King understood that no such power was granted and opposed the granting of any such power. Alexander Hamilton believed that Congress had no such power, and in his articles in the Federalist expressly declares that it was his opinion that Congress had no such power. Jefferson, as everybody knows, declared that no such power existed under the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Madison, who has sometimes been looked up to as the very father of the Constitution, whose opinions upon its true meaning have always been held in the highest respect, having proposed it in the Convention and it having been voted down, knew, when President of the United States and the question was brought before him for his official action, that no such power was granted in the Constitution, that no such power was intended to be granted, but was expressly refused to Congress by the Convention which made it, and therefore he put his veto on the internal improvement bill. I have the veto message of President Madison before me, in which he discusses this question and takes up these different clauses in the Constitution under which this power is claimed, and in which he states in the clearest and most unequivocal terms that Congress does not possess it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In what year was that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The veto bears date on the 3d of March, 1817:

"I am constrained, by the insuperable difficulty I feel in reconciling the bill with the Constitution of the United States, to return it with that objection to the House of Representatives, in which it originated.

"The legislative powers vested in Congress are specified and enumerated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution; and it does not appear that the power proposed to be exercised by the bill is among the enumerated powers, or that it falls, by any just interpretation, within the power to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution those or other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

"The power to regulate commerce among the several States," cannot include a power to construct roads and canals and to improve the navigation of watercourses, in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such a commerce, without a latitude of construction departing from the ordinary import of the terms, strengthened by the known inconveniences which doubtless led to the grant of this remedial power to Congress.

"To refer the power in question to the clause 'to provide for the common defense and general welfare,' would be contrary to the established and consistent rules of interpretation."

I will not read further from this able message of Mr. Madison. He is, I think, justly regarded as one of the ablest expounders of the Constitution, for he took a most important part in its creation and in its defense before the people, and he positively knew that the Convention which framed it withheld this very power because he had himself offered in the Convention to give Congress that power and it was voted down, and voted down for reasons distinctly stated. The veto message of President Monroe has already been referred to in the course of this discussion. Mr. Monroe states his opinion with that clearness for which he was distinguished, touching all the clauses of the Constitution by virtue of which or under which this power is claimed. I will refer to but a single paragraph. He says:

"It has never been contended that the power was specifically granted. It is claimed only as being incidental to some one or more of the powers which are specifically granted. The following are the powers from which it is said to be derived:

- "1. From the right to establish post offices and post roads.
- "2. From the right to declare war.

"3. To regulate commerce."
 "4. To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare."

"5. From the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

"6. From the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States."

"According to my judgment, it cannot be derived from either of those powers, nor from all of them united, and in consequence it does not exist."

Mr. President, we all know, for it is within the recollection of Senators, the discussion which took place upon the veto of General Jackson upon the Maysville road bill. It is so familiar that I will not quote any of its language. It is well known that he maintained the same views which had been maintained by Madison and Monroe in their veto messages, and which were known to be the views of the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States.

But, Mr. President, there are two other gentlemen as distinguished, and perhaps more so, than any others in civil life in the revolutionary period, whose opinions upon this question ought to be well considered. I refer to Mr. Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton. They were the representative men of their period, representing different and somewhat antagonistic ideas on this very question of the proper construction of the Constitution; the one representing, if you please, laying great stress at least upon the powers reserved to the States; the other, from his natural tendency of mind and his convictions, in favor of the most liberal construction of the powers vested in the Federal Government. Sir, when both those men—the man who represented the most enlarged ideas of Federalism, whose tendencies and opinions favored centralization of power, and also the man who represented the ideas of republicanism, a strict construction upon all the powers granted to the Federal Government and a liberal construction of all the powers reserved to the States—when both these men, who were somewhat extreme in their views and opinions, but were the true representative men of their period, concur in telling you that the Convention which framed the Constitution gave Congress no power to charter incorporations, to build railways, or to cut canals, it seems to me almost impossible that gentlemen, if they desire to construe the Constitution as it was made or as it was construed by those who made it, can find in the Constitution the power to grant this railroad incorporation.

There are one or two other features of this bill to which I desire to call attention. Having shown, as I think, both from the Constitution itself and from its proper construction that no such power was expressly given and no such power can properly be implied, there are still other objections. Under the terms of this bill the power of eminent domain is asserted over the soil and territory of the State without its consent. The State is substantially ousted of its jurisdiction. The bill provides that for all acts done or omitted by the railroad company there shall be no suit commenced in a State court which shall not be transferred, upon application, to the courts of the United States. Therefore the property which is taken is to be taken by the authority of the United States. True, by an amendment adopted yesterday, the words "in behalf of the United States" are stricken out, but the effect is not changed. The property is still to be taken from the State by the Federal Government and the title put into a corporation created by the Federal Government, and then the Federal Government asserts its jurisdiction over this road and over the soil of the State covered by its tracks and depots and over all questions done or omitted to be done in and about the same. It asserts the jurisdiction of the United States and the United States courts without asking the consent of the State. Without the adoption of my amendment, which requires this to be done only with the consent of the Legislatures of the States, this bill is, in my judgment, a clear violation of the spirit of the Constitution, if not of its express letter. By the seventeenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution Congress has the power—

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

These words, "other needful buildings," would cover a railway, its stations and its track, because its track may be said to be a building within the comprehensive meaning of the term. It is a great engine, laid upon the earth it is true, over which pass locomotives with cars so rapid as almost to annihilate time and distance. A mighty engine! to be sure, a thing of modern growth, not known when the Constitution was formed, but none the less a thing, a "building," which would be embraced within these words. Sir, is it to be supposed that if the Government of the United States has no power to obtain exclusive jurisdiction over the ground on which to build a fort without asking the consent of a State Legislature—

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend certainly must be aware that it has been decided that the United States may purchase ground for forts or other public buildings, but it cannot have exclusive jurisdiction, under the language of the Constitution, without the consent of the States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that. If the honorable Senator had heard the beginning of my argument he would understand the force which I give to this clause. I maintain that this bill ousts the jurisdiction of the State over this railroad by giving jurisdiction to the courts of the United States over whatever may be done or omitted to be done in the operation of the railway or in its construction.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill itself allows no cases to be carried to the courts of the United States except cases where the validity of the franchise is called in question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the language of the bill. That was offered by way of amendment to a certain portion of the section and adopted. But, sir, there is another clause in the section. Let me read a clause from the bill:

"That if any suit or proceeding, either in law or equity, or any criminal prosecution shall be commenced in any State court, against the New York and Washington Railway Company, their successors or assigns, or any person authorized or employed by them, for any act done, or omitted to be done, in and about the construction of the railway hereby authorized under and by virtue of this act, and in which the validity of any franchise conferred by this act is denied, or to restrain by injunction or otherwise the construction, completion, or operation of the said railway," &c.

This clause in italics I have no doubt was inserted with a view in part to avoid the effect of the constitutional provision to which I have referred; but it does not relieve the section from the fact that the United States Government creates a corporation, endows it with just such powers as it pleases, and it denies to the State any right to have any suit against any person for what has been done or omitted to be done, if it is claimed that it draws in question any one of the franchises of the corporation. Those franchises are without limit. If the power exists in Congress which is asserted here, those franchises may be such as completely to oust all jurisdiction whatever. The franchise may grant to the corporation the power to forbid a single person to set his foot within any building or upon the track of the railroad which belongs to this company except by the express permission of the company, and thus exclude every citizen and officer of the State from setting his foot upon it except by permission of the corporation. In substance, it is an ouster of the jurisdiction of the State, if Congress has this power. I do not say that this bill by its terms goes so far as absolutely to oust all jurisdiction in criminal cases. If a murder were committed within one of the depots of the railway, the case might be tried in a State court; but if Congress chooses to do so, if it has the power asserted, it can oust the jurisdiction even in a case like that.

But there is still another objection. This bill asserts the power of Congress to take a portion of the real estate of the State without the consent of its Legislature, and withdraw it just so far as Congress chooses to withdraw it from taxation by the State. The State can tax its own property no longer in its own right. It can only tax it by permission of Congress. We all know that these great railroad franchises are among the most valuable of all property which can exist in a State. Take the great Pennsylvania railroad company in the State of Pennsylvania. One of the most important property interests of that State is in that railway. Shall Congress have the power to usurp jurisdiction over that railway corporation, to take possession of it and withdraw it from the taxation of Pennsylvania except by the consent of Congress? If Congress has the power to charter a railway corporation side by side with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, Congress has the power in the exercise of this right of eminent domain to take the Baltimore and Ohio railroad itself and to subject it to its control, and to withdraw it altogether from the taxation of the State of Maryland. I maintain that without the consent of the State no such power can be exercised by Congress, and none ought to be exercised even if Congress had the power. If Congress enters upon the work of building railways it must defend them by law against State taxation, or the States can tax them out of existence. And if Congress takes away the power to tax them for State purposes, some of the greatest and most valuable portions of the State, its soil and jurisdiction, are withdrawn from State taxation.

It is upon these grounds, Mr. President, first, that by the Constitution Congress has no power to grant an incorporation for any such purpose; that such power is neither expressly given nor can fairly be implied from the powers which are granted; second, because Congress has no power without the consent of the State Legislature to assert the right of eminent domain, and thus far to oust the jurisdiction of the State over its property, its own soil; and third, because Congress has no power to withdraw valuable and important property interests belonging to the State from State taxation, that I am opposed to the passage of this bill. I believe in the truth of what Justice McLean said, that the exercise by Congress of these tremendous powers will, if once entered upon, revolutionize the Government. If Congress once begin, of necessity all railway corporations will seek to be chartered by national authority. I believe if Congress shall bring to itself here, and under its control, all the railway corporations of the United States, it will in the end subject the control of this Government to an aristocracy of concentrated wealth, not an aristocracy of men which may have some redeeming qualities, but an aristocracy of mammoth corporations, which, as has been said in strong Anglo-Saxon, have neither "bodies to be kicked nor souls to be damned." In the hands of these great mammoth railway corporations representing thousands of millions, Congresses and Presidents will be but playthings.

Sir, we know from the history of the country and what transpires in the different States on the subject of railway corporations, the power and influence that are exercised at the capital of every State by the great moneyed corporations which control this greatest engine of modern invention, the railway system. If you concentrate them all here—and concentrated they will be if you once enter upon this policy—who can predict the result to our Government and to our institutions? If, as we have seen, even Alexander Hamilton, one of the ablest men of the Revolution, but who, in the formation of the Constitution and the construction he sought to give to it was always in favor of enlarging the powers of the Federal Government and concentrating as much as possible power in Congress; if even he, who was in his day the genius of centralization, shrank back from this proposition, if he was unwilling to give a construction to the Constitution which would bring such a power here, how is it possible that any statesman at this day can find such a power under the Constitution?

Mr. President, I have observed the fact—it may be entirely by accident, I hope it is—that under the new régime every statute has been removed from the Rotunda of the Capitol except that of Alexander Hamilton. Is he to be the presiding genius of the coming future? Having always represented in his life the Federal tendency to bring consolidated power to this Government, he may represent the future just before us, and which is soon to come, and which if you pass this bill has already come. The power of the States over their own railways, their own means of communication, their own institutions, even over their suffrage, is to be subjected to the power of this Government. If this measure shall pass and be acquiesced in by the people every railway corporation will desire its charter under this Government. They will seek a national charter. They will seek national authority for all their acts independent of State control. The time would not be far distant before they would seek to relieve themselves from State taxation in whole or in part. They will be here in immense force, the representatives not only of hundreds of millions, but of thousands of millions of dollars, concentrated and controlled by directors who meet in secret and control all their gigantic operations. When the time comes that all this concentrated power is here, I tell you, Mr. President, and I tell you, my brother Senators, the days of this Republic under the Constitution of the United States as our fathers made it, as our fathers understood it, are already numbered. The plea for a strong government will be set up by these moneyed monopolies, and they will not plead in vain. Capital seeks strong governments. Capital seeks to concentrate itself; and concentrated capital, wherever it exists and in whatever form, has a tendency to concentrated despotism. If we would not see the just powers of the States destroyed, if we would not have them broken down and an imperialism established here at Washington, an imperialism not represented by monarch or potentate or aristocracy of birth, but represented by an aristocracy of concentrated wealth held by railway and banking corporations, we must resist the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, I know it has been said, and sometimes with force, that we are in the midst of a revolution; that the war which has been upon us has accustomed us to the centralization of power in the Government at Washington. To a certain extent that may be true; and yet I, for one, hope that revolution is not yet complete. I hope when this great question is fully discussed and fairly understood, it does so much to trample down the rights of the States, it does so much to enlarge the powers of this Government, that reaction will begin in favor of the just rights reserved to the States under the Constitution, and that this Government shall cease from the exercise of doubtful and unconstitutional power.

Mr. President, I have perhaps detained the Senate too long. I have spoken upon this subject with earnestness because I feel that in it are involved the very gravest questions that have ever been presented here. As I said, in a brief period I shall leave the Senate and probably public life forever. I can have no other hope or wish, but the prosperity of my country. I implore my brother Senators not to allow any of these specious pleas of commercial necessity or the logic of events or the desire to build up a great and splendid capital at Washington to induce them to enter upon this doubtful and most dangerous experiment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. T. ELLIOTT,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 2, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ELLIOTT, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, it is with some embarrassment that I appear before you to-day, as I am a new member in this House, and consequently but little acquainted with the route I should take in placing myself properly before it and the country. It is said that "an honest confession is good for the soul." To this I agree, upon certain conditions. I believe in an honest confession, not made through policy, but from a conscientious conviction coming from the heart deep down in its inmost recesses. That man who from mere policy puts on a show of honesty is a bad man, and not to be trusted. Hence I appear before you to-day with no lip-service, but to state earnestly and truthfully facts as they are, leaving you and members generally to judge of the truthfulness and sincerity of my statements.

I feel the weight of the responsible duty I have to perform, but in its discharge I expect to derive a personal satisfaction, if nothing more, even if I should not succeed in saying anything to help the glorious cause in which the present Congress has been so long engaged—the reconstruction of the southern States, the failure of which would be destructive and ruinous to the best interests of our country, and fatal to the realization of those bright hopes and wishes which a seemingly auspicious future encourages us to entertain.

Mr. Speaker, I belong to a class of men who have peculiar claims upon the sympathy if not upon the admiration of this House. To come to the point at once, you are now being addressed by a truly and thoroughly "reconstructed rebel." I say this in no canting or boasting spirit. I detest a hypocrite, and despise that man who, like the vain-glorious Pharisee of old, makes an ostentatious parade of assumed humility, while his heart is full of pride and deceit. When I say that I am a "reconstructed rebel" I do not wish to imply any pretension to extraordinary virtue, or any claim to extraordinary consideration, nor, on the other hand, do I say it in that spirit of undue humility which suggests a craven and coward heart; but I say it in the open, frank, and manly spirit of one who has the honesty to confess that he has done wrong, and the courage to say that he is sorry for it. Though for nearly three years a rebel against our Government I can declare with entire truth and sincerity that I have always been at heart a Union man. Entertaining no boasting or vain-glorious spirit, what I mean to say by this is that I was always opposed to secession, and always thought it was wrong in principle as well as policy to break up or attempt to break up that glorious Union which was devised by the wisdom and cemented by the blood of our brave old revolutionary sires. I fought against secession with all the energy I could put forth. I struggled against it with all my powers of mind and body. But I could not stop the frantic current of revolution that seemed to be borne along by the irresistible hand of destiny, carrying, like the besom of destruction, everything before it. Arkansas, by a majority of five thousand votes, decided against secession; but the members of our convention, exhibiting a fatal weakness, allowed themselves to be shorn of their locks, and thus Arkansas fell from her loyalty. Thank God, she was the first to return, as the prodigal son, and ask from a just but magnanimous and beneficent Government pardon for her sins. And to-day she forms one of that bright constellation which is the object of admiration and affection of the downtrodden and oppressed among all the nations of the earth.

But I am digressing. Well, I resisted to the last; yes, so long as one single ray of hope remained to encourage or justify resistance. But when the last hope had vanished I yielded to what appears to me to be, if not the reason, at least the necessity of the occasion, and went with my State. I became a rebel, but not exactly a fighting rebel. I hunted soft and easy places. Whether fortunately or unfortunately, I will not undertake to say, it happened that the path which fate had marked out for me to tread in the progress of that great rebellion did not lead me within the range of the enemy's minie rifles. I was one of those favored few whose lot it was to remain in the rear and enjoy the luxury of smuggled goods, &c.

Now, there are a great many men who appear to find an incomprehensible mystery in the fact of a Union man voluntarily wearing the confederate uniform; but the mystery is easily enough comprehended when you take into consideration that peculiar phase of patriotism, so characteristic, I may say, of the southern people, so well illustrated in what was in time past one of their popular and most universally-toasted Fourth of July sentiments, "Our country, right or wrong." This phase of patriotism has been, I say, a peculiar characteristic of the southern people, and fully accounts for the otherwise strange and anomalous fact that so many Union men joined the confederacy. The southern people of all parties "had been schooled," more or less, in the doctrine of State rights at least, to the extent of believing that their first allegiance was due to their State, and that this allegiance was paramount to that they owed the United States. Thus, while thousands of them were opposed to secession, yet when their State seceded they, with this fatal delusion in their minds, were led astray and fell victims to one of the most damnable doctrines ever promulgated. There may be something to admire in this regard for the ties of State and section; but while we admire the pluck of him who exhibits it, we must damn his discretion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of a rebel I have been. As soon as the war was over I fully realized that I had been guilty of a great wrong in aiding rebellion. I was not only willing, but glad to see the Union restored, and was ready to make all proper apology and reparation for the part I had taken in resisting the authority of the Government. I was conscientious and sincere in that feeling, and I still hold to it. As the best evidence I could give of the sincerity of my repentance I at once connected myself with that great political party which had fought and vanquished secession, and which had nailed up at its masthead that good old motto, which found a responsive echo in my heart, "The Union, it must and shall be preserved." I connected myself with the Republican party because I believed that it was the Union party; that as it had opposed and overcome secession Democracy and saved the Union it would use the same great powers and energies to preserve that which had cost so much to save. So far as regards the great leading fundamental idea of restoring the Union upon a just and enduring basis, I say that the Republican party is entitled to the credit of maintaining and carrying out that doctrine. It has proved faithful to its promises and its proclaimed policy, and it will, I doubt not, finally succeed in establishing that policy throughout our country.

Although I have been a truly loyal citizen since the close of the war, yet Congress in its prudence and discretion did not pardon me for my political sins until some two years after the war had terminated. Of course I felt this was hard and oppressive upon me individually; yet I regarded it as one of those necessary evils that must be borne temporarily in order that a great good might be secured in the future. I was willing to bear the burden, looking forward to a day of rejoicing, not far remote in the future, when the shackles should be stricken from my limbs, and when in the fullness of my heart I could once more exclaim, "I am a free American citizen."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have talked at some considerable length about myself. Yet in doing so I have done what I considered my duty, and nothing more. The rebellion is over; the fratricidal conflict has ended; and it now devolves upon the conquerors to put the old household again in order. How to do this is the great question that is agitating the minds of our people. The work of reconstruction is a momentous one; for it involves not only the property but the lives of thousands of loyal and devoted Union men in the South. Beware how you act. You have conquered; and let not the power you now hold pass hastily from your hands. Remember that poor Israelite of old, Samson, who conquered by his strength everything within his path, even the lion, king of beasts, succumbing to his mighty power; yet he was at last shorn of his strength and placed in captivity. Yet during his captivity he regained his strength, and seizing the pillars of the temple which surrounded him destroyed himself and all that were within it. There is a Samson in the South, who yet has a lurking disposition to destroy the temple of our liberties, that has been erected at the sacrifice of so much blood. And that Samson is the Ku Klux Democracy of the South. The Democrats North may be true Union men and loyal citizens; I do not deny it; but I say beware of a large portion of those in the South. Warm them into political life again and no man who favored the reconstruction acts of Congress can live in the South with safety to himself or his property. "Experience keeps a dear school." And in this school have I learned the terrible intentions of the Ku Klux Democracy.

I do not wish to oppose any one for being a Democrat; nor do I object to Democrats enjoying under this Government all the political and other rights which I enjoy, when they prove to be truly loyal and devoted to the Union. But in the State of Arkansas men have found themselves subjected, with their wives and children, to calumny, insult, and ostracism merely because they were Republicans, or supported the reconstruction acts of Congress. This is the state of things existing there to-day; and but for the protection afforded by the United States Government and Governor Clayton's militia no Republican who advocates and sustains the reconstruction policy of Congress could live there in safety a single week. These are grave charges to bring against a people who are everlastingly professing their loyalty and devotion to the Union; yet they are facts, and susceptible of the most abundant proof. It is said:

"While the lamp holds out to burn
The vilest sinner may return."

That is all right; but let us find out first whether the sinner is truly repentant. We cannot take in any probationary members; our church will not allow it. We must confine ourselves to the old Baptist doctrine, "once a Christian always a Christian." This southern feeling can only be cured by a fixed and determined course against Ku Klux Democracy; loyal Democrats I am not talking about.

Many will advise us to "make the best of the matter." This advice is all excellent, though decidedly gratuitous, lacking, indeed, nothing but the supplementary information how we are to make the best of that which is confessedly at its worst. But to turn all this Ku Klux Democracy indiscriminately loose upon us without some protective measure will not only sap our intellects, but shorten our lives; and many of us will, unless we leave the country, meet sooner or later the fate of the lamented Abraham Lincoln and James Hinds. I am willing to stop a gap in the world's fencing or to form a cog, however minute, in the world's machinery. But I prefer to go slowly in my movements in regard to the reconstruction of the southern States, especially whenever there is a manifest disposition among the people to oppose the reconstructions acts of Congress. The will of the people as expressed through Congress does not go down well in my State; and I guess a little more exercise of power on this subject by Congress will be beneficial to the body politic. But we have a duty to perform and must shirk no responsibility. We must stand inflexibly at our post, like a Roman soldier, during the watches of the night. Presently the morning will come when every phantom will vanish into air, and that inevitable reality for which we dreamed and fought will be consummated, and we shall be once more a united, happy, and prosperous people.

But, Mr. Speaker, this language may not sound well to some southern ears. If it does not, I cannot help it. But I am not yet done. In my State I am called a "scalawag;" and why? Because I support the Government and its laws. A "scalawag" there means a citizen carpet-bagger. Such a one is subjected to an ostracism which includes both himself and family, and is deprived of all those friendly courtesies existing among civilized people, except by his own household and among his political friends. My ancestry, I guess, were "carpet-baggers." It was a lot of "carpet-baggers" that landed on Plymouth Rock. William Penn and Henry Clay were "carpet-baggers." Daniel Boone was a "carpet-bagger." I could go on enumerating many more, but it is unnecessary. I will close this branch of the subject by saying that Judah P. Benjamin is a "carpet-bagger" in England, and expects, as I learn, to be sent by the British Government on some diplomatic mission to this country. The fact that such a thing is deemed possible shows that at least in foreign countries "carpet-baggers" are not considered very bad men.

The truly loyal people of Arkansas extend a hearty welcome to all loyal "carpet-baggers" who may come among them. "Scalawags" are on the increase there, especially since the last presidential election. Governor Clayton's militia have silenced, for a time at least, the Ku Klux party there. But that hellish spirit that drenched its hands in the blood of so many is still existing, and only needs to be warmed into life again by political success to inaugurate the old system of assassination. A brief history of the plans and operations adopted by the Democracy in the last election will probably not be amiss here.

Seymour and Blair were, it was said, the men who would, if elected, deprive the emancipated slaves of all those rights they now enjoy under the reconstruction acts of Congress. This, then, accounts for the determined fight that was made by the Democracy against negro suffrage. But poor deluded people, they knew not what they were doing. Yet in many instances the negro and the white man were, through fear of death or the destruction of their property, compelled to vote in the interest of the Ku Klux Democracy. In other words, the mandate was "Vote that ticket or die." But a wonderful change has come over the spirit of their dreams since the last election. Their motto now is, "Let us have peace." Yes, we want peace, but not by enfranchising Ku Klux Democrats!

Now, a word of advice to the Democratic party. They may take it or not, just as they please; but I give it to them to be acted upon when, if ever, they get into power. In the first place, let me ask them, How long will you have to wait for this possible event? I should have said impossible. But should you succeed in another four years' cruise, you must elect not only a Democratic President, but a Democratic House of Representatives, and have also a Democratic Senate, before you can suspend any laws of Congress, to say nothing about the question of how far the repeal of a law can abrogate vested rights of franchise. We are speaking now of the right of the colored man to vote, a right that, in our opinion, can never be taken from him, notwithstanding the desire of the Democratic party to do so. But, in any event, there must be a lapse of six years before the present reconstruction laws of Congress can be repealed; and during all those six years the colored man will be quietly and peaceably enjoying the elective franchise—if Ku Klux Democracy will let him—in all the southern States. Now, under this view of the case, it must be admitted by good common sense reasoning that when he has thus peaceably and quietly enjoyed the elective franchise for six or seven years it will be utterly impossible to take away that right from him. The right having been confirmed by so long and uninterrupted use, no party will dare to interfere with its continued exercise. Why, sir, Democrats South are now at every call for an election giving barbecues and cajoling and almost hugging the colored people to secure their votes and influence. These are the very men, too, who a few months ago not only denied the right of the negroes to suffrage, but swore in their wrath that they never would countenance the exercise of that right nor accept office through negro votes. Further comment on this subject is unnecessary.

This House a few days since passed by a large majority a joint resolution to ingraft upon the Constitution of the United States a new article giving the right of suffrage to all male citizens, regardless of race or color. I voted for that resolution, and feel proud to have done so. I honor the man who framed and introduced it in this House. This amendment to the Constitution simply embodies in an enduring form one of the fundamental principles of reconstruction. The poor colored men will be thereby only clothed with their just rights; for they, in conjunction with the white loyalists, have accepted the proffered terms of reconstruction, and have assisted, to the extent of their power, in bringing the late rebellious States back into the Union. The right of suffrage, regardless of race or color, will soon be settled forever. There is no way to prevent it short of revolution; and I guess the South, at least, has had enough of that, and will hardly care to go to war again in opposition to the just authority of the Government.

The Democratic party insist that the whole plan of reconstruction is unconstitutional and wrong; and they propose, or did propose, in some States in the South to deprive the colored man without his consent of the right of suffrage, which he now lawfully enjoys. Upon this point we again take issue with them, and insist that the present accomplished plan of reconstruction shall be accepted as a part of the lawful condition of the country. Any determined or formidable resistance to this just measure will bring about a more fatal result to the opposers than the one so recently imprinted upon their remembrance. To all those who are so anxious to fight this war over again I say, keep cool, and "bear the ills you have" rather than "fly to others that you know not of." Yet, with this array of facts staring us in the face, so changeable is the Democratic party of the South in its conduct toward the colored man, that in my own city, Camden, Arkansas, a short time since, one of these fire-eating gentlemen actually ran for mayor on the same ticket with several colored men, and he was elevated to the position he sought by the votes of those very men who only a few short months previous he had so despised and spurned.

But, sir, I return to the main question. Negro suffrage is now a fixed fact. Though the Democrats would have it otherwise if they could, yet, in my opinion, the time will never come when the constitution of any southern State will be so amended by the consent of the people as to deprive so large a class of citizens of the exercise of a right so earnestly fought for. The supposition is too unreasonable and preposterous to be entertained for a single moment; and its unreasonableness will become more and more manifest as the scales fall from the eyes of the Democracy; and, what is more than all, we shall find that this great Democratic party that once attempted to destroy this Union, and failed in their mad design, will long before the next presidential election claim to be the colored man's best friend. They know how to adapt themselves to the changed current of popular opinion, and would willingly inscribe upon their banners to-day the captivating motto, "universal freedom and manhood suffrage." But, sir, if this policy be adopted without certain restrictions and safeguards I say it will be the death-knell of freedom and safety for loyal men in the South. No man who ever favored the reconstruction acts of Congress will be able to live there in peace and happiness "under his own vine and fig tree."

The carpet-bagger and scalawag must leave unless they abandon their former political sentiments and join the Democratic party. The former slave will be but a tool in the hands of designing demagogues, who will threaten him with death or with starvation for himself, his wife, and children, and thus compel him to vote as they may dictate; and that will be against that man or set of men who dared to favor the present reconstruction acts of Congress.

Lest my remarks appear too strongly or vividly expressed I beg leave to refer to publications in the Democratic journals of Arkansas during the last presidential election and since. Would that I could tell with truthfulness a different tale, but the outrages and assassinations committed by the Ku Klux Democracy during those terrible days speak in accents so strong and loud that I cannot stultify myself by denying or ignoring them.

Mr. Speaker, with the facts that I know, and the awful sights I have witnessed in my own State, it would be criminal in me to be silent.

The South went into revolution and was subjugated; and the repentant and now loyal men there are not only suffering the bitter fruits of rebellion, but have been murdered in cold blood for merely expressing their penitence for participation in rebellion and asking pardon of the Government they so ungratefully wronged. What Government upon the face of the earth has ever been more magnanimous and forgiving than ours? In every instance where true repentance has been shown the Government has reached out the hand of forgiveness and friendship and welcomed the wayward wanderer back. Even to the most violent has this friendly greeting been extended. Yet the man who asks this forgiveness at the South, and shows the sincerity of his repentance by indorsing the reconstruction policy of Congress, is abused, maltreated, and ostracised by his former friends; his life is endangered; vituperation is hurled at him; he is denounced as an enemy and a traitor to his country. Even the women and children join in the general howl of indignation, and death lurks around him in every form until he consents to join in the general warfare against Congress or seeks some more genial and liberal clime. Let those who speak of the Republican party as radical go South and try radical Democracy awhile, and in my opinion they will soon concede the fact that they never knew before the true meaning of radicalism.

But, Mr. Speaker, a large majority of the people in the South really want peace. The difficulty is that those who were their political leaders before the war will not let them have peace. They constantly urge them through their newspapers not to forget the terrible war that they have just gone through. The man who sustains or indorses the reconstruction acts of Congress is denounced as a traitor to the South by the old leaders of secession and rebellion, who still rule in the South and counsel and advise the people if they want peace and their rights to vote the Democratic ticket; and poor deluded men in many cases follow their advice. Vanquished, defeated, and deprived of the "loaves and fishes" which they formerly enjoyed at the expense of the United States Government, and which, in a mad moment, they cast from them, the Democratic leaders of the South are actuated now by a desperation caused by their hopeless prospects in the future. They would destroy not only themselves, but, like a drowning man, carry down with them all who come within reach.

But a better day, thank God! is coming for the South. The people are beginning to open their eyes to the treacherous teachings of Ku Klux Democracy. They are going to work, and, forgetting their past troubles, they are looking forward to the happy day when the shrill whistle of the iron horse will be heard in all portions of the South; when the bloody sword of contention will have been sheathed; when the tramp of troops will have given place to the tramp of the cow-boy and the pretty milk-maid as they go singing merrily in the performance of their daily duties; when peace will reign throughout the land; when the haggard and anxious look will no longer be seen on the faces of our wives and little ones; when all nature will smile and happiness once more reign supreme throughout our dear "sunny South;" and all this as the result of the reconstruction acts of a generous and forgiving Government.

Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES MULLINS, OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 5, 1869.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MULLINS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Being in Committee of the Whole, and having the state of the Union under consideration, it brings up clearly the subject upon which I now ask to be permitted to address the House. I will speak upon a topic that nearly concerns the state of the Union. I will say in advance that I scarcely ever have written a speech preparatory to delivering it. In ninety-nine cases out of every hundred where I have spoken I have done it without even notes, as I do now. This being the case, I fear that the reporters will not be able to put my ideas together as easily as they have done for those who are accustomed to writing out their speeches. I am very sorry to require at the hands of those gentlemen, the reporters, so much labor for the little matter to be gathered from the remarks I shall make touching the subject now under consideration or that I have indicated a purpose to consider.

I ask the indulgence of the Chair and the members of the House while I submit some crude remarks of my own upon the constitutional amendment recently before us. I say my own, because I gather them not from any one man or set of men. The ideas which I intend to advance are the best deliberations of my own mind, taking into view such evidence as I could obtain. And permit me to say here that I am so constituted as to believe no man or set of men, unless what they state be founded upon evidence that my mind can grasp and I can see the reasons of that whereof they speak.

This subject brings me naturally to consider what it is that constitutes the Union of these States. All nations or governments are made up of men. Man is unquestionably created free and equal to his fellow-man, and is endowed by the great Creator with certain inalienable rights. The most prominent in the group are those of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. These three grand inalienable principles circumscribe and take in all the other rights of man. Those rights he owes to no living man or Government. He owes them to God alone. There is the source whence they spring. He cannot sell them; he cannot buy them. Man being in that condition, and originally intended for society, he enters it with those rights, each and every one of them. Those rights must be brought into partnership by all—convention or assembly—that may combine and form society. Certain of them are yielded up by consent, so that all may enjoy the residue under some certain corporate law, such as may be agreed upon. Man, I say, was originally made for society. It was not good that he should live alone.

Being, then, in this condition, being independent and free, endowed with these inalienable rights, they cannot be taken away from him by any conventional body. They are rights that no human power can legislate away. He is at liberty to draw upon them as an individual and as a member of the body-politic and of the nation whenever it becomes necessary, or to exercise them in self-defense or for the preservation of his own existence. Then how can the Government in which he may live, made up of beings thus endowed—how can any Government be formed otherwise or exist otherwise than by the force and power of the elements which compose it? Governments, then, are made up of men thus constituted. The right of the Government rests on that of the citizen, upon those rights that each and every one brings with him into the body-politic. This being the case, Government stands based upon the natural right of every individual man, a right which can to a certain extent be compromised, so that the body-corporate may exercise certain powers surrendered by the parties who united to organize it. This is done in all Governments that they may exist or be established. We come on down through the dark and feudal ages. Pass them all by, despotic as they may have been, tyrannical as they may have been. Though many empires have risen up like blazing meteors, they have been nevertheless overridden by these inalienable rights and crushed out, and other empires and dominions have sprung up at different periods of the world's history. It does appear that very few of them have been so framed as to stand more than a few years compared with the history and age and travel of this terraqueous globe in which we live. Since Governments have begun on earth they have each lived but a few weeks, months, or years, as compared with the ceaseless ages that have rolled on and will roll on until the final winding up that none of us can see.

Governments, then, have lived but a comparatively short time. Still it is presumed that every one as it comes up will be an improvement on the one that has passed away. Such has been the history of the world. Some Governments have seemed to stand the shock of centuries—even from five to six hundred of them. Yet the foundations being laid by man, fallible man, each individual endowed with all these inalienable rights, they were such that violence and intrigue, treason, rebellion, disloyalty, and other prejudicial influences have constantly operated against them. They have crumbled away and gone to wreck and for centuries past have been but a hissing mass of ruins. We might suppose that this would be a lesson to succeeding governments, and would point out the stumbling-blocks in their path, the breakers where the ship of State has so often stranded, but it seems not in every case to have proved effectual. These ruins are the finger-boards standing along the track of time traveled by the nations and Governments to warn us of where they went to wreck.

Then passing over the earlier periods of time, we come down to the establishment of our own Government. We see what powers and what rights it has, recognizing the principle that man who founds and establishes the Government possesses rights of self-preservation and self-defense of which no Government or body of men can deprive him. That is one of the strongest powers that belongs to the individual man, and it partakes of and makes up the vital principle of every Government and body-politic into which he enters. This being the case, as I clearly believe and am well satisfied, we find ourselves at the threshold of the Republic, the setting up and putting in operation of our unrivaled Government.

We revolted against the Crown of Great Britain, that Government mighty, gigantic, and with a machinery that has stood the tear and the wear and the rack of many centuries; which stands as a pillar amid the storms and desolation of other Governments, as an eternal pyramid amid the waste of many generations and peoples, and amid the waste of empires and dominions that since the dawn of her day have come up and gone down to be remembered no more. Yet we saw fit, a few colonies away here in the western world, to rebel against that Government and throw off her deadly yoke. The people of this nation saw fit to set up for themselves and to declare, "Here are our inalienable rights, the rights of all peoples to set up a government, and when they find it so oppressive that they cannot bear it to set up another." Then what did they do? Standing upon the foreground, in gold, floating upon their banners in living letters of light was the fundamental principle that I have declared to have been the constituent element in their great work, the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This flaming banner they threw to the wind; they unfurled from their staff toward heaven an ensign proclaiming to all nations, kingdoms, empires, tongues, and dominions that in these colonies man will no longer tolerate princes, nabobs, and tyrants to reign over them, proclaiming this immutable principle, the germ and the root and the chief corner-stone upon which the whole fabric rests, the inalienable right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

With that ensign unfurled to the gaze of mankind we met the strongest Power of the civilized world, not only on the land but on the sea—the Power that had made all other nations almost lick the dust before her, whose commerce whitened every sea. With this ensign of nationality, with this immutable principle emblazoned on our banners, we conquered and made the British lion crouch in the dust. And yet, after having, through a seven years' struggle of fire and blood, conquered the strongest Power on earth under this grand ensign of inalienable rights, this immutable principle, what do we find still lurking in our Government? Those fathers of ours that had followed this ensign, this great ark of the covenant intended for the people of the United States—that had followed it and had borne it through the conflict—what did they do after they had carried it through so triumphantly? They did as many, ay, hundreds of other human beings have done and I fear will do for all coming time, through the principle of fallen nature which impels men to yield more to and for their own selves and their own firesides than they will yield to the strongest power on earth. They compromised this principle of universal right, this God-given endowment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Of these three cardinal franchises they yielded one—that of underived, imprescriptible liberty, and thus compromised with themselves. They placed in the organic law, known as the Constitution of the United States, the declaration that they had compromised this immutable principle for which they had resisted the British Government and made known to world as their ensign.

Thus they compromised with themselves by guarantying the system of slavery, of the absolute bondage of one of the races on the continent of America known as the negro, at that time about one seventh part of the inhabitants of the United States. We kept them in slavery, and yet declared that we had a republican Government—a Republic with one seventh part of the inhabitants held as slaves.

With this system ingrafted upon the Government we have run on for eighty years and more with the most unparalleled progress that any Government, perhaps, has ever made since governments began, our populations outstripping all others and our wealth increasing more rapidly than all others. And this principle of political liberty was coupled with another grand principle that I must not lose sight of—that God in his mercy saw fit to bless us with the light of revelation of the revealed word as a school book—a well of Christian civilization and the exemplar of Christian government; and it has always been to me a matter of astonishment as well as of sorrow that there was not incorporated as a fundamental maxim in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States the acknowledgment that governments are ordained and upheld by God through the instrumentality of an enlightened and Christian people. But this fundamental maxim, unfortunately, was omitted in the formation of our Government; no such declaration is to be found on the pages of our Constitution.

Now, sir, when our Government has been established in the manner I have already described does it lose any of the rights that belonged originally to its members? In discussing this point I shall use illustrations which I think will be appreciated by both mechanics and farmers. I ask, is this Government destitute as a nation of any of the rights, any of the powers, any of the attributes which were possessed by the individuals who contributed to its formation? I hold that it is not. I know it is argued by lawyers and declared by jurists upon the bench that legal rights may after a certain lapse of time be lost by statutes of limitation. But, sir, the great right of self-defense, the right of a man to resist all invasions upon his property, his liberty, or his life, is one of the fundamental and inalienable rights derived from God himself and which can never be forfeited. If, then, each individual who makes a constituent part of this great nation possesses this right of self-protection and self-preservation, does not the same right inhere in the Government itself? I say that the Government has it in tenfold magnitude and strength.

Why, sir, man, must die; the term of his life is brief; it is calculated that the average period known as a generation of men is thirty-three years. But who can measure the lifetime of Governments? Who can determine the number of their years? What dial can announce the hour when the last sands in the life of Government shall run out? To do this is beyond the power of man. Such being the age of Government as compared with the brief term of man's existence, does not Government, which consists of a mass of individuals, one generation succeeding another, possess in a still higher degree and with greater majesty and power than the individual man the right of self-defense and self-preservation?

Let me, for the sake of illustration, put a question to the mechanic or the farmer. Does not the house which you build or in which you live need sometimes to be repaired? What is there made by mortal hands that can stand the destruction of time, which makes its impress upon the solid rocks and melts away the limestone bones of old earth? It is nonsense, sir, to say that any work of human hands can be so perfect as never to need repairs. Why, sir, our bodies, the handiwork of a greater being than man, sometimes become sick; and when they do, we send for a physician and are willing to take the most nauseating medicines to restore us to health. It is not only our right, but our duty to do this—a duty we owe to ourselves, our wives, and our children—a duty we owe to God, who gives us our lives that we may properly care for them and wisely use them. It has been said, "What will a man give in exchange for his life?" And if the life of an individual is so precious, how many times more precious is the life of a Government upon which depends the welfare of untold millions?

The question then recurs, can a Government like ours be repaired, and if need be remodeled, for the benefit of its citizens, who are multiplying every day? We have in our time a set of politicians who tell us that we must not dare to make any change in our fundamental Constitution, which recognized a part of the people as held in slavery. Sir, when we threw off the British yoke and adopted the ensign of nationality, we declared that all men are created free and equal, and entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Yet within a few years afterward we made a compromise with wrong, and thereby sinned against the God of the universe, by whose kindness victory had perched upon our banners. The consequences of our iniquity have been felt in tears and lamentations for more than eighty years. Our sin, like the blood of Abel, has cried to the very heavens. And at last, within our own day, we see man armed with the avenging sword of God's majesty and wrath. The Government rocks amid the conflict and staggers like a drunken man. Empires and dominions are astonished at the revolution going on in the United States; a pall of darkness hangs over the horizon; the sun rises and sets in blood; the red horse and his rider have rushed heedlessly into the battle; the saber of horrid civil conflict is drawn; thunder shakes the foundations of earthly potentates and Powers; men madly rush to the slaughter of their fellow-men. Why is all this? It is because of the lying promise which was held out in our original frame of government that all men were born free and equal and entitled to the alienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, when at the same time one seventh of our inhabitants were held in slavery. Well might the earth tremble, well might the red horse and his rider rush heedlessly into the battle, well might the air be filled with bursting bombs, the sulphurous smell of powder, and all the wrack and fury of war, for out of the fiery ordeal millions of our people were to come cleansed from slavery and clothed with the rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If we had obeyed God's word, and let the bondmen go free, there would have been no war; but we did not do so, and war was the payment we had to make for our sins.

Why do we not live in the houses in which our fathers lived? Farmers and mechanics will understand my argument. Logs that were put in and deemed all right have turned out to be rotten and to have decayed. We must cut the rotten timbers away and supply their place with good wood. To do this in time will save us from seeing the whole structure come tumbling down about us and being compelled to erect a new one out and out.

Now, when the white-winged angel of peace hovers over the land, a returning sense of duty must bring us to look out what legislative action it is necessary for us to take. This house built by our fathers with bad logs must be repaired, and repaired from the foundation-stone. We have saved the life of the Constitution by cutting out the diseased parts. The disease removed, the body-politic has grown in strength and health and vigor.

If we find anything evil is there anything wrong in correcting it? Of course not. Men who sit upon judicial benches argue that we must go back from two to five hundred years to discover whether the things we propose were then recognized as right, and if they were not, they then gravely tell us that we have no power to do them. God deliver us from such musty and rusty old men who deny the right of everything unless you discover the authority for it in some old black-letter law. God deliver us from such men; they are an incubus upon the advancing civilization of the age. I argue these matters as one of the people who has come up from among them and who understands them. What we all feel to be right and just we ought to apply in our principles of government. I do not want to go back to the flood to learn what my present duties are. The science of government has advanced as men have advanced from childhood to old age. Fifty or seventy years ago all those about me were in their infancy. Not long before the Colonies had won their independence after a long and fierce struggle. The infant garments that suited us then will not answer our purposes now. We must have other food and raiment. As a people we are not what we were. From three millions we have grown to have a population of forty millions. The machinery of government that may have worked smoothly then will not work so smoothly now. Now, sir, is the accepted time. We must put our house in order. It is dilapidated and decayed, and we must put it in repair. You owe it not only to yourselves, but to your families. You ought to put your house in order because you do not know how soon it may be your time to be called. Do your duty therefore to your country, and do it at once. Let us make this a country which shall be glorious not only for the political liberty it grants, but for that liberty and goodness which cometh down from above. Let us so act that the light of heaven shall shine before us in the path that we travel as a Christian people, loving and fearing God and loving and caring for our fellow-men. We want new garments, those of eighty years ago being too small; we want a new house, for the old one has fallen into decay; we want to repair and invigorate our constitution of government to meet the demands of the times. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." That which we ought to do that let us do. There is no fear but we shall have the favor of the people for the accomplishment of so grand a work as putting our Government upon a true and solid basis.

I hope we have paid this debt that we incurred when we established our Constitution by betraying the banner under which we fought with that motto of our nationality upon it—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and this brings me down to the present. I run right briskly over all the period of the war and come immediately to the subject that was under discussion here in this House but a few days ago and now pending in the other end of the Capitol, the right and power of the people at this day and time to amend the Constitution. We find the Constitution badly in need of repair, and needing it, have we not a right to repair it? Sir, if we had not done it we would have been unworthy of the trust committed to our hands.

And while upon this subject it strikes me that some writer—I care not who—tells us there is a tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune; and I will add, to happiness and everything that is good. Now, sir, do I see a tide of that sort in the onward moving of this Government? I think I do. I think I see it as plain as Belshazzar saw the hand-writing on the wall, and I see it in a like figure, saying, "Seize the golden moment and improve it; this day is your opportunity." Let it be improved while we have it. The water is now troubled; step in. After having paid this debt of blood in this rebellion, and made this repair to our great national, fundamental Constitution that completes the foundation on which is erected the mighty building of our national Government, I regret to say that gentlemen here in this House, belonging to a party calling itself Democratic, have argued that we have no right to change our Constitution, no right to repair this building. And among the reasons that they give is this: that it is an invasion of State rights.

Now, sir, that the States originally held these rights I do not dispute. But it was in their colonial capacity. Then each State was a sovereign. But still we find even at that period of our history they depended more or less upon one another, and after a brief trial they found that that form of confederacy could not exist; it had no power or virtue within itself to execute its own decrees, no executive or administrative officer that could carry them out. So, finding that they could not exist in that way, the Colonies, in order to secure a more perfect form of government, established our present Constitution. There they surrendered certain of their rights to form a nation, and when they formed it the question arose, had the States the supreme power or had the nation the supreme power? If, according to the argument of the Democratic party, the States possessed the right to regulate the elective franchise, which is the great lever-power of the national Government in the political sense, then I ask the broad question, in what way is a government created out of those independent powers of the people when they have organized themselves into a State to maintain itself? I submit that it is the quintessence of the power of the national Government to maintain itself against all opposing powers. Hence the sovereignty of the States melts before the burning fire of this great principle that a Government must be able to control itself. Otherwise its national life is at the mercy of other Powers. The powers of the people all merge into that Government. The sovereign power of the Government consists in the sovereign will of the majority of the people, making up in the aggregate the will of the Government, and when that people have spoken no other power must dare to gainsay it.

Then, you have the right as a Government to say to the States, "You cannot declare supreme authority and sovereign powers in yourselves and undertake to control the great lever-power that holds together the Government and must be brought to bear to maintain its life." It is the life-giving power, it is the voice of the great American people in their assembled capacity, expressed at the ballot-box. As well might one of the little wheels in yonder clock say, "I am independent and sovereign, and though the workman that put me in there intended me to revolve in combination with the whole, I will withdraw from the rest of the machinery." If the parts should withdraw, how are the hands on the dial plate to indicate the time of day? How is that machinery to run? It is as in Ezekiel's vision, "a wheel within a wheel." The Government being mighty, carries all the States with it in one harmonious whole along the luminous path of a Christian, political Government to grandeur and empire and dominion and happiness. Then, away with your State sovereignty.

And, sir, while gentlemen on the other side were arguing this constitutional question, for fear that they would not be distinctly understood about the sovereign capacity of the States and the different classes and color of mankind, one gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] cried out that it would be "intolerable," and would interfere with their social rights to amend the Constitution and allow equal privileges at the ballot-box and in holding office. Sir, it is astonishing that the Democratic party should be so much alarmed about their "social rights." In the name of common sense and justice and truth what need they be alarmed about? I see nothing in the world alarming. But they are dreadfully alarmed about "social rights" and "social equality." They seem at least to be dreadfully alarmed lest somebody will marry a negro or a negro will marry somebody else. For their benefit I will say that I believe this to be a false alarm. Our party—the Republican party—do not seem to be the least alarmed on that score; none in the world; neither now nor in days gone by. But I judge the Democratic party are most dreadfully alarmed and shocked about it, and I ask the reason why? I think they need have no uneasiness. The negro is a human being, as I verily believe, and as most of them admit. Some of them I know do charge him with being more of a brute than of a human being, and they doubt whether he has a soul or not. They say he belongs to the orang-outang race. Not so with me; I do not believe that. And yet they are dreadfully alarmed about intermarriage and social equality. They have less faith in their party than I have, God knows, and I will try to relieve them. I do not believe they are in half as much danger of intermarrying with the negro as they think. Our party is not the least concerned about it. They have no fear that negroes will marry their daughters, and no fear that their daughters will marry negroes, and they know they are not going to marry negroes themselves. In the next place, I would say to the Democratic party, "Give yourselves no uneasiness for another reason: the negro is a rational being; he certainly knows who his friends are; and he has known from the earliest days in the history of the country that the most inveterate enemy he ever had in the world is the Democratic party, and the negro is not going to marry his life-long enemy; he will not do it." Why should he do it? I could see some reason why the other side might want to marry negroes, but no reason why the negro should go to them to marry; and for this reason: in about forty or fifty years of Democratic administration the negroes have attained all castes, hues, and colors, from snow-white down to sooty. Thus the negro has a variety of choice; he can select among his own race any caste or color he sees fit. There is another good reason. I will ask the Democratic party if they get very badly scared on this subject, and are alarmed about this thing of social equality, to get some man that is, of all others, the best engineer and the best qualified and most capable of determining the lines between race and color with every instrument and appliance he can find upon the continent of America, or he may ransack the whole civilized world, and let them see if he can tell where in the race the white blood begins and the negro blood ends. I think he cannot do it. Then there is no reason whatever for any alarm. And I think when this day passes by the Democratic party will cease to be alarmed about it; they will cease to throw in our teeth that we are breaking up the fundamental powers and principles of the Government by allowing these classes to go to the ballot-box. If you have an evil in your country, in the name of God give the franchise to all that are legitimately entitled to have it, and they will help you to cure the evil.

Now, having passed over that, this brings me closer down to the subject upon which I will close my remarks; that is, the constitutional amendment that has passed this House, by a decided party vote. It was presented to us in several different forms. The first that I shall speak of is that brought forward and submitted to the House for its action by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] This may answer to repair this political House of ours, and to give it that scope and basis and extent of surface, with all the principles necessary for the time being—might be ample perhaps for many weeks and months and years to come. But that it will do for all coming time is more than I can possibly promise myself. The time will come when it will have to be looked into and repaired again. Human wisdom has never been able yet to attain perfection. This proposes that—

The right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States.

That proposition, brought forward by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary after a great deal of argument, running through many days, each member having a suggestion of his own, was under certain rules subjected to amendment; and among the amendments offered was one proposed by a gentleman that for legal ability and grace of oratory stands high in the estimation of the country and in my own, as much so as any other man in the House. I allude to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] He brings forward his amendment in lieu of the one offered by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. This is it:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge or deny to any male citizen of the United States of sound mind and over twenty-one years of age the equal exercise of the elective franchise at all elections in the State wherein he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding such election—

All of which is right. And then—except such of said citizens as shall hereafter engage in rebellion or insurrection, or who may have been, or shall be, duly convicted of treason or other crime of the grade of felony at common law.

These, to my mind, are the exceptional words, and they will look him in the face as a specter as he travels along his political path. This is the exception: "except such of said citizens as shall hereafter engage in rebellion or insurrection."

Sir, I put the question right now, and ask him, or any other living man who entertains any such idea as was advanced in this proposed amendment, why do you propose to punish them that engage hereafter in rebellion, and exculpate those who have already engaged in it? If you exculpate the parties who have engaged in rebellion and are absolutely guilty now—for in this case you only judge the future by the present and the past—if you exculpate those who have reddened our soil with blood, and who even now are swift to shed the innocent and loyal blood, and who have whitened the forests with the bones that cover the earth, exposed to be dragged about through the woods by the vermin and the wild dog; if you hold that these are of no weight, and these marks are not to be taken into this terrible account, why provide for the punishment of any future rebellion? And he, hailing from one of these northern States that has always cherished the principle of liberty, and has filled ten thousand graves with martyrs slain to save this blessed heritage imperiled by the assaults of these red-handed traitors, recognizes the power of the Government to punish for treason committed hereafter, but not to punish those who are now guilty.

And, sir, the sublime remarks of the gentleman, (I say "sublime," for his is one of those minds whose lightning flashes dispel the darkest clouds and illuminate with grandeur every argument; his speech runs like rivers of water; his eloquence seems to flow from inexhaustible fountains; his tongue is radiant with light, though I fear in this case the head is wrong) his sublime remarks are closed with the grand expression quoted from the words of our President-elect. "Give us this amendment" says the gentleman from Ohio, "and let us have peace."

Sir, with all due respect to the gentleman, whose legal abilities are equaled by but few, I ask upon what principle of justice or humanity do you expect to "have peace" by incorporating into the body-politic the worst enemies the country has ever had? When they are properly fitted to come in, as living, healthful elements, there is a way prepared by which they can receive the restoration of their rights. But, if, without that probation and preparation which the safety of the Government demands, these enemies are to be incorporated into the body-politic, why did you fight them for four years? Why did you not yield to their demand and let them take the "peace" they wanted in their own way? I cannot see that "peace" is to be found by readmitting these men, without question, to all the rights of citizenship? I would not deal with them in any vindictive spirit. I have never been disposed to treat with severity even my enemy when he was in my power. But while I would treat even my enemies and the enemies of my country humanely, I would not intrust my household, my wife, and my children to the guardianship of the man who has attempted to burn my dwelling and destroy my family. So, when men have deliberately undertaken to destroy the best Government that the sun ever shone upon, I would permit those men, when vanquished and in our power, to exercise only such rights as they can exercise without danger to the Government. Why, sir, the power and majesty of the Divine Being, who granted civil governments to man, and by whose ordination they exist, would be insulted by our saying that these men who have defied all governmental authority, who have steeped their hands in the blood of law-abiding citizens, shall, unpurged of their crime, be welcomed back to the political household. Shall we give such men the control of the ballot-box? Shall we make their votes the corner-stone of our political edifice? Shall we say of them, "Upon this rock will we build our church?" Sir, if such is our foundation, we build upon the sand. When the winds blow, and the floods come, our house will fall, and great will be the fall thereof.

I wish, in the next place, to say a word in regard to the amendment of another gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] more old-fashioned, it may be, than his colleague. It proposed to declare that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged, or may hereafter engage, in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and to such as shall be duly convicted of treason, felony, or other infamous crime.

I heartily approved this amendment, and preferred it to all the other propositions presented. It embodies in effect the same principle as the amendment reported from the Judiciary Committee and advocated by the chairman of that committee, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] There is, however, one important difference. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] declares that those who have engaged in rebellion may for that crime be excluded from the ballot-box by the State if it sees fit to exercise that power. On this account I preferred that amendment. Reflect for a moment upon the blood and treasure that we have expended in redeeming ourselves from the desolation with which the rebellion threatened us, and then answer whether we should not in our fundamental law brand that rebellion as a crime? I think we should engrave upon our Constitution some mark of the detestation with which the iniquity of rebellion should be visited. I preferred the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] because, if it had been adopted, it would have been a declaration that the nation looks upon the recent rebellion as a heinous offense, the enormity of which should be kept before the minds of the people in all coming time as a warning to future generations. There was the crime of our fathers, the sin of slavery, and there was the rebellion and war and slaughter and debt with which it was so signally punished. Such was the draft drawn upon us by our fathers, and the lesson of history is emblazoned in letters of living light.

However, sir, that amendment was by a close vote rejected. It was contrary to my wish and to my vote; I voted for the amendment, and was sorry to see it rejected. Then the proposition of the Judiciary Committee was passed, and so far as this House is concerned it has become a part of the foundation principles of our Government. I believe that it will pass the Senate as it has passed here. In this we have done well; we have at last carried out our vaunted boast that all men had the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It will give new life to our political organism.

One word more and I am done. An individual has the inalienable right to protect himself, but when he has taken the life of his adversary in self-defense he is estopped and can go no further. The Government being assailed can not only take the lives of those who assail her, but she is not estopped from going further; she may take indemnity for the past and security for the future. We are not estopped because we have slain or conquered our adversary; we must provide for the future that no man, whatever may be his color, shall without fault of his own be deprived of any of his inalienable rights. We must as a nation go on conquering and to conquer, lifting it still higher and higher, defying the machinations of all earthly potentates, principalities, dominions, and powers, until, under the blessing of God, it shall culminate in that millennium of political life that the light thereof shall dazzle the world with its glory.

Railroad from Washington to New York.

SPEECH OF HON. M. C. KERR,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 4 and 9, 1869.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 621) to authorize the building of a military and postal railway from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York—

Mr. KERR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I trust honorable gentlemen on this floor will hold it to be their duty, in reference to this proposition, to familiarize themselves with its very remarkable provisions. The importance of this bill does not exist in the fact alone that it proposes to authorize the location and construction of a railroad from the city of Washington to the city of New York. It does not rest upon the fact, which is assumed here, that there does exist a public necessity for that kind of railroad, but its importance rests upon other matter and upon other propositions which are involved in it. And if gentlemen will turn their attention to the provisions of the bill they will find it to embrace, for the first time in the history of the country, these very grave and important propositions: Has Congress, under the Constitution, the power to create corporations for the purpose of constructing highways in the States of the Union wherever Congress may believe such corporations and highways ought to exist? Has Congress the power, under the Constitution, to take charge of all railways in this country which have been built by the efforts of private individuals, private enterprise, and private wealth, under the regulation, power, and jurisdiction, and with the aid of the States of the Union, and to control all of those corporations and all of their property? Has Congress, under the Constitution, the right to assume the control and management of the $2,600,000,000 that are to-day invested in the different railroad enterprises in the country—a sum amounting to more than our vast public debt, and equal to one seventh part of all the values in the country? Has Congress the power, under the Constitution, to undertake to dictate how private parties or corporations shall make their contracts, not alone between themselves and the Government, but between themselves and other persons? Has Congress the right to say this corporation or that corporation in this country shall not charge over three cents per mile as fare for the carriage of passengers and six cents a ton per mile for the transportation of freight? Has Congress the right to go into any State of the Union, and by law of Congress, without consent of the State, without the cession of State jurisdiction, without cession of the right of eminent domain, which is and always was, under the Constitution and prior to the Constitution, in the States of the Union and not in Congress, has Congress the power by a bill of this kind to take from a State its jurisdiction over its citizens, over its own corporations, over its own property, over the taxation of its own property, and transfer all that jurisdiction to the courts of the Federal Government, or to courts created under its various bills? Has Congress the power by a bill of this kind to take from the judicial and ministerial tribunals of the States all right and power given them by State constitutions and laws to adjudge the value of private property sought to be taken for public uses? Has Congress the power, under the Constitution, to take private property without compensation first made or tendered?

The Constitution provides that the property of any citizen shall never be taken for public use except compensation be first made or tendered therefor; and if that cannot be determined by mutual consent, then it shall be determined under tribunals and by courts and ministerial officers created under State law. Has Congress the right to take from citizens of the States all these rights or guarantees, and say by one single sweep of the congressional pen, by one single declaration of congressional power, that no citizen of this country shall henceforth be entitled to the protection of any of the laws of his State in protecting his own property and in protecting him in the enjoyment of that property?

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the questions involved in this bill. If honorable gentlemen will take the time to examine the bill, and especially its first section, and its sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth sections, they will find these remarkable powers declared to belong to and inhere in this Federal Government under the Constitution. This Capitol is now filled with the agents and emissaries of corruption. Let there be added to the subjects of congressional control and regulation the vast interests involved in the railroad systems of the States, and in the systems of canals, for this will soon follow, and then the large interests and immense aggregations of wealth invested in all kinds of insurance, and in the network of telegraphs over the country, all which, on the arguments and theories of the friends of this bill, may be done, and then there will spring into existence a new brood of bureaus and departments to regulate, respectively, all those vast interests, and with them will come a fearful multiplication of officers and clerks, with their mighty contributions to the now almost irresistible tendency toward the consolidation of all powers in this Government; and with them also will come increasing swarms of corrupt and infamous men, to promote the dishonest, selfish, and lawless aims of all kinds of "rings," and to work up, extend, and perfect combinations to control legislation, dictate nominations by the President, make or defeat confirmations by the Senate, and render honest men powerless to protect or serve their country, to the end that wicked men, land thieves, subsidy beggars, tariff monopolists, bank monopolists, revenue swindlers, villainous contractors, operators, and speculators, may prosper, while the people mourn and bear each year increasing burdens of toil and taxation. Then these agents of corruption can command if they do not fill seats on this floor, and fill the rolls of our employés with their tools and satellites, muzzle the press of the country, fill the reporter's gallery with their corrupt defenders and apologists, prevent exposure of their schemes, and deceive the people. These alarming dangers threaten us, and in a degree not appreciated by the country or ourselves are now upon us.

Let it not be supposed this bill is to be the last, as it is the first, of its kind. It is only a pioneer, an initial enactment, with which it is hoped to break down the constitutional barriers and inaugurate the new policy. Others and worse ones will speedily follow its passage. Many of them are now on our files. Instead of breaking up monopolies this policy will erect one more stupendous in extent and power than any the world has yet seen. It will inevitably lead to combinations among a few of the great trunk lines of railways to make all the less powerful and the lateral roads of the country subsidiary to them and to pay them tribute. Let Congress assume such control over a few of the great lines, such as the Erie, the Pennsylvania Central, the Baltimore and Ohio, and a few of those of the West and South, and thereafter the railroads will rule Congress, State Legislatures, and municipal governments, and dictate laws. This policy, therefore, as deeply and vitally concerns the roads as it does the people and the States.

Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that before gentlemen should consent by their votes or their action here to award an affirmative answer to any of these assertions of power on the part of Congress they ought most gravely and seriously to consider every one of these questions in all their legal, constitutional, and national bearings upon the country, its interest, and its welfare. My friend, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. Cook,] has said to the House in that portion of his remarks delivered yesterday that Congress ought to have this power because there does exist some kind of public necessity for another railroad between here and New York city. Is that a source of power? Let me concede that all he says on that subject is true. Does that necessity give Congress a power which it did not before possess under the express language of the Constitution?

We are also told that this power may now be exercised and held to exist because during the late war it was found that between here and Baltimore and between here and New York the railroad facilities were insufficient, both for purposes of ordinary transit and for the uses of the Government. Suppose I concede that also to be true; is it not equally true that at different points all over this Union, in every State, in every county almost, the same facts exist and the same argument might be used. The same pleas for the exercise of power might be found? The experience of the Government during the war would establish the same arguments in reference to a thousand sections of our country.

Again, it is asserted by my friend that at certain times in the late years of our history it was not safe for people to pass through the city of Baltimore; that they were in danger of being beaten or otherwise injured. Let me concede that that is true, and more than true; that such wrongs were attended with circumstances of great aggravation, what follows? Do not the same facts exist in numerous other parts of this country? Why, sir, I am sorry, ay, I am ashamed, to confess here that in my own district in Indiana, in the last three months, by reason of the existence of combinations of lawless and desperate criminals, it has not only not been safe for individuals to pass through one of the towns in that district, but it has not been quite safe even for railroad trains or express cars to pass through, for they have occasionally been arrested and robbed. Shall Congress, therefore, go into my district and build another railroad there and place it under the ampler wings of the Federal Government for protection in the exercise of its rights and franchises? Shall Congress, therefore, go into the State of Indiana, anywhere, all over the country—for the like arguments will justify the assertion of that power anywhere?

The misfortune about all my friends' arguments is that they prove too much; they go too far; they are too comprehensive; they are illogical and self-destructive; they submit to no limitations upon the power of Congress; they make the mere discretion of Congress the supreme law.

It is also said to be necessary to secure the certain transmission of the mails from here to New York because the existing railroads refuse to contract at the Postmaster General's prices to carry the mails. But the same is true of numerous other roads in the country, and yet they all do in fact carry the mails and receive therefor such compensation as the Department is willing to pay. By all this the public service does not materially suffer, and Congress acquires no new power.

It is said you must not let corporations regulate prices of fares and freights, because they may become monopolies. Yet none of these original rights of persons—and corporations in law are persons—engaged in carrying on commerce upon our rivers and upon the waters of the world are denied or regulated by Congress. Congress does not attempt to interfere with the rates of fares and freights in steamboat, river, and ocean transportation. Yet they may also become monopolies, and in fact do as often and as completely as railroads. Their conduct in these matters is left by Congress where by Congress that of all others ought to be left, to the control of the greater, wiser, and more beneficent laws of supply and demand, of competition, and intelligent self-interest, the same great laws which regulate the affairs of individuals in the infinitely varied pursuits of human life.

It is intimated in this bill, and by my colleague in his argument, that the power of Congress over railroads, their business and commerce, may be limited to those lines and roads only which are not confined in their length or in their commercial connections to a single State, but over which interstate commerce is conducted. How can it be thus limited if it exist at all? On what principle? Does not every business man in the House know that the whole railroad system of the entire country is in a most important sense a unit—a single, closely-connected net-work, consisting of what are usually called great trunk roads, with hundreds of tributary and lateral roads? If you say one is exempt from congressional control because it is wholly within a State, then you have no right to interfere with any of the great trunk lines, because most of the roads which by their business connections constitute them are also wholly within certain States. If you say one is and another is not engaged in interstate commerce alone, your facts have no basis. Every road on the continent, by itself or its commercial connections by land or water, is a channel for interstate commerce. Indeed, every common highway leading from one State into another, or connecting at the borders with such highways in other States, is also a highway for interstate commerce. It follows that the theories of congressional power which can support or justify this measure absolutely admit of no limitation except the discretion of Congress.

HO. OF REPS.

Railroad from Washington to New York—Mr. Kerr.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

It is said that if Congress has no power to create a corporation to build a railroad contrary to the constitutions and laws and without the consent of the States through which it may run, it follows that the commerce of the States might thus be locked up or prevented from passing over the borders of their neighbors. To give this suggestion the character or dignity of argument you are compelled to assume that it may some time become the policy of the States to prohibit the doing of what all the people and all their interest demand shall be done, that human nature will wholly change, that self-interest will forget its office, that society will commit suicide. When these things happen we will have but little use for Congress, States, or railroads.

But we are also told that States of this Union sometimes have undertaken, by the exercise of prohibited powers, to tax either passengers or commerce which may pass over their territory in one or another kind of public conveyance, and that therefore Congress has this power and ought to exercise it. I concede again, for the sake of the argument, that this assumption is true. The States have, in a very few instances, stepped so far outside of their reserved powers in the Union as to attempt to impose this kind of burdens. The little mountain State of Nevada, not four years ago, undertook to impose a tax on every passenger carried out of the State by any railroad or stage-coach, and what was done? What is always done in a case like this? What is the remedy of the citizen, what is the remedy of the country, against any unjustified and unauthorized exercise of power like this? An appeal to the courts of the country, to the judicial tribunal whose duty it is as the tribunal of last resort to say what powers they are that the Constitution of the United States denies to the States of this Union. This was promptly done in reference to the law of Nevada, and it was annulled by the Supreme Court. (6 Wallace, 35.) In every instance, therefore, where a power of this kind has ever been attempted to be exercised by any State of this Union appeal has been made to the Supreme Court, and in every case where the power has been unconstitutionally exercised it has been so adjudged by the judicial power of the country; and the people have thus been protected, the States have thus been vindicated in their rights, the true limitations upon the powers abiding in the States or in the Federal Government have thus been prescribed and maintained, and nobody has been materially injured by the result.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution declares that—"No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

"No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

These are limitations of the power of Congress in favor of free trade and equality of commercial rights between the States.

The Constitution also declares that—

"No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any State on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress."

It is also declared that—

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage."

Now, these are all limitations upon the power of the States in favor of free trade and equal commercial privileges between the States of this Union. If any one of those constitutional provisions or prohibitions is violated by any State, does a citizen of the country lack a complete, a most adequate remedy under the Constitution and laws as they stand to-day? Why indulge in this kind of legislation? Is it necessary to protect the citizen? No, Mr. Speaker: no such necessity exists. There is nothing in the history of the country to justify any assumption of this kind. On the contrary, in every instance where this kind of violation has been attempted by any of the States, it has been promptly and most completely annulled by the Supreme Court. These provisions of the Constitution execute themselves. They need only the aid of the Federal judiciary to enforce them all over the country. They need no statute of the United States; they do not require that Congress shall undertake to extend its all-grasping hand into the States of the Union and take charge of all their local and domestic policies, and undertake to control and regulate the conduct of all their local, municipal, and internal business and commerce. The very contrary is required by every dictate of sound policy, of justice, and of statesmanship.

I ask gentlemen if there is to be no end in this country to the disposition on the part of Congress to increase its power, to swallow up one after another the jurisdictions and powers that have hitherto throughout our entire national history been exercised by the States of this Union? Is nothing to be left to the control and regulation of the citizens themselves? Is nothing to be left to the law—the common, God-created, self-executing law of intelligent self-interest, the law of original personal liberty, which makes it the right, the inherent, undelegated right, of every citizen to regulate all of his private affairs, all matters of private contract connected with his business? Are all of these to be invaded, and all the people, and all their material interests to be taken under the guardianship of this central Government?

Mr. Speaker, when I last had the attention of the House on this bill I replied to most of the positions of my colleague on the committee which were of a general character, and I now beg the ear of the House to some discussion of his propositions based upon different provisions in the Constitution.

First, then, I will inquire concerning the power of Congress to create corporations. No such power is expressly granted. It is not claimed by any intelligent public man to have been so granted. The history of the Constitution shows that a proposition to confer upon Congress, by appropriate words, such power was rejected by a very large majority in the constitutional convention. (See Elliot's Debates, vol. 5, page 543.)

Alexander Hamilton, in his great argument in 1791, on the right of Congress to charter the United States Bank, conceded the entire absence of any express or substantive grant of such power in the Constitution; but he claimed that the right existed as an incident to other powers which were expressly granted, and that it could only be rightfully exercised in those cases in which such a corporation was a necessary and proper means or instrument for the execution of such expressly granted power. As Congress was expressly empowered to levy and collect large revenues and borrow money for the uses of the Government, he insisted that it might create a great financial corporation as a necessary and proper instrument to aid in the administration of its finances.

In the great case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, (4 Wheaton, p. 411,) which involved the question of the validity of the charter of that bank, Chief Justice Marshall, in 1819, speaking of the alleged power of Congress to create corporations, said:

"The power of creating a corporation is never used for its own sake, but for the purpose of effecting something else. No sufficient reason is therefore perceived why it may not pass as incidental to those powers which are expressly given if it be a direct mode of executing them."

In 1824 the same great jurist, in the case of Osborn vs. United States Bank, (9 Wheaton, p. 860,) speaking of the alleged power of Congress to create corporations generally, said:

"It has never been supposed that Congress could create such corporations. The whole opinion of the court in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland is founded on and sustained by the idea that the bank is an instrument which is necessary and proper for carrying into effect the powers vested in the Government of the United States."

In perfect harmony with these judicial decisions are the opinions of every other enlightened jurist or statesman in our country's history, except many of the early fathers, who earnestly insisted that these interpretations gave too much power to the Federal Government and exceeded the limits of safety and sound construction. In my judgment, they go to the verge of reasonable and just construction, and ought never to be extended further.

What is to be the test of the existence of implied power to do anything? Is it the will of Congress only? Or must the thing to be done possess certain characteristics which establish its rightfulness? On this point, too, Chief Justice Marshall has laid down a clear and safe rule. He says:

"Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the Constitution; and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." (McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 421.)

Apply this test to the assumptions of power contained in this bill, and who can answer that such corporations, with such powers and franchises, possess the elements required? But I will make this more apparent as I proceed. I conclude, therefore, that Congress has no power to create any corporations, except such only as are necessary and proper, and possess the characteristics prescribed by Mr. Marshall, or constitute a direct mode for the execution of some expressly granted power. Such cases are fortunately very few. The domain of congressional power does not extend to or require the creation of private corporations or monopolies to be controlled by the Federal Government and destroy the rightful jurisdiction and vitality of the States.

Then where does Congress obtain the right to enter a State and tamper with her corporations, and entice them by the promise of privileges and franchises denied them by the State on grounds of domestic policy, or drive them by the threat of a diminution of those privileges and franchises to desert their allegiance and repudiate their obligation to the State and seek protection under the ampler wing of the Federal Government. To justify the exercise of such great and dangerous powers within the States and in defiance of their constitutions and laws those who assert their existence ought to be able to point to some clear and explicit grant of them in the Constitution. This cannot be done. They are driven to seek refuge in construction, in implication, which is itself always dangerous, and ought to be vigilantly guarded against by the legislator. I do not mean to assert that implied powers do not exist, or that they are not sometimes highly beneficial, but rather that they should never be appealed to or exercised except in aid of some expressly granted power.

I now proceed to consider some of the results of such measures, which will be found to be more intolerable than the assumption of the power itself. The laws of Congress, constitutionally enacted, become the supreme law of the land. When Congress rightfully creates a corporation, or, what is the same thing in principle, confers new privileges and franchises on State corporations to be exercised under Federal authority and protection, such laws necessarily override all State legislation, and such corporations become means or instruments of the Federal Government in the execution of some of its expressly granted powers. Such corporations, with all their property, are thus by the greedy hand of Federal power snatched from the rightful control of the States and subjected to the exclusive management of the former. If the States are thereafter allowed to exercise any control whatever over them for taxation of their property or otherwise, it can only be done by gracious permission of the central Government. The corporation called the United States Bank was such an instrument, and the Supreme Court have repeatedly announced these principles in connection with it, and have expressly held it beyond the power of the States to tax it or its property. The language of that tribunal, from the pen of Chief Justice Marshall, presents these propositions in a most forcible and unmistakable manner. We will quote a few paragraphs:

"It is of the very essence of supremacy to remove all obstacles to its action within its own sphere, and so to modify every power vested in subordinate governments as to exempt its own operations from their own influence. This effect need not be stated in terms. It is so involved in the declaration of supremacy, so necessarily implied in it that the expression of it could not make it more certain."

"All subjects over which the sovereign power of a State extends are objects of taxation; but those over which it does not extend are upon the soundest principles exempt from taxation. This proposition may almost be pronounced self-evident." "The sovereignty of a State extends to everything which exists by its own authority or is introduced by its permission; but does it extend to those means which are employed by Congress to carry into execution powers conferred on that body by the people of the United States? We think it demonstrable that it does not." "We find, then, on just theory, a total failure of this original right to tax the means employed by the Government of the Union for the execution of its powers. The right never existed, and the question whether it has been surrendered cannot arise." McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, 4 Wh. aton. 427.

The same doctrines are reaffirmed by the same court in the subsequent case of Osborn vs. United States Bank, (9 Wheaton, 235,) and in many other cases. They all rest upon the theory that these corporations, thus created or endowed by the Federal Government, become instruments, as it were, in the hands of that Government, and that to suffer them to be taxed at all by the States would be equivalent to allowing them to tax the machinery of the Government itself, and that if the States had the power of such taxation they might abuse it, might tax such instruments out of existence. Hence the denial of the power.

In other words, Congress having no power to create such corporations except in cases where they are a proper and necessary instrument for the execution of some granted power, when they are created they at once become totally exempt from all control, save that of the creating power; and to admit that they were subject to any other control in the important matter of taxation would be to endanger their very existence. Because if the States could tax them at all without the consent of the General Government they could tax them as much or as little as they please, and they might please to impose such burdens upon them as would wholly defeat their objects. The States might then discriminate against them and in favor of their own corporations, and thus drive them out of existence. It was upon such reasoning and arguments the Supreme Court held thirty years ago, and has ever since held, that such corporations, like the bonds of the Federal Government, are entirely exempt from State and municipal taxation.

Now, apply these principles to Federal railroad, canal, telegraph, and other corporations. If the power to create them exists, the power to control them follows. Then what becomes of the sacred and boasted rights of the States to control their internal affairs and commerce, to raise revenue to pay the expenses of their government by taxation of all the property of their citizens, whether individual or corporate? They have wasted away under the absorbing power of the central government. Their judicial tribunals are stripped of half their jurisdiction. The great aggregations of wealth in the States, brought into existence by their efforts, and often in part by their means, are added to the great central power to augment its patronage and all-pervading influence and endanger the liberties of the people and destroy our glorious system of government. If Congress can enact such laws as the one to which I have particularly referred it can, by parity of reason and under the same authority, enact laws and charters which will give it absolute and sovereign control over all our great works of internal improvement. It can thus acquire, in like manner, the like control over a large portion of the territory of the States without their consent.

Recognizing these important legal results touching the taxability of such property, my colleague has proposed an amendment to his original bill, in section twelve, declaring that:

"The property and franchises of said corporation shall be subject to national, State, and municipal taxation to the same extent and in like manner as other like property or franchises in the same State or district."

This declaration is a significant admission of the truth of my argument on this point. Is it necessary and proper, under the pretense of regulating commerce, to incur such vital results? Does the legitimate regulation of commerce involve them? Certainly it does not. The constitutional regulation of ocean and river commerce never involved them. On the contrary, it was never attempted by such regulation to divest the State of its general jurisdiction, both for taxation and police, over either the instruments or the persons engaged in such commerce. In other words, it was never pretended by courts or statesmen that such commerce could or ever did become a necessary and proper instrumentality for the execution of any expressly granted powers in the Constitution. A mere power of regulation confers no absolute or exclusive jurisdiction over the things or persons to be regulated.

Does the Constitution, in any express provisions, afford a shadow of authority for such enactments? It says, in section eight of article one, that Congress shall have power—

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of the Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

It appears, therefore, that it is the intention of the Constitution that the United States shall acquire no title to or jurisdiction over any portion of the soil of a State without the consent of the Legislature thereof. And this has been the practice of the Government ever since its organization. It has never attempted, in a single instance, to do otherwise, except during the late war, when its acts in this particular were dictated by an overruling necessity which can supply no precedent for times of peace. Whenever the United States has desired to occupy any part of the soil of a State for court-houses, navy-yards, or other national purposes, it has first procured the consent of the State by a solemn act of State legislation expressly assenting to the purchase and ceding jurisdiction to the United States over the desired territory. When it was thought desirable to construct a highway to connect the waters of the Chesapeake and the Ohio Congress would not permit the Cumberland road to be constructed until the consent thereto of the States of Maryland, Virginia, and Ohio was expressly granted. James Monroe, in his great constitutional argument which accompanied his veto of the Cumberland road bill in 1822, held that Congress has exclusive control over the revenues of the Government and may appropriate them to aid in the construction of internal improvements, but has no power itself to construct any such improvements, because to do that involved the exercise of territorial jurisdiction which belongs to the State alone. There is nothing better settled in American law than that the right of eminent domain is in the States. The right to control the territory within the several States belongs to the States alone.

It is true that the United States may become a purchaser of real estate within a State where it can do so by mutual agreement between itself and the owner. But it thereby acquires no jurisdiction and holds title only as any private citizen would, subject to the laws of the State. When the United States desires to acquire titles without the consent of the individual owners and by legal proceedings to divest the latter's title, in every instance in the history of the Government it has sought the consent of the State, and has procured State legislation prescribing a mode of acquisition, or expropriation. For examples of such legislation see 7 Opinions of Attorneys General, page 578; 8 Ibid., page 30; Act of Maryland of May 3, 1853; Act of South Carolina of 1854; Act of New York of March 18, 1808, and November 12, 1816.

It has been adjudged that mere ownership and occupancy by the United States of land within a State do not oust the jurisdiction of the State, even where such occupancy is with the full knowledge and tacit consent of such State. To do that the purchase must be "with the consent of the State Legislature." The fact that the United States holds land by a title or reservation anterior to the existence of the State does not give jurisdiction to the United States without the consent of the State or cession of jurisdiction. (17 Johnson, 225; 2 Mason, 60; 7 Opin. Att'ys. Gen. 578.) Congress would not purchase real estate in Maryland on which to erect an aqueduct to supply the city of Washington with water without the previous assent of that State and the enactment of a law by its Legislature prescribing a mode of acquiring title where mutual contracts could not be made. (Act of Maryland of May 3, 1853.) Indeed, all these questions have been considered so conclusively settled ever since the organization of the Government, that in 1841 Congress declared by a law, which still remains in full force, that thereafter no public money should be expended for any site or land for any public works until the consent of the Legislature of the State is given to the purchase, and that it should be the duty of the heads of Departments under whose supervision any public works are directed by Congress to be made first to obtain from the State cession of jurisdiction over such site or land. (5 United States Statutes-at-Large, 468.)

But we are told that Congress can create corporations to build great highways wherever it pleases, and can take charge of those already created by the States, and under one pretext or another divest the States of their original and unquestionable control over the same, and of their right to tax them, or to regulate the manner in which they shall enjoy their franchises, or carry on their business, or answer for their wrongful acts toward their citizens. This kind of legislation will inevitably rob the States and the people of their most precious and invaluable inheritance—the right of local self-government. No evil ruler on earth could devise a more appropriate or cunning plan for the attainment of such a result.

A brief contemplation of the extent, wonderful growth, and vast expense of the railroads alone may afford some aid in an attempt to appreciate the infinite dangers which would result from committing them to the control of the central Government. In the first half of the year 1830 there were no steam railways in our country. In 1840 only twenty-one hundred and sixty-seven miles existed. Now over forty thousand miles are in complete operation, at a cost in construction of about two billion six hundred million dollars. In addition to this completed extent there are, by estimate, about fourteen thousand miles in process of construction. The commerce and trade which are more or less facilitated by this extraordinary net-work of railroads, and the great multitude of persons who thus find compensatory employment, render our system of railroads a hand-maid to every other pursuit known to our people. It pervades, influences, and promotes the welfare of every section, farm, and workshop in the Republic. It has attained its present magnificent proportions with no guide but the unparalleled enterprise and intelligent self-interest of the people. It has had in the main no protection except from the States, and no aid except from individual wealth, with occasional Government subsidies. It has multiplied the taxable values of the country many times. It contributes immense sums to the revenues of the State and Federal Governments. It is managed with greater skill, economy, and success than under Federal superintendence it could ever attain. The local governments of the States can afford such legal direction, regulation, and control as it demands with greater wisdom and better results than any other Government on earth. If such vast interests and investments were committed to the control of the Federal Government they could not fail to accelerate the growth of corruption in connection with Federal legislation and hasten the development of centralism, the greatest danger that now threatens our country.

It is claimed that additional railroad facilities are demanded by travel and traffic between here and the city of New York. This is an assertion unsustained by any facts presented to the House. I entered upon this investigation with the impression that it had some foundation. But a most careful and exact inquiry from reliable and official reports convinces me that it is utterly baseless. I earnestly desire the attention of the House to some facts elicited by my examination. They are most significant and material to the formation of any just conclusion.

The whole capital to build and equip this projected line from Washington to New York, fixed by this bill, is $10,000,000! More than that sum was spent in the last six years alone by the present route in mere improvements to perfect it. There are expenditures now being incurred additional of nearly three million dollars to establish new terminal facilities, avoid the use of horses in Baltimore, and build entirely new passenger equipment. The estimated capital of the present companies now composing the line between New York and Washington is $36,000,000. The capacity of the present line, with complete double track now finished, is almost unlimited. The public much overestimate the travel and revenue of the roads between New York and Washington. While the gross revenues of the companies in the entire line exceed ten millions per annum, the whole receipts for through travel between New York and Washington do not reach one million per annum during the years since the war. There are three through trains a day between New York and Washington provided and regularly run, with a capacity and accommodation for twelve hundred passengers in both directions, while the actual number carried in the past twelve months averages but two hundred and seventy-nine daily! The gross number of passengers carried between New York and Washington in both directions in the past twelve months is only one hundred and two thousand, which paid to the line a gross revenue of only $846,000.

The relatively heavy local and way business constitutes the chief source of revenue arising from the numerous populous towns and cities along the route. For instance, for every passenger that leaves New York for Washington fully thirty six others start for Philadelphia or intermediate points, and while there are but three trains a day leaving Washington with New York passengers with an average of one hundred and thirty-nine and a half passengers, or forty-six and a half to a train, there are nine trains a day leaving Washington for Baltimore, and only one thirty-sixth of the business between New York and New Brunswick is for Washington, or one hundred and two thousand passengers in both directions, against three million six hundred and fifty-six thousand nine hundred and seventy-eight passengers arriving and departing at New York.

It is not the profit made upon the New York and Washington travel, therefore, which causes the present line to oppose the chartering of another route by Congress, but it is the tendency of such action by Congress to lessen all railroad values and make uncertain the tenure and effect of this vast property.

In the United States there are about forty-two thousand miles of completed railroad in operation, which, with some sixteen thousand miles more in progress and contemplation, have enlisted a capital of fully $3,000,000,000, or $400,000,000 more than our whole national debt. It is this vast interest that will be struck and invalidated by the opening of the door in chartering a single road by Congress.

There is no necessity for additional freight facilities between here and New York, because the intervening water transportation is cheaper, is always abundant, and is chiefly used.

The completed English railways now amount to about fourteen thousand miles, and have cost on the average, per mile, about two hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars, while American roads have only cost an average of about fifty-two thousand dollars per mile. It is obvious, therefore, that with the continental extent of our country, our less aggregate wealth, and insufficient available capital for such investments, it would be impossible for us to build and equip railroads in such completeness as is done in England. Indeed, in view of our different national conditions and circumstances, our system of railroads is one of the most wonderful achievements recorded in the history of civilization.

I invite attention in this connection to the decision of Justice McLean in the United States vs. The Railroad Bridge Company, (6 McLean's R., p. 517.) The right of eminent domain in the State is held by Judge McLean to extend to public lands of which the title is still in the United States, so far as to enable the State to authorize the acquisition of easements over it in the construction of common highways, or railroads and canals. He says:

"This power is exercised by a State, subject to no power vested in the Federal Government. The proprietary right of the United States can in no respect restrict or modify this exercise of the sovereign power by a State. It is essential to the welfare of the citizens of the States that this power should be exercised. So far as easements by establishing public roads are concerned within a State by its Legislature the jurisdiction is exclusive."

And I cannot forego the duty of further citing the pith and substance of the opinion of the Supreme Court in the celebrated case of Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, the Alabama case, (3 Howard, p. 224.) It is very strongly in point, and covers the great question of State rights over its own territory in such matters. The court say:

"When Alabama was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States she succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction, and eminent domain which Georgia possessed at the date of the cession, except so far as this right was diminished by the public lands remaining in the possession and under the control of the United States for temporary purposes provided for in the deed of cession and the legislative acts connected with it. Nothing remained to the United States, according to the terms of the agreement, but the public lands. And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State or elsewhere except in the cases in which it is expressly granted."

The Federal Government has no right to acquire any territory or jurisdiction in a State except for purposes authorized in the Constitution, and then it must be obtained with the express consent of the State, not taken, appropriated by force, or conquered from the State.

It is urged by my colleague [Mr. Cook] that if Congress has not the constitutional right to go into States and exercise these great powers, then no consent of the States can confer such right. I agree that the States cannot confer new or original powers on Congress except by constitutional amendments; but it by no means follows that the States may not cede either territory or jurisdiction to the Federal Government to such extent and for such purposes as are proper or necessary to enable the latter to execute its granted powers. The right to do these things is expressly recognized by the seventeenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution; and the uniform practice of the Government ever since its organization should be held now to have forever settled its true construction on this point. It is believed that every acquisition by the Federal Government heretofore of territory or jurisdiction in a State has been made with the express assent of the State.

The Constitution of the United States declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. The constitutions of most of the States declare that private property shall not be taken for public use, or quasi public use, as for railroads, without just compensation first made or tendered. But these most valuable guarantees seem to interpose no obstacles to the power of Congress. It has been decided that the payment must be made or securely provided for as a condition precedent to the appropriation of the property. (Bonaparte vs. Camden Railroad Company, 1 Baldw. R., 205, 218.) This bill is so framed as to require no respect whatever to be given by the companies to the safeguards provided by the people of the States for the property of their citizens.

In this bill, for example, the company is authorized "immediately to enter upon, take possession of, and use all such real estate and property as may be necessary for the construction, maintenance, and operation of said railway and the accommodations requisite and appertaining thereto." But the company is kindly required afterward to purchase such property "at a price to be mutually agreed upon." "And, in case of a disagreement as to price, and before the final completion of said railway and its appurtenances, the said corporation, or the owner or owners of such real estate or property, shall apply, by petition, to the justice or justices of the Supreme, circuit, district or court of the United States having jurisdiction in the State or locality in which said real estate or other property may be situated, particularly describing the same;" and said justice is then required to conduct or direct various expensive and cumbersome proceedings, which are expected to result in the transfer of title from the individual owner to the company. Thus the citizen is compelled to seek his remedy, not in the courts of his own State, where his rights may be adjudicated in tribunals of his own choice, but in some remote Federal court, where its vindication may cost more than his relief is worth.

It is claimed by the friends of these measures that Congress obtains the requisite power to enact them as an incident to the express power "to establish post offices and post roads," and to regulate commerce "among the several States."

If it can ever be said in this country that the interpretation of a constitutional provision is settled, then it may now be said of the power to establish post roads. It has been the uniform practice of the Government to carry its mails over the highways of the States, to make them "post roads" to the extent of their common use by its mail carriers, but never to open up and construct great highways for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of the mails. Mails never precede, but always follow, the opening up of a country and of its highways, and if they are rude and imperfect at first, the demands of the people are relatively few and simple. As society advances, and population and intercourse increase, improvements in the facility and manner of transportation keep pace with them. Hence, the General Government has hitherto come after, and not gone before these improvements in the extension of its mails. Shall it change this policy now, when the country is everywhere covered with a net-work of highways and railroads, and the people and States are everywhere inviting it to make them "post roads?" Shall it now enter into the business of constructing railroads and canals in order to provide ways over which to carry its mails? Is it necessary for it to usurp the control of the railroads and highways, established and constructed under the auspices of the States, in order to protect its postal service? These railroads and many other highways are private property.

It was thought necessary by the framers of our Constitution to insert an express provision to enable the United States to exercise absolute jurisdiction over ten miles square for a seat of Government, and over such places as should be ceded by the States for forts, arsenals, and other purposes. It would seem incredible that such solicitude should have existed about such inconsiderable spots, and yet that those great men should have been willing to confer the power to construct all kinds of highways throughout the country, with the consequent right to take great portions of the soil of the States and exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the same. There does not now, and never did, and never can, exist a shadow of necessity or rational pretext for the inauguration of such a system. If inaugurated it could not fail, sooner or later, to prove fatal to the well-being of both Governments. But even if I concede the existence of power with the consent of the State through which it runs to build a highway for a "post road," which I cannot do, yet it does not follow that Congress may create great corporations, with millions of capital, to erect all kinds of highways in the States for private gain, to be subject to the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the United States. It requires a most liberal charity not to believe that private gain, and not the interests of the postal service, is the inspiring motive in these measures. The power asserted in this series of bills to do these things is wholly unparalleled in the history of our Government. Why are they attempted now? Is it not done to subordinate the States more completely to the powers in this Capitol?

Does the power to regulate commerce "among the several States" authorize this kind of legislation? It is claimed that it does. This power has been the subject of frequent and elaborate discussion in the courts of the country, and it has received judicial interpretation in many cases. If the word commerce in this provision is to receive its largest and most comprehensive signification, then, indeed, the argument is with the friends of these measures, because thus defined it embraces nearly all the transactions and intercourse between human beings in society. But this definition has never been claimed or approved by any court or intelligent citizen. It has always been held to refer only to those public and business transactions and relations which affect the citizens of different States in their intercourse with each other. Many of the laws of a State may affect commerce in a greater or less degree and yet not be in conflict with the power of Congress.

Commerce is traffic in intercourse, not railroads, telegraphs, or highways. The regulation of commerce is one thing, and the creation of means to facilitate it or call it into being is an entirely different thing. The regulation of commerce does not require the incorporation of companies with vast powers and franchises. It is to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. (9 Wheaton R., 196.) It has nothing to do with the terms upon which one person engaged in aiding commerce, traffic, or intercourse shall cooperate with another. It has still less to do with the rates of fares or freights which shall be exacted by the agents of commerce. All such matters are proper subjects of private contracts. In the very nature of things, it is impossible for Congress to regulate such interests as wisely as the State or citizens may do.

The power to regulate commerce carries with it no property, but only a grant of jurisdiction or general legislative authority over certain subjects. It may be exercised and exhausted without authorizing any structure to be erected or laid upon soil of which the United States is not the proprietor, and which belongs to a State or is the private property of its citizens within its jurisdiction. It has never been held that this power even enables Congress to authorize the taking or occupation of real estate belonging to a State or its private citizens for the purpose of erecting structures thereon to aid in commercial intercourse with foreign nations. Its utmost extent would be to regulate the use of such structures as means of commercial intercourse after they are erected and have become capable of use. But it embraces no power to take private property or the property of a State for the purpose of promoting such intercourse or commerce.

This provision giving power to regulate commerce among the States was designed to secure to the States a complete equality in commercial rights. No State has the power by her laws regulating her internal commerce, or the transaction of commercial business over her great public or corporate highways, to impose restrictions or burdens upon the citizens of one State which she does not alike impose upon those of all the States. She cannot discriminate against any State or section, but her laws and regulations must affect all alike who come within their operation, and must not violate the Constitution of the United States.

Over any place within its legislative jurisdiction a State may exercise its police or other powers or its rights of property without conflicting with the power of Congress to regulate commerce in the same place. The question in all cases is, whether the power claimed and exercised by a State produces any such conflict. (Ogden vs. Saunders, 9 Wheaton, 1; Brown vs. Maryland, 12 Wheaton, 419; Passenger Cases, 7 Howard; Cooley vs. Port Wardens of Philadelphia, 12 Howard, 299; Smith vs. Maryland, 18 Howard, 71.)

In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton, 13,) Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking of the right of a State to enforce its inspection laws, says:

"They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government—all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass."

In many other decisions by the same court substantially the same language is employed and the same doctrine held. There is believed to be no opinion in the entire range of State and Federal decisions which is inconsistent with the one expressed by Judge Marshall, and not one of the great statesmen of our country has ever put on record a contrary opinion. In that great argument submitted by Mr. Hamilton to President Washington, already referred to, he, the great leader of the latitudinarian school of statesmen, denied to the General Government all authority to make any work of internal improvement requiring the appropriation by it of any part of the soil or territory of the States without their consent. Thomas Jefferson, another of the great sages of the Republic, seems to have been sadly behind the learning of this age. He, too, always denied the existence of any such power, and in a message to Congress recommended the proposal of a constitutional amendment for the adoption of the States, expressly granting it. Mr. Madison, too, unsurpassed in wisdom and practical statesmanship, and the zealous friend of railroads, canals, and other improvements, was equally confident that this power did not exist, and could not be exercised without the aid of an amendment. Albert Gallatin, scarcely inferior to any in the great qualities of the early fathers, in his masterly report to Congress in 1808, reviewing this whole subject, used the following language:

"The manner in which the public moneys may be applied to such objects remains to be considered."

It is evident that the United States cannot, under the Constitution, open any road or canal without the consent of the State through which such road or canal must pass. In order, therefore, to remove every impediment to a national plan of internal improvements, an amendment to the Constitution was suggested by the Executive [referring to Mr. Jefferson] when the subject was recommended to the consideration of Congress. Until this be obtained, the assent of the State being necessary for each improvement, the modifications under which that assent may be given will necessarily control the manner of applying the money."

Justice McLean, of whom it is not unjust to say that he was the foremost of our Federal judges of his time in the liberal construction of the powers of Congress, in his opinion in the Rock Island bridge case, (6 McLean, 524,) referring to the powers in question, said:

"Under the commercial power Congress may declare what shall constitute an obstruction or nuisance by a general regulation and provide for its abatement by indictments or information through the Attorney General; but neither under this power nor under the power to establish post roads can Congress construct a bridge over navigable water. This belongs to the local or State authority within which the work is to be done. But this authority must be so exercised as not materially to conflict with the paramount power to regulate commerce."

"If Congress can construct a bridge over a navigable water under the power to regulate commerce or to establish post roads, on the same principle it may make turnpikes or railroads throughout the country. The latter power has generally been considered as exhausted in the designation of roads on which the mails are to be transported, and the former by the regulation of commerce upon the high seas and upon our rivers and lakes. If these limitations are to be departed from, there can be no others except at the discretion of Congress."

But it is objected by my colleague, the chairman of the committee, that this opinion of Justice McLean was only his single judgment, rendered on his own circuit, and never in terms approved by the Supreme Court. I must, therefore, ask his attention and that of the House to a more solemn and conclusive judgment of the Supreme Court, rendered in December, 1865, and reported in the case of Gilman vs. Philadelphia, 3 Wallace, page 725, and concurred in by all the present judges except Justices Clifford and Davis. The court say:

"The national Government possesses no powers but such as have been delegated to it. The States have all but such as they have surrendered. The power to authorize the building of bridges is not to be found in the Federal Constitution. It has not been taken from the States. It must reside somewhere. They had it before the Constitution was adopted, and they have it still."

The uniform conduct of the Federal Government in reference to bridges has been in complete harmony with these decisions. Congress has only given in any case the mere assent of the United States to the erection of bridges over navigable rivers subject to its jurisdiction for the regulation of commerce. The right to build them within the limits of a State, the right of way, the authority to use or appropriate the soil on which they stand, is always obtained from the State.

It is a fixed principle in the law of this country that the soil on the maritime boundaries of a State, below low-water mark, and lying within the territorial limits of the State, and capable of occupation for any purpose, belongs to the State as proprietor, though it may by grant or prescription become private property. (Smith vs. Maryland, 18 Howard, 71; Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, 3 Howard, 212; Martin vs. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367.)

Over the waters above such soil there are two legislative jurisdictions: the Federal jurisdiction, for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; the State jurisdiction, for the exercise of its police and other municipal powers, its right of eminent domain, and the protection of its rights of property in the soil.

Although a State holds its title to the soil under navigable waters subject to the exercise of certain common and public rights in those waters, such as taking fish, anchoring, &c., the right to lay and maintain permanent structures for conducting commercial intercourse is not such a public and common right, vested either in foreigners or in citizens of other States or in the citizens of the particular State. Such a right can be derived only from the State by grant, and does not spring from the public law or the law of nature.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce does not prevent a State from restraining in the manner in which a vessel licensed for the coasting trade may exercise its common right of taking shell-fish from the soil of the State under navigable water. (Smith vs. Maryland, 18 Howard, 71.) A fortiori, the commercial power of Congress cannot confer a right to lay a permanent structure upon such soil of a State. For example, the court say, in Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, referred to and approved in Gilman vs. Philadelphia, that—

"The right of eminent domain over the shores and the soil under the navigable waters for all municipal purposes, belongs exclusively to the States within their respective territorial jurisdictions, and they, and they only, have the constitutional power to exercise it."

How impressively inconsistent with these high authorities and settled doctrines are the assumptions of my colleague that Congress has as much power to create corporations, to construct railroads, and to regulate the commerce and business of such roads as it has to appropriate public money or lands to aid in the construction of internal improvements of a national character, or to improve, remove obstructions from, or deepen, the channels or mouths of navigable rivers. He and every gentleman well knows that the power of Congress over the public revenue and lands is derived from well-defined but different grants in the Constitution, and has been settled by the uniform practice of half a century or more, and affords no analogy for the powers asserted in this bill. Our system of harbor and river improvements, designed and so well calculated to promote the interests and safety of both external and internal, foreign and domestic, commerce, was never organized in hostility to the just powers of the States, and no such improvements were ever made, or public moneys so expended, without the assent of the States within whose jurisdiction they were made, and no exclusive jurisdiction over any portion of the soil of the States was ever thus acquired without the express assent of the States, and no exemption of property engaged in the commerce to be benefited by such improvements from State and municipal taxation ever in one instance resulted from the making of such improvements by the General Government. The just distinctions between the proper regulation of commerce and the attempt to create, construct, and exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the means and instruments by which commerce is carried on are thus happily illustrated. These distinctions ought never to be lost sight of.

I might multiply like authorities with those already cited, but it cannot be necessary. These great men were at the birth of our Republic, and guided and protected by their wisdom and patriotism it grew great and powerful, and inspired mankind everywhere with new hope and furnished them a great example. If it is competent for the human mind to comprehend the just meaning of language or the true intent of law, it must be that that capacity was possessed by these men. Their interpretations are almost equal as authority to the highest judicial decisions. The Representatives who, having sworn to support the Constitution, should make them their guides as to its true meaning, could not go far astray, and would certainly shun the wild chimeras and crotchets and mere partisan dogmas of this day.

I will yield to the temptation to refer to one other decision of our Supreme Court, (Veazie vs. Moor, 14 Howard's Reports, 573,) because it is the latest, having been made in 1852, and is the unanimous judgment of the judges then on the bench of that court, who were Chief Justice Taney, and Justices McLean, Wayne, Catron, Daniel, Nelson, Grier, and Curtis. In discussing the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States the court says:

"The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal, between citizens of the same community, or to a polity and laws whose ends and purposes and operations are restricted to the territory and soil and jurisdiction of such community. Nor can it be properly concluded that because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce, the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase foreign commerce, or fairly implied in any investiture of the power to regulate such commerce. A pretension as far reaching as this would extend to contracts between citizen and citizen of the same State, would control the pursuits of the planter, the grazier, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the immense operations of the collieries and mines and furnaces of the country; for there is not one of these avocations the results of which may not become the subjects of foreign commerce, and be borne either by turnpikes, canals, or railroads from point to point within the several States, toward an ultimate destination, like the one above mentioned. Such a pretension would effectually prevent or paralyze every effort at internal improvement by the several States; for it cannot be supposed that the States would exhaust their capital and their credit in the construction of turnpikes, canals, and railroads, the remuneration derivable from which, and all control over which, might be immediately wrested from them, because such public works would be facilities for a commerce which, while availing itself of those facilities, was unquestionably internal, although intermediately or ultimately it might become foreign.

"The rule here given with respect to the regulation of foreign commerce equally excludes from the regulation of commerce between the States and the Indian tribes, the control over turnpikes, canals, railroads, or the clearing and deepening of water-courses, exclusively within the States, or the management of the transportation upon and by means of such improvements. The design and object of that power, as evinced in the history of the Constitution, was to establish a perfect equality among the several States as to commercial rights, and to prevent unjust and invidious distinctions which local jealousies or local and partial interests might be disposed to introduce and maintain. These were the views pressed upon the public attention by the advocates for the adoption of the Constitution, and in accordance therewith have been the expositions of this instrument propounded by this court."

These views and authorities constitute a triumphant and authoritative refutation of the whole system of legislation to which we refer. Their statements are so clear and reasonable as to challenge the most careful consideration, if not to elicit the approval of every unprejudiced mind.

It is not possible, if the history of our country has any value or contains any truth, that it was ever intended by the framers of our Federal Constitution, who were at the same time pioneers and equally interested in the organization of our State governments, that the former should ever attempt to take the management of or legislate for the private and local affairs and interests of the people in the States. Such policy is everywhere deprecated and denounced by them as most dangerous to the best interests of both Governments. They have always, and with singular unanimity and tenacity, insisted that the chief element in our system of Government, which at once combines safety to liberty and great strength, is that of a well-defined and faithfully observed division of powers between the General and the local governments. It was their most cherished aim to establish firmly and to observe faithfully this division. We cannot cultivate a sounder or more beneficent policy. Let us devote the energies of this General Government to its appropriate duties; to the wise superintendence of those general interests which pertain to and can be best administered by it; to its vast external affairs.

In opposition to all these authorities my colleague [Mr. Cook] has been able to cite but a single direct judicial opinion, and that opinion, just so far as it sustains his positions, is an obiter dictum. We refer to the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge et al., (American Law Register, for January, 1868, page 149,) decided by Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, on the Iowa circuit. The court in that case was required to pass upon the validity or invalidity of the act of Congress of February 27, 1867, (16 U. S. Statutes, 412,) and nothing more. The general questions involved in this discussion were not presented to the court at all for adjudication in that case. The single question which demanded decision in that case was the right of Congress to authorize the construction of railroad bridges across the public navigable rivers of the United States. It did not touch the great question of the power of Congress to invade the eminent domain of a State, and appropriate her soil without her consent, either to erect bridges or railroads. The legitimate scope of that decision is made apparent by an examination of the material section of the act referred to, which reads as follows:

"SECTION 1. * * * * * "That the bridge across the Mississippi river erected by the Albany Bridge Company and the Chicago, Iowa, and Nebraska Railroad Company, under the authority of the States of Iowa and Illinois, between the towns of Clinton, Iowa, and Albany, Illinois, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or other public highways leading to the said bridge."

It thus appears that all rights of eminent domain, or rights to enter upon and appropriate the soil on either side of the river necessary for the erection of the Clinton bridge, were obtained by direct grants to the companies interested from the respective States having jurisdiction over the same. The only question that remained, therefore, for the court to settle was the right of Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, to legalize the erection of the bridge over the river. The river is a natural highway; it is held to come within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and therefore to be subject to the control of Congress as to the manner in which structures or obstructions of any kind may be placed over it. This limited power, upon the authorities and for the purposes of this argument, is conceded. Justice Miller, acting on these authorities, held, in the case under consideration, that—

"The act of Congress of February 27, 1867, (16 United States Statutes, 412,) declaring a bridge erected by a railroad company across the Mississippi river at the city of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, 'a lawful structure and a post route,' is constitutional and valid."

When the learned justice had thus decided the case his duty was done, but he did not consider it his duty to go no further. He proceeded to express other views on the general powers of Congress over interstate commerce, and said:

"For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads, when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it."

This does not attain the dignity of a judicial decision. It is only the personal opinion of an intelligent lawyer. I give due consideration to the high position of its author, but cannot concede to it the weight of authority. In my judgment all the vast interests connected with the railroad transit of the country can be much more wisely and effectively regulated and protected by State authority. Many present regulations are imperfect, many excesses are practiced by railroad companies, and many evils need to be corrected. But when the recent origin and wonderful growth of the system of railroads is considered, it is matter of greatest surprise that all these evils are not more grievous than they are. It cannot be doubted that in the early future, if left to the sole and rightful control of the States, these defects will be removed to a great extent. It is not in the power of any human Government to regulate such vast interests in such way as to secure absolutely just results under all circumstances. They can only approximate such results. But more effective relief will probably be derived from healthful public sentiment and intelligent self-interest between the people and the proprietors of these great highways than from congressional legislation.

This bill attempts to give power to this corporation to take or condemn for its own uses, under certain rules, any property in the States through which it passes, whether it belong to the States, to private citizens, or to other corporations, and whether it "impair the obligation of contracts" between the State and its citizens or not. My colleague, I understand, assumes that this prohibition against legislation impairing the obligation of contracts "is upon the States, not upon the United States." Is this true? It impresses me as being a most untenable and dangerous proposition. Is there any line or word of authority to justify the conclusion that the framers of our Federal Constitution intended to empower Congress to pass laws to impair the obligation of contracts? Are such laws any more tolerable or consistent with justice when enacted by Congress than if enacted by a State? Is a dishonest act any less dishonest because it was committed by Congress? All such laws are contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation. (Federalist, No. 39.) All contracts are property, and the obligation of contracts is property. They are things of value, of the greatest intrinsic value, and therefore constitute property of the most sacred character. The obligation of contracts is the right which the contractor acquires under the contract to have it faithfully performed. It is all the value the contract possesses until it is performed.

And the Constitution says no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." If Congress possesses omnipotent authority to impair or disregard the obligation of contracts, then what is the value of this prohibition? What safety exists for the supposed sanctity of the contracts and intercourse between man and man in society? If Congress may impair or disregard the obligation of contracts between a State and her citizens whenever in its judgment it becomes expedient for the regulation of commerce or for any other purpose, then how is the power of Congress over all such interests to be restrained? The power of the States over the most important and sacred interests of their citizens, for their regulation and protection, must then be exercised subject to the pleasure of Congress. The right of the States to regulate their own domestic policy in their own way and to protect their own citizens in their domestic, personal, and franchise rights, interests, and contracts, which is the most exalted and invaluable office of civil government, becomes a myth. It cannot be that Congress possesses any more right to impair the obligation of contracts than the States.

How to Resume Specie Payments.

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. W. JULIAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 5, 1869.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. JULIAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The simple and obvious solution of our financial problem is to be found in the reduction of expenditures and the increase of productive capital. This is the chosen and sure way to specie payments, and to real national wealth, and the time has come to confess it, and to plant our feet on the solid ground of actual facts. The country has been fed on mere theories long enough. The brains of our public men have been teeming with ambitious schemes of finance, all radically differing from each other, bewildering rather than enlightening the general mind, exciting false hopes, and kindling among the people a feverish discontent, instead of invoking the spirit of patience in the endeavor to accept the real facts of our condition and the lesson which they teach. Other methods are now wanting. Discarding metaphysical projects, and putting aside the folly of looking to the Government for some splendid financial panacea which shall at once lift from us the burden of our debt and immortalize its discoverer, we must now turn to the plain and old-fashioned ways and means I have mentioned. There is no royal road out of our national indebtedness. There is no short cut to specie payments by the mere fiat of law, independent of our actual resources. Legislation can create a debt, but it cannot pay it. We might just as reasonably attempt to change the properties of the triangle by act of Congress, as to fix the precise day on which our national debt shall be fully paid, or our greenbacks redeemed in coin; since we have no foreknowledge of the course of the seasons, the productiveness of our crops, the vicissitudes of trade, the character and influence of future legislation, and other contingencies which must vitally affect our financial resources at any given time hereafter. Finance is no juggle, no sleight-of-hand by which the nation can be relieved of its great debt without actual payment; nor is it a Black Art, utterly inscrutable to the plain common sense of the people. Sir, what we want, I repeat, is economy of expenditure and increased production. On the one hand, we must cut down all appropriations to the lowest practicable figure; refuse all frightful subsidies to railroads, steamships, and kindred projects; revise the tariff and tax laws in the interest of labor, and so reform the civil service that the money drawn from the earnings of the people shall not be squandered by incompetent and corrupt officials. On the other hand, the Government, keeping within the scope of its legitimate powers, must remove as far as possible all obstructions to industrial development, and thus encourage foreign immigration, the extension of our railways, the settlement of our western States and Territories, and the profitable exploration of our mines. It is this second branch of my subject, Mr. Chairman, of which I wish briefly to speak; but before I do this, allow me to refer to some very instructive and encouraging facts and figures affecting our condition and prospects as a people.

According to Commissioner Wells, one million natives of foreign countries have permanently settled in the United States from the 1st day of July, 1865, to the 1st day of December, 1868. He says that investigations have been made which show that these immigrants bring with them on an average eighty dollars per head, while their average value as producers is one thousand dollars each. Immigration, then, since the close of the war, has added eighty million dollars directly, and five hundred million dollars indirectly, to the resources of the country.

Within the last four to five years our cotton manufactures have increased nearly thirty-two per cent. The increase in our woolen manufactures has been much larger.

The product of pig-iron from 1863 to 1868 has grown from 947 tons to 1,550,000 tons, being considerably in excess of that of Great Britain. The product of copper from 1860 to 1867 has increased from 6,000 tons to 11,735 tons.

The product of petroleum during the years 1864 and 1865 averaged 30,000,000 gallons. In 1867 it was over 67,000,000 gallons, and for 1868, up to the 18th of December, it was 94,774,291 gallons.

The product of coal during the past three years has averaged, annually, nearly 18,000,000 tons.

Our lake tonnage in 1866 increased twenty-four per cent.; in 1867, eleven per cent.

Our average monthly consumption of sugars for the year ending November 30, 1868, was 12,061,280 pounds more than during the same period in the year 1867; and our average monthly consumption of coffee 784 tons more than during the same period of the previous year.

The increase in our agricultural products has been not less remarkable. The number of sheep in Ohio in 1868 was 1,274,204 greater than in the year 1865, and it is estimated that the number has doubled within the past eight years. The increase of her hogs from the year 1865 to that of 1868 was 700,000. The aggregate of her corn, wheat, and oats in 1865 was 107,414,278 bushels; in 1866 it was 118,061,911, and in 1867, 141,000,000. The number of hogs packed at the West in 1865-66 was 1,705,955; in 1866-67 it was 2,490,791, and in 1867-68, 2,781,084. The present rate of increase of the crop of Indian corn throughout the whole country is three and one half per cent., and the crop for the year 1868 is estimated at 1,100,000,000 bushels. In the year 1867 Minnesota exported wheat alone amounting to 12,000,000 bushels, which sold at an average of two dollars per bushel, increasing our national wealth on this one article alone twenty-four million dollars; and it is estimated that not over two per cent. of her lands have yet been reduced to actual settlement. I quote these calculations from the late able speech of Mr. WINDOM, one of the Representatives of that State.

Our cotton crop for the past year is estimated at 545,524 bales more than that of the previous year. Our railway extension since the year 1835 has averaged, annually, 1,156 miles. From the year 1865, and inclusive of that year, nearly 8,000 miles have been constructed in the United States, being more than double the annual increase prior to that time. Mr. Wells estimates that the gross earnings of our roads pay for their construction in a little more than four years. The total annual value of all the merchandise traffic on all the roads at present equals seven billion two hundred and seventy-three million two hundred thousand dollars. From 1851 to 1867 the tonnage transportation has increased at the rate of eight hundred per cent., and the actual increase has been 42,480,000 tons. The estimated value of railway merchandise for the past sixteen years has increased at the rate of nearly four hundred millions of dollars per annum. From the year 1858 to 1868 the increase of tonnage on all the roads in the United States has been sixteen times greater than the increase of population.

Within the ten years from 1850 to 1860 our population has increased fifty times faster than that of Great Britain, while the annual expenses of the latter are one hundred and nineteen millions greater than ours. During the railroad era of our country, from the year 1830 to 1860, the increase of our wealth was five hundred and eight per cent. From 1840 to 1860 our percentage of increase was two hundred and fifty-six, being more than eighteen times greater than that of Great Britain; and the most remarkable fact must be mentioned, that in the three and a half years following the close of the war we have paid eight hundred millions of dollars of our national debt.

In referring to our railway system it should be observed that according to the best authorities on the subject our foreign immigration increases in the ratio of our railway extension, and that the settlement of our vacant lands, the increase of productive wealth, and consequently of our exports and imports, conform to the same general principle. It should likewise be remembered that railway extension is now conceded to be the best if not the only solution of the Indian problem, and that just so far and so fast as this solution shall be accomplished, the frightful expenditures demanded by our Indian wars will be avoided. According to official documents, the expense of suppressing Indian hostilities in the years 1864 and 1865 was over thirty millions of dollars, and for every dead Indian two millions of dollars were expended. Our Indian troubles for the past six years have cost us one hundred million dollars, and calculations have been made showing that our several Indian wars within the past twenty years have cost us seven hundred and fifty millions. The present current expense of our Indian wars is believed to be five million dollars per week, or about one hundred and forty-four thousand dollars per day. These expenditures are startling, but they will be constantly diminished as our railways are extended, with the swelling column of settlement and civilization which will follow along their lines, fill up our distant borders, and augment our productive wealth.

Mr. Chairman, this encouraging exhibit of our national resources and material development would be wanting in its true value and full significance if not considered in the light of an important reflection which it naturally suggests. In the exact proportion that our wealth increases our national debt diminishes. To have paid our debt of 1865 twenty-eight years ago would have required ninety per cent. of all the property of the United States. But the payment of the debt of 1868 would only require about eight per cent. of our present wealth. The ratio of increase of our wealth from 1850 to 1860 was nearly one hundred and twenty-four and one half per cent.; but assuming that it will hereafter be only one hundred per cent. every ten years, the aggregate of our wealth in the year 1900, according to Commissioner Wells, will be two hundred and fifty-eight billions five hundred and fourteen millions of dollars.

In 1900, therefore, our debt will be only one eighth as great a burden as it is now, or one ninetieth of what it would have been on the property of 1840. A tax of one per cent. would then wipe out the entire indebtedness, while now it requires one per cent. to pay the current annual expenses of the Government. The nation, therefore, in the gratifying growth of its wealth which I have sketched is growing out of debt, and growing so fast as to put to flight all apprehension as to our financial future. What it wants is free scope, and the untrammelled use of its resources and energies; and this is forcibly illustrated by Commissioner Wells, in his reference to the removal of the tax on manufactures, which compelled the Treasury to relinquish at least one hundred and seventy millions of dollars, and yet by stimulating the productive interests of the country it accelerated the payment of our debt. It did this, he says, on the principle that the power of contributing to the public revenue increases geometrically as the activity of production and circulation increases arithmetically.

What, then, Mr. Chairman, is the lesson which these facts and figures plainly teach? Do they plead for some marvelous and as yet undiscovered scheme of finance, to supersede or help along the natural processes which we have seen are so hopefully at work? I have already answered this question. The true financial policy of the Government to-day is that of a Masterly Inactivity, leaving the great forces of industry and trade to do their work, to "uncover our mountains of gold and silver," to build our railways, to multiply the tillers of the soil, and thus to solve the problem of our finances by the creation of wealth. "All that government can do," says Buckle, "is to afford the opportunity of progress; the progress, itself, must depend upon other matters." He asserts, as the general testimony of history, that the best laws that have been enacted in any country are those by which some former laws were repealed; and that while the power of government for evil is incalculable, its power for good, beyond the mere preservation of order and the punishment of crime, is negative only, and simply auxiliary to natural and social laws. All that Congress can do to improve our finances, or speed the payment of our debt, is to remove some of the principal obstructions to the development of our resources, and thus "to afford the opportunity of progress;" and I now come to the discussion of this point.

The first duty of Congress, Mr. Chairman, is to forbid the further sale of another acre of arable public land, except as provided under the preemption and homestead laws. This should be done instantly, and the time is coming when our failure or refusal to do it will be regarded with inexpressible surprise and sorrow. We say to the landless poor man, "Go upon any portion of the surveyed public lands, select your homestead, occupy and improve it, and it shall be yours." But we say to the speculator, "Go also, with the free license of Congress to throw yourself across the track of our struggling pioneer settlers, by buying up great bodies of choice lands, forcing them beyond you into the more distant frontier, or compelling them to surround your monopoly by their improved homesteads, which shall thus make you rich by their toil and at the nation's cost." Sir, such a policy is as financially stupid as it is flagrantly unjust. It has marred and crippled the homestead law from the beginning, rendering it a measure of half-way reform at best. On another occasion I have shown that more than thirty millions of acres, since the formation of the Government, have fallen into the grasp of monopolists, and been consigned to solitude, through the regular partnership which the Government has formed with the speculator to cheat the poor man out of his right to a home, and the country itself out of the productive wealth which these millions might have yielded under the hand of industry.

Sir, why should Congress any longer tolerate this wretched and ruinous policy? The wealth which is to feed our commerce and enable us to pay our debt must be dug from the soil. No man will dispute this fundamental truth. Then, why not dedicate the whole of our remaining rich lands to actual settlement and tillage, and while thus increasing our wealth provide homes and independence for the poor? Our Puritan ancestors, prior to their emigration to Massachusetts Bay, issued a paper in which they declared that "the whole earth was the Lord's garden, and he had given it to the sons of Adam, to be tilled and improved by them." And they asked, "Why, then, should any stand starving for places of habitation, and in the mean time suffer whole countries, as profitable for the use of man, to lie waste without any improvement?" Sir, this question, so earnestly asked by the Puritans nearly two hundred and fifty years ago, still demands an answer, and in the name of the homeless and toiling poor of our land I ask it from the Congress of the United States. The interests of humanity and the development of our resources go hand in hand, and their joint plea cannot much longer be denied.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, there were taken under the southern homestead law in the five land States to which it applies 526,077 acres. During the preceding year there were taken 264,480 acres; and up to this date the aggregate amount thus appropriated since the passage of the law cannot be less than a million acres, supplying 12,500 homesteads or farms of eighty acres each, as an addition to the producing power of the South. This was done by dedicating the public lands in these States to actual settlement only, and thus rescuing them from the threatened power of the speculator. The whole number of acres taken during the last fiscal year under the southern and general homestead laws was 2,328,923 acres; and the aggregate quantity taken from the passage of the original act of 1862 to June 30 of last year was 9,500,000 acres, which by this date must have swelled to 10,000,000, being sufficient for 125,000 homesteads of eighty acres each. The settlements under these laws are steadily increasing, and all that is wanting to the full sweep of their beneficent operation is the prohibition by Congress of the further sale of our agricultural lands for speculative purposes, and the absolute pledge of them, in reasonable homesteads, to productive wealth. This, sir, is the great demand of the hour. The widespread mischiefs already inflicted upon our country by a false policy admit of no remedy; but Congress holds the key to the future, in the power to forbid all further obstructions to the settlement and improvement of the public domain. In the exercise of this power the homestead law would grow to its full stature, and have free course in accomplishing the grand work for which it was intended. Speculators and monopolists, having no longer the sanction or encouragement of the Government, would betake themselves to more worthy pursuits. Our foreign immigration, already pouring in upon our shores at the rate of three hundred thousand per annum, would be largely increased, through the motive power of greatly extended facilities of acquiring homes on our vacant lands. Railway extension, the increase of productive wealth, the growth of our exports and imports, and the development of our mines would all be quickened by this practical recognition of democratic equality and national repudiation of the principle of feudalism in these States.

Mr. Chairman, I proceed to notice another serious obstruction to productive wealth and financial prosperity which Congress should at once remove. I allude to our present system of land grants in aid of railroads. The evils of this system have become perfectly appalling, and no real friend of the country can contemplate them and hold his peace. Congress first fairly inaugurated the system some twenty years ago, and although it was originally vicious, it has for years past been constantly growing worse through the addition to it of new features, and the steadily increasing size of the grants. Congress has granted to the different lines of the Pacific railroads alone the estimated aggregate of one hundred and twenty-four million acres. If we add to this the grants made to the several States in aid of railroads and other works of internal improvement it will foot up not far from two hundred million acres. This immense domain has passed into the hands of corporations, and under the terms on which it was granted they hold it as a complete monopoly. They may sell it to actual settlers in moderate homesteads, or they may sell it to a single monopolist. They may sell it for a reasonable price, or fix upon it just such a price as they please. They may sell it to-morrow, or hold it forty years for a rise in price through the enhanced value to be added to it by adjacent settlements. Regions which the Commissioner of the General Land Office fitly describes as of "empire extent," and including vast bodies of the richest lands in the nation, are placed entirely beyond the power of our pioneer settlers. To the homestead claimant and preëemptor they are unknown, or known only to their sorrow and disappointment. The landless and laboring poor of the Republic, who do their full share in fighting its battles in war, must pay to organized avarice just such a tariff as it may see fit to exact for the privilege of cultivating the earth and adding to the national wealth. The Northern Pacific railway alone has a grant forty miles wide, extending from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific ocean, and containing forty-seven millions of acres. It is just about equal in extent to the five States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, while the total grants made to all our various roads and for other works of internal improvements are nearly equal to the entire area of the thirteen original colonies of the United States.

Sir, will any gentleman on this floor defend this national havoc and spoliation? Have we, as the representatives of the people, the right to commit to the tender mercies of monopolists territory enough for a score of principalities and kingdoms? When the nation is groaning under an immense debt can we afford to slam the door in the faces of foreign immigrants and our own people who are seeking homes on our vacant lands, and anxious to coin their labor into national wealth? Mr. Chairman, these are very practical and vital questions, and every passing day gives to them an added interest. Railway extension has become a passion with our men of capital and enterprise, and the demand for land grants meets us now in every quarter, at every turn, and is pressed with unparalleled zeal. There are now pending in this Congress at least fifty bills, asking grants of land for railroads, wagon-roads, and canals, and covering an area of more than two hundred millions of acres. The southern States, so long excluded from any share in these grants, are doing their utmost to make up for lost time. Scores of new bills are sometimes presented and referred in a single day; and judging from the signs of the times, the contagion which has seized Congress, and which threatens the country with general disaster, has only fairly begun.

The remedy, Mr. Chairman, is at hand, and is perfectly simple and easy. Let Congress provide that all future grants of lands in aid of railroads shall be made on the condition, expressed in the act making the grants, that they shall be sold to actual settlers only, in quantities not greater than one quarter section, and for a price not exceeding a fixed maximum. This will effectually destroy the monopoly which else would exist, and while furnishing immediate aid in building the roads will settle and improve the country along their lines, and thus create a local business for their benefit. Such a land-grant policy can honestly be defended, because it harmonizes the interest of these enterprizes with the settlement of the country: and it seems unaccountable that this should not have been seen from the beginning. A bill embodying this reform passed this House at the last session, and I regret, exceedingly, that it sleeps sweetly in the complacent embrace of the chairman of the Land Committee of the Senate, and that by its side reposes another bill, passed by this House about a year ago, opening to homestead settlement nearly five million acres of land in the southern States which for years have been tied up in the hands of rebel corporations, while the homeless poor of those States have longed to occupy and improve them.

Mr. Chairman, the reform of our policy respecting Indian reservations would remove a further and very serious obstacle to productive wealth. Within the past seven years this policy has been thoroughly revolutionized. Up to the year 1860, when any Indian tribe saw fit to relinquish the right to its lands, the uniform practice of the Government was to provide by treaty for the conveyance of their lands directly to the United States, and they thenceforward became subject to the control and management of Congress, as all other public lands. This was not only the true policy, but it was enjoined by the Constitution in the authority given to Congress "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States." The Indians have simply a right of occupancy in their reservations, the title being in the United States; and the treaty-making power is not competent to change the land policy prescribed by Congress, but is itself bound by that policy.

The departure from this principle began in 1861, and has been persisted in ever since. One of the most notable examples of this new dispensation was the late treaty with the Cherokee Indians, by which eight hundred thousand acres were authorized to be sold in a body to a single purchaser, at the rate of one dollar per acre, thus completely withdrawing what would otherwise have been a part of the public domain from the control of Congress. The Indians desired to sell to the Government, but were not allowed to do so; and the settlers on the land of course desired to adjust their claims with the United States, instead of the monopolists who bought it. It was a disgraceful transaction, and cannot stand. Another treaty, made with the Great and Little Osage Indians, authorized the disposition of over three millions of acres, in contravention of the homestead and preëemption laws, in derogation of the authority of Congress, and without excuse.

Similar treaties have been made with the Sac and Foxes, the Delaware, the Kickapoo, and sundry other tribes, by which vast bodies of lands which should have been conveyed directly to the United States have passed into the hands of railroad corporations, or individual monopolists; the treaties in these cases providing for the location and building of important lines of railroads in connection with these operations in real estate, as if Congress had in fact abdicated its interest in this branch of legislation in favor of the Senate and the savages. By far the most remarkable of all these transactions is the last Osage treaty, now pending in the Senate. It provides for the sale of a body of land in Kansas fifty miles wide and two hundred and fifty miles long, containing, consequently, twelve thousand five hundred square miles, or eight millions of acres, which, divided by one hundred and sixty, will give an aggregate of fifty thousand homesteads of one hundred and sixty acres each; and allowing every head of a family to represent an average of five persons, it would sustain a population of two hundred and fifty thousand. The territory is nearly large enough to carve out of it three such States as Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Delaware.

And yet the whole of this domain is conveyed by the treaty to a single railroad corporation in Kansas, in utter disregard of the rights of the bona fide settlers on it, in defiance of the authority of Congress over our Indian reservations, the moment the right of occupancy is relinquished, and in shameless disregard of the equal rights of other railroad corporations, to the aid of the Government. All this land is sold to this corporation at nineteen cents per acre, on a credit of fifteen years, payable in equal annual installments, and in the bonds of the company; and without any reservation to the State of the sixteenth and thirty sixth sections for educational purposes. To complete this picture it should be added, that this land is among the very finest in the State, and is probably worth at least ten millions of dollars. This beautiful and celestial performance—the blessed progeny of a meretricious union of railroad rapacity with a thieving Indian commission appointed by Andrew Johnson—is now before the Senate for ratification; and judging from the past, and considering the suspicious cover of darkness under which the Senate acts in such cases, it will be ratified. If so, the consolation will be that the act, having no warrant in the Constitution, will have no binding force. Like the Cherokee and kindred treaties, it will be pronounced void, whenever the question shall be fairly submitted to the Federal courts.

But the policy of these treaties should be reversed at once, and thus avert further and interminable litigation and trouble hereafter. This House has already passed a joint resolution denying their validity, and directing that hereafter no patents shall be issued by the President to purchasers of lands in such cases without first being authorized by law. I sincerely hope the Senate will concur in this action, and thus restore the ancient policy of the Government and the rightful authority of Congress. No man can defend our past action in thus joining hands with monopolists in squandering our great national patrimony, and conspiring against the productive industry of the nation. Our finances, of course, are deeply involved in this question. We have treaty stipulations with about one hundred and fifty Indian tribes; and the aggregate of their lands, according to official statements furnished me by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is one hundred and ninety-one million seven hundred and fifty-five thousand two hundred and four acres; being just about equal in extent to the lands granted in aid of railroads. The whole of this immense domain is threatened by the frightful policy now in full blast, and must succumb to the baleful power of railroad corporations and land robbers if Congress shall tamely permit it. If we are ready for this we may as well abolish our General Land Office, with the corresponding committees of Congress, at once, surrendering their functions to the Indian Bureau and its allies; and thus entertain the world with the spectacle of total depravity finally triumphant in an "Indian ring," struggling no longer against obstacles for ascendancy, but in the perfect amplitude of its dominion and the full blaze of its glory. Sir, let us insist upon it that just so fast as our Indian lands shall hereafter be disencumbered of the possessory title by which they are now held, they shall be conveyed to the United States, and fall under the operation of our preëemption and homestead laws; and that the President and Senate have no more power to build railroads and make land grants than has the judiciary to enact laws.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the legislative reforms I have now mentioned, looking to the increase of production and the resulting improvement of our finances, the nation needs a policy that would more effectually develop our wonderful mineral resources, and thus augment the quantity of our precious metals. This is absolutely necessary to an early return to specie payments; and I have no faith in any financial theory which does not look to gold and silver as the true medium of exchange and standard of value. This is one of the questions which have been settled by the civilized and commercial world, and therefore I need not debate it. I believe a return to payments in coin is a necessity, and an increase in the product of it must, of course, speed the time when it can be done safely. The increase in our productive wealth, at the lowest estimate, is one hundred million dollars annually, while our product of gold and silver is actually on the decline. The disproportion of these metals to other values and to our commercial wants, already startling, is thus in fact increasing. How shall this disproportion be reduced? I believe it may be done, to some extent, by reconstructing our legislation on the subject of our mineral lands. I allude particularly to the clumsy and ill-considered act of July 26, 1866, which was hurried through Congress under the false title of "An act granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada." The act declares that the mineral lands of the United States shall be open to exploration and occupation "subject to the local custom or rules of miners." These "local rules" are to govern the miner in the location, extension, and boundary of his claim, the manner of improving and developing it, and the survey also, which is not to be executed according to the public surveys with reference to base lines and under the authority of the United States, but in utter disregard of the same. The surveyor general is to make out a plat or diagram of the claim and transmit it to the General Land Office, upon which it is made the duty of that office to issue a patent to the claimant. In case of any conflict between different claimants it must be determined by the local courts, without any right of appeal to the local land office, the General Land Office, or to any Federal court. The act, as I stated on its passage, is an absolute deed of quit-claim on the part of the United States of all right, title, or interest in the mineral lands of the nation, covering a million square miles, and commits them wholly to the disposition and arbitrament of the "local custom or rules of the miners."

The act further gives to every claimant the right to follow his vein or lode, "with its dips, angles, and variations, to any depth, although it may enter the land adjoining, which land adjoining shall be sold subject to this condition." This law, so radically revolutionary of the well-settled and well-understood policy of the nation, rests upon the "local custom or rules of miners." Sir, what are these local rules and customs? I will allow the State of Nevada to answer. An official document, being a senate report to the Legislature of that State on the subject of these local rules, informs us that as "to uniformity there is nothing approaching it. There never was confusion worse founded. More than two hundred petty districts within the limits of a single State, each with its self-approved code; these codes differing not alone each from the other, but presenting numberless instances of contradiction in themselves; the law of one point is not the law of another five miles distant, and a little further on will be a code which is the law of neither of the former, and so on ad infinitum, with the further disturbing fact superadded that the written laws themselves may be overrun by some peculiar custom which can be found nowhere recorded, and the proof of which will vary with the volume of interested affidavits which may be brought on either side to establish it. Again, in one district the work required to be done to hold a claim is nominal, in another exorbitant, in another abolished, in another adjourned from year to year. A stranger seeking to ascertain the law is surprised to learn that there is no satisfactory public record to which he can refer; no public officer to whom he may apply who is under any bond or obligation to furnish him information or guaranty its authenticity. Often in the new districts he finds there is not even the semblance of a code, but a simple resolution adopting the code of some other district, which may be a hundred miles distant."

The report proceeds to show that these regulations, such as they are, have no permanency. "A miners' meeting," the committee say, "adopts a code; it stands apparently as the law. Some time after, on a few days' notice, a corporal's guard assembles, and on simple motion radically changes the whole system by which claims may be held in a district. Before a man may traverse the State, the laws of a district, which by examination and study he may have mastered, may be swept away and no longer stand as the laws which govern the interest he may have acquired, and the change has been one which by no reasonable diligence could he be expected to have knowledge of."

taining probably the richest deposits of gold and silver in the known world.

Sir, do we really wish to found a system of laws on these "local rules," enacted by a "corporal's guard" of miners, who are here to-day and gone to-morrow? What we want is not to recognize this system of instability and uncertainty, but to sweep it away, and usher in a system of permanence and peace through our system of national surveys. We have our General Land Office, with its local land offices in every portion of the public domain. Registers and receivers are to be found in the very midst of our richest mining regions, charged with the execution of our land laws within their respective districts, and in the very vicinity of the matter in dispute; authorized to call parties before them, hear their statements, take testimony, and determine the whole matter, subject to the reasonable right of either party to appeal to the General Land Office or to the Federal courts. This machinery is as old as the Government, and perfectly familiar to the people. Why abandon it and substitute the local courts, with no right of appeal, as if these tribunals, guided by the "local rules" referred to, were infallible? Why pretend to nationalize our mining laws, when in fact the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Government surveyors are the mere clerks and agents of the communities whose "local rules" are as unstable as water? Sir, the law is not simply imperfect, but a legislative abortion, worthy only of the crooked and left-handed tactics by which it was carried through Congress.

I ought to add that, in thus criticising the "local custom" of miners as the basis of a national policy, I am supported by the best informed men I have met from the mining States and Territories, who scout the idea of applying the word "custom," which implies long usage, to these fleeting and ever varying regulations; and I take great pleasure, in this connection, in referring also to the authority of Mr. R. W. Raymond, editor of the American Journal of Mining, who was educated and graduated at Freiberg, Germany, is a mining engineer, and has now in press an able official report as our Commissioner of Mining Statistics on our mineral resources, prepared by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, after personal and careful observations within the past year.

I will add further, that the provision of this law allowing the miner to follow his vein on to the lands of his adjoining neighbor, and undermine him, is wholly at war with American ideas. The old mining laws of Germany allowed this, but the Prussian code of 1867 adopts the geodetical principle of ownership directly downward to the center of the earth. So do the mining laws of France, as those of England have done from the beginning, while the famous mining codes of Spain and Mexico cannot be quoted as precedents for our statute. The strong tendency of modern legislation on this subject is against the policy on which the United States have embarked, and which must inevitably lead to unending litigation and strife. That such are its fruits in many instances is well known; while the departure from the geodetical system not only has no good reasons to support it, but is made in the face of reasons which render it, as a remedy, worse than any disease it could cure. It is wrong in principle. It offends the first teachings of mathematics and the plainest dictates of common sense. It was framed, I believe, in the special interest of lawyers. The law is vicious also in exacting improvements by the claimant to the value of one thousand dollars as a condition of title. This was evidently provided in the interest of capitalists, and could not have been prompted by the rank and file of our miners. Neither could they ever have sanctioned that feature of the law which requires the miner to pay the fees for surveying his claim, which are often very heavy, and frequently debar poor men from the benefits of the law, while in the case of other lands, where the fees are trifling, the Government makes the survey.

The practical working of this legislation has been such as any reflecting man would have anticipated. During the year 1866 our product of gold and silver amounted to seventy six millions of dollars. During the past year it was only sixty-five millions, being a falling off of eleven millions of dollars, though the population and settlement of the mining regions has considerably increased within the past two years. That this crude legislation is a partial explanation of this decline in the product of the precious metals I have no doubt, and that its amendment in the points I have specified would add to their future product is equally evident.

Mr. Chairman, I now approach the conclusion of what I desired to say. The sum of it is that beyond the enforcement of a rigid economy, legislation can only lead the country out of its financial troubles by removing the several obstructions to national progress which I have mentioned. We can abolish the curse of land speculation, and devote the remainder of our public domain to actual settlement and productive wealth. A bill providing for this is now pending. We can reform our policy of railroad land grants, so that it shall build roads, and at the same time populate and improve the country along their lines. We can overhaul our disgraceful Indian treaty system, and provide by law that hereafter whenever the title to any of our vast reservations shall be extinguished they shall fall under the control of Congress, and be dedicated to settlement and tillage. And, finally, we can so reconstruct our legislation respecting our mineral lands as more fully to develop their vast wealth, and thus compel them to help efface the existing difference between our paper currency and gold. These, sir, are the four channels through which the swelling tide of our wealth must pour in, and save at once our national finances and our national honor. These are the golden gates through which the Republic must pass, if it would crush out the insidious but steadily growing power of Aristocracy and Landlordism, and secure for itself an honorable name among the nations calling themselves free. Through the adoption of these practical reforms specie payments would be resumed, just as soon as our quickened industries and improved condition would allow. Unprecedented prosperity and wealth would answer to the roused energies of the people and the moral power of equal rights guarded by equal laws. The Old World, inspired anew by our blessed example in checking the growth of feudalism on our soil, would reinforce our grand army of producers by her surplus millions, and thus, as never before, add to our wealth and power.

"See the Old World," says Guyot, "exhausted by long cultivation, overloaded with an exuberant population, full of spirit and life, but to whom severe labor hardly gives subsistence; devoured by activity, but wanting resources and space to expand." On the other hand he describes America as "glutted with its vegetable wealth, unworked and worthless," and argues that it was made for the man of the Old World. "Everything in nature," says he, "points to this great change. The two worlds are looking face to face, and are, as it were, inclining toward each other. The Old World bends toward the new, and is ready to pour out its tribes." And he adds that "the future prosperity of mankind may be said to depend on the union of the two worlds. The bridals have been solemnized. We have witnessed the first interview, the betrothal, and the espousal; so fortunate for both. We already see enough to authorize us to cherish the fairest hopes, and to expect with confidence their realization." Sir, let us legislate in the light of these manifest tokens of Divine Providence. Let us, by the justice and humanity of our laws, invite Europe to our shores, and to join us in developing our inexhaustible and unused wealth. Let us reverently accept our part, and faithfully perform our duty, in the grand march of the world's civilization and progress to which we are summoned. Our great Pacific railway will soon be completed, belting the continent with bars of iron, linking in friendly embrace the two great oceans of the world, and placing the United States on the great highway from Europe to China: Our position as a free Republic commands the world, and the hour has struck for us bravely to accept it. If we prove false to our grand trust, and in welcoming the Old World to our shores we welcome also its feudalistic practices, its effete theories of government, our guilt can only be measured by the mighty opportunity sinned away: while the Old World, instead of finding its new birth and baptism on our shores, will be buried in a common grave with ourselves. But if, on the other hand, we are inflexibly true to the rights of man, spurning all compacts with Serfdom and Caste, all the approaches of Aristocracy and Privilege, then the "contrast between the Old World and the New will soon be reduced into a grand and beautiful harmony that will embrace the whole earth."

Indian Affairs.

SPEECH OF HON. W. A. BURLEIGH,
OF DAKOTA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1869,

On the subject of Indian affairs in the United States and Territories.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, the proper management of our Indian affairs has become so important to the country, and is so imperfectly understood by many members of this House, that I have ventured to bring before this body my views upon the subject.

Since I first entered the Thirty-Ninth Congress we have had no well-defined, settled line of policy for the government of the two hundred and fifty thousand Indians who are scattered over the western third of this continent. For every Indian outbreak there has been a dozen plans of pacification. For every fraud upon the Government there has been as many remedies proposed; for every imaginary and real disorder of this department of the public service a multitude of sovereign panaceas have been prescribed. Congress has been taxed to its utmost for some plan by which a permanent and lasting peace might be secured, the Indians subsisted, and the Federal Treasury protected. And, I regret to say, that from our whole past experience in the management of our Indian affairs little appears to have been learned, and quite as little accomplished in the settlement of this vexed question.

When a scientific physician is called in to prescribe for a patient laboring under disease his first effort is to discover its true character and its cause, in order, if the malady be curable at all, that he may act understandingly and apply his remedial agents for the restoration of his patient. If, on the contrary, the medicine-man be a quack, the character, the cause, the pathology of the disease are entirely neglected, and the batteries of the charlatan's drug-shop are at once leveled at the citadel of life, and the patient, if he survives the disease, does so in spite of his doctor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to accuse any member of this House with being a quack, professionally or otherwise, for I believe that every one here has done the best he could, with the knowledge he possessed, to settle our Indian troubles. I believe Congress has acted with the utmost wisdom so far as it has had accurate information to guide it; but, sir, there has been a sad deficiency and want of actual practical knowledge regarding our Indian tribes, their habits of life, their customs, the relations which they sustain to each other, and to the white population which surround them, and with whom they are thrown in contact.

Let us go back a few years and review a little of the past, for by this light we may better judge the future.

For a whole generation, at least, our country has been agitated in all its ramifications, civil, political, social, and religious, by an undue concern for the African race, not an indigenous, but an imported race, brought hither by our fathers for reasons which the circumstances, if not the nature of that degraded people, seemed to suggest and approve. The admitted evil of domestic servitude, the motive of this compulsory immigration, and all the wrongs and cruelties incident to it, have not yet settled the great question of the primary right and beneficial effect of the movement. It is for a future age to solve the problem whether slavery, as it has existed in the United States, has not been under the guidance of an overruling Providence, the most efficient and benevolent, if not the only practical mode of raising the African from abject barbarism to the enlightenment of civilization and the healing influences of Christianity.

The abstract wrong of the institution, however, has been sufficient to enkindle all our ideas of freedom, crude and unsound as they too often have been, into a flame of discordant action, which has threatened the peace of the nation, the commercial and social welfare of the people, the benign purpose of the church, the administration of public affairs, the very stability of the Government, and the disruption of every social bond. The issue of the "irrepressible conflict," although nearly completed, still leaves in our bosoms a feeling of solicitude for the future, while we boastfully rejoice at the present measure of our success. But, sir, there is an interest of greater moment, involving mightier considerations and more dreadful responsibilities which imposes upon our Government and our people more serious obligations than were ever demanded by the enslaved condition of the African race among us. This interest, notwithstanding its paramount importance, and its constant and accumulating claims upon us, has, from the very settlement of the country, been practically overlooked or neglected or tampered with, or perverted, from considerations of temporary policy, or from the basest and most sordid and sinister motives. Jefferson's famous exclamation that in view of the injustice of African slavery this nation had occasion to tremble at the justice of the Almighty has a twofold significance when applied to the glaring injustice which the aborigines of this country have received at the hands of our people. True, there are many noble private examples of religious and moral regard for the Indians, who were the primitive and rightful "lords of the soil." Christianity and benevolence have from time to time devised the worthiest and, so far as human foresight could reach, the most practicable schemes for the amelioration of the miserable condition and for the advancement of these "sons of nature."

I think it must be admitted that the policy of the Government toward them has not been wise or humane. Its professions, to our shame it must be said, have been merely nominal. The fate of the poor Indians, from the origin of our contact with the race to the present hour, illustrates the truth of the adage that wise and good professions may exist with cunning and cruel practices. Private enterprises, however well devised and zealously pursued, have failed of success through the demoralizing influences of public faithlessness and wrong doing, until the public sentiment has settled down upon the unchristian and inhuman hypothesis that the Indian tribes are doomed by their Creator to extermination from the face of the earth, in the midst of their ignorance and barbarism, and before the very eyes of a people who pride themselves upon their peculiar enlightenment, and who boast of an especial mission to "extend the area of freedom," and to fill the world with the truest ideas of an exalted humanity and the highest standard of Christian civilization. The hearts of our people have become callous under the hardening influence of this misguided theory. The continued dropping of falsehood and deception have worn away the faith and extinguished the hopes of the sincere friends of the Indian. The fatalism with which we regard the race and the arrogance of our cherished theory of "manifest destiny," have afflicted us with a fatal blindness and deafness as to the real condition of this people, and the loud calls upon humanity and justice in their behalf. Who now so bold as to lift up his voice in defense of the just claims of the American Indian, once so full of the enjoyments of the natural rights of man? Where are his advocates; where the societies organized to redeem him from the bonds of public injustice and the cruelties of private rapacity? Where are the orators, the lecturers, and the editors to "cry aloud and spare not" in the exposition of his wrongs and the denunciation of his oppressors?

The cruelties of African slavery are tender mercies when contrasted with the hardships endured by the Indians under the nominal protection of our laws. The chains of domestic servitude are silken threads when compared with the fetters which hold the Indian in brutalizing bondage. African slavery has passed away; its foul blot upon our nation has been washed out in the best blood of the land. May we not now indulge in the hope that the time has come when the national conscience may be awakened and the public sentiment aroused to the obligations which rest upon us to protect the remnants of the scattered Indian tribes which still linger among us, and advance them as far as possible in the arts and comforts of civilized life? We owe them a debt which, do the best we may, we can never fully discharge. Our treaties with them are full of unredeemed pledges. The demands of public faith and justice and the dictates of common humanity alike require that this subject be no longer delayed.

We have driven the Indians from their homes without compensation and without mercy. We have wrested from them the title to their lands by pretended, or at least ostensible purchase. We have withheld the payments until they were comparatively valueless, or refused them altogether upon unfounded pretexts. We have paid them in depreciated currency, when we agreed by solemn treaty to pay them in gold and silver; we have paid them in worthless trash, when we promised them the money for their lands; we have defrauded the Indians in the fulfillment of our stipulations for their clothing and food and their agricultural, mechanical, and educational advancement; we have failed to afford them our promised protection against the worse than barbarous whites which infest their settlements; we have hunted them down and murdered them like wild beasts of the forest; and, what is worse than all these, our people have polluted every tribe in the land by poisoning the very fountain of life from which the Indian springs with the most loathsome of diseases, more poisonous and destructive to the race than the sting of the scorpion, the bite of the serpent, or the leprosy of old; we have, in a word, violated every feature of our plighted faith in regard to them, and have seen them degenerate, suffer, and perish under our positive oppression or cruel neglect, while we have held them to the severest accountability for all the pledges of obedience and good behavior which we have extorted from them in our treaty negotiations. Our official records will fully substantiate all these allegations, disgraceful and humiliating as they are to our national pride and honor.

HO. OF REPS.

Indian Affairs—Mr. Burlingame.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Let us go back for a few years and review some of our Indian transactions, and see if we cannot discover a rational cause for our past and present Indian difficulties. The whole country has been shocked by the reports of Indian wars and outrages. Let us look back and see if the sin or any part of it lies at our door.

The Creek treaty, the first in magnitude and importance under the removal system, was justly charged with being negotiated without the authority of the Creek nation. Mr. Benton, who in his published memoirs has elaborately considered the subject and was scrupulously anxious to screen the Government from imputations of injustice, says:

"The treaty was adopted as an act of justice to the South. The rights and the welfare of the Indians were minor considerations."

Justice to the South was a concession, without regard to public justice, to the demands of Georgia and other southern States who coveted the rich lands then in rightful possession of the Indians for the avowed purpose of extending the area of slavery. Mr. Benton calls it a southern question, and lauds the magnanimity of the northern men by whose votes the treaty was carried in the Senate. The removal of the Indians from the southern States at that time nearly or quite doubled the area of slavery.

The Creek treaty was signed at Indian Springs in 1825; McIntosh, a chief without due authority, being the principal negotiator on the part of the Indians. He and the chief with him, who was foremost in making the treaty, were justly execrated by the disaffected party of the Creek nation as soon as the existence of the obnoxious instrument became known. The disaffected Indians were open and bold in their opposition to the treaty, and determined upon forcible resistance to the execution of it. Georgia resolved, without waiting for the action of the General Government, to take forcible possession of the territory ceded by the pretended treaty. John Quincy Adams, who was then President, became satisfied that the treaty had been made without due authority and that its execution ought not to be enforced. He interposed the power of the General Government, therefore, and sent General Gaines with Federal troops to Georgia to arrest the proceedings, and finally assembled the chiefs and head men of the tribe at Washington and concluded a new treaty, which annulled the first one and changed some of its features most objectionable to the Indians. This second treaty was carried in the Senate with considerable difficulty, being opposed by the southern Senators, who objected to the clause which amended the McIntosh treaty on the ground that it implied a censure upon its authors.

This second treaty, however, was anything but satisfactory to the Creek nation; but being ostensibly concluded by authority, was submitted to—as such treaties are generally submitted to on the part of the Indians—as a necessary evil. It was obtained as Indian treaties usually are obtained, by fraud, the foulest bribery having been resorted to achieve the inglorious triumph. Out of $217,600, the amount stipulated to be paid to the Creek nation immediately after the ratification of the treaty, the modest sum of $160,000 was by secret agreement to be retained as a private fund and divided among the chiefs, or certain of them who had negotiated the treaty. The discovery of this fraud was made after the treaty was ratified and before the appropriation to carry it into effect was made. Measures were taken, but whether they were ever carried out or not is unknown, to defeat the fraud by making a distribution of the corruption fund among the Creek nation. He must be an inveterate confidence man who believes that this was ever done.

Again, the treaty under which the Cherokees were removed from Georgia and Alabama was a still more glaring instance of injustice. Its history is a foul blot upon the annals of our Government. From its inception to its consummation it was a monstrous fraud upon the Indians.

If nations under a just Providence are to be rewarded or punished in this world according to their deeds—and we have no authority in Revelations or reason for presuming upon national accountability in a future state—we may regard all the massacres, outrages, troubles, and expense which have been entailed upon us by our Indian policy as but insignificant items to our credit in the retributive account which must sooner or later be made up between us and the red man.

The Cherokee treaty was concluded at New Echota, in 1835, notoriously without authority on the part of the Indians. The chiefs who negotiated it, or, to speak more plainly, from whom it was extorted, were few in number and not recognized as such by their people, but acted without authority and in direct opposition to a vast majority of the Cherokee nation. The treaty conceded to us about eleven million acres of the best land in Georgia and Alabama, then held by this semi-civilized people, and to a great extent cultivated by them. The consideration was merely nominal. Every student of American history must remember the excitement which this treaty produced throughout the country and the influence it exerted upon our national politics. When the treaty was presented in the Senate Mr. Clay offered a protest against its ratification, and to adopt in its place this resolve:

"That the instrument purporting to be a treaty concluded at New Echota between the United States and the chiefs and head men of the Cherokees was not made and concluded by authority of the Cherokee nation competent to bind it, and therefore the Senate cannot consent to advise the ratification thereof."

The treaty was confirmed, however, after a long discussion—by a strict party vote and by a majority of one only—unjust and fraudulent as it was. Its execution was decreed and insisted upon by the Government in spite of the continued remonstrance and determined opposition of a vast majority of the Cherokee nation. This majority maintained that they were not in any manner bound to the fulfillment of the treaty to which they had never assented, and resolved that they would not remove from their country in compliance with its stipulations, if it were possible to avoid it. Government decided to effect the removal by force, if necessary, and Georgia raised a large body of volunteers to aid in the ignoble design. General Scott was ordered to New Echota to accomplish the removal, peaceably if possible, but at the point of the bayonet if need be. The inflamed and greedy volunteers were already on the ground, with claims in their pockets for the land, which had been divided in advance between them by a sort of lottery. A gentleman who was in Georgia at the time, and had an opportunity to hear General Scott freely express his sentiments upon the subject of his mission, was curious enough to reduce his remarks to writing immediately after they were uttered. The memory of General Scott deserves that these words should be made public; they were literally as follows. He said:

"I am charged with the execution of the treaty with the Cherokees, by which they are to remove on the 23d of the present month, (May, 1837.) I am to cause the treaty to be carried into effect and the Indians to remove peaceably if possible, but forcibly if necessary. I shall make the bayonet the very last resort, and shall consider it very unfortunate for the country if blood is shed in enforcing the treaty. Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, and Tennessee are impatient for the execution of the treaty, but it must be remembered that there are twenty-two other States in the Union, and the whole Union is committed in this thing. If there be butchery in the business depend upon it there will be a cry of horror throughout the country. It will be a stain upon the annals of our country—a damning disgrace. There is a very strong feeling in a large portion of the country of injustice in compelling the Cherokees to remove under this treaty, and I repeat it, should there be butchery in the matter we shall be damned to everlasting fame in a large portion of the country, in Europe, and throughout the civilized world, in song, in poetry, in oratory, in the pulpit, and in the lasting records of history; and who would wish to connect himself with such infamy?

The treaty was made by about three tenths of the Cherokee nation and seven tenths are in opposition to it and will not go until they are carried away. The President says the treaty is the supreme law of the land, and Congress says so, too, and it is not for me, a soldier, to disobey their orders in regard to it."

Those who had been the active parties in making this treaty were already on the ground, "with their patents in their pockets," "eager to seize the land." The cupidity of our own people, aided by the strong arm of Federal power, had conceived and completed this wholesale act of robbery upon these poor Indians. With the Cherokees and kindred tribes about this time our wholesale system of national rapacity toward this people was thoroughly inaugurated. These and kindred acts of disgraceful injustice were construed by many of our people into a national license to the commission of every act of cruelty and wrong toward the whole Indian race, and from that time to the present has served as a pretext or excuse for any and every act of fraud toward this people. But, sir, the enormity of this great crime on the part of our Government was followed by others of a similar nature. Old treaties were abrogated by the arbitrary and despotic mandates of Federal authority, and new ones prescribed and forced upon the poor Indians at the point of the bayonet whenever their lands were wanted and the Indians refused to surrender their right to them peaceably.

By the treaties between the Government and the Creeks of 1790, 1796, 1802, 1805, 1814, 1818, and 1821, the United States, by its commissioners, guaranteed to the Creek nation the perpetual right to all the lands occupied by them in the State of Georgia. In the ratification of these treaties, the Senate of the United States, as a part of the treaty-making power of the Government, indorsed the bond and affixed its seal to it. The House of Representatives gave its sanction by making the necessary appropriations to carry each of these successive treaties into effect. By these negotiations the Government not only bound itself to secure to the Indians the peaceful and undisputed possession of their lands, but obligated itself to protect them in their full and free enjoyment. (See Statutes-at-Large, vol. 7, page 35, articles five and six of treaty.) And not only this, but they guaranteed them full and ample protection against the rapacity of all white intruders who should attempt to invade their country.

By seven solemn treaties with the Creeks, by eleven equally solemn negotiations with the Cherokees, and as many more with the Chickasaws and Choctaw nations, between the years 1785 and 1825, the Government of the United States, in consideration of the cession of a part of their territory, guaranteed perpetual possession and perfect security in the enjoyment of their rights. To these Indians national faith was pledged, and as often broken. National guaranties of security were given to the Indians without the intention of keeping faith. A system of robbery, rapine, and murder was here inaugurated by Federal sanction and by Federal action, which has resulted in degrading, brutalizing, and annihilating the Indian race.

But there is another example still more striking than these. In the darkest hour of our revolutionary war with Great Britain, when our forefathers were struggling for life against the gigantic power and vast resources of the mother country, the proud mistress of the ocean, a flickering ray of hope was shed on the gloom overshadowing their cause by two treaties of alliance made with the United States, one on the part of France and the other on the part of the Delaware nation, both of them concluded with great solemnity and ratified by acts of Congress in 1778. Great Britain had subsidized the Six Nations, the Mohawks, the Iroquois, and other tribes, and armed them to aid the troops of the Crown in their efforts to defeat the colonial forces. The emissaries of George III had circulated reports among the Indian tribes that the United States designed to extirpate the Indians and take possession of their country; and it was necessary to pledge the faith of the Government to the Delawares by that solemn treaty so as to arrest the disasters of the war and secure the aid and cooperation of that powerful nation. On the 17th of September, 1778, said treaty was concluded at Fort Pitt under the title of "Articles of agreement and confederation," made and entered into by Andrew and Thomas Lewis, esqs., commissioners for and in behalf of the United States of one part, and Captain White-Eyes, Captain John Kill-Buck, jr., and Captain Pipe, deputies and chief men of the Delaware nation of the other part. By this treaty all former offenses were mutually forgiven, and perpetual peace and friendship declared to subsist between the United States and the Delaware nation from thenceforth through all succeeding generations; a perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive, declared; an engagement on the part of the Delawares to aid the United States by furnishing their best and most expert warriors; to permit the United States troops to pass through the lands of the Delaware nation; to supply the colonial troops with corn, meat, horses, and everything else within their power. And in order that the old men, women, and children of the Indians should be protected while their warriors were battling for their own liberties and the liberties of our fathers, the United States agreed to build a fort to shelter and defend them against the dreaded attacks of the Mohawks and the Six Nations, and garrison it with United States troops if any could be spared.

The fourth article provides for the administration of justice by impartial trials before judges or juries of both parties, according to the laws, customs, and usages of the contracting parties, and for the surrender and delivery of criminal fugitives, servants, and slaves escaping from the respective States of the Delaware nation and the United States.

The fifth article declares that the confederation entered into by the Delaware nation and the United States renders the Indians dependent on us for clothing equipments, and munitions of war; to provide for which an Indian trading agent is to be appointed by the United States, with an adequate salary, whose chief aim is to be the advancement of the mutual interests of the confederating parties.

The sixth article recites that—

"The enemies of the United States have endeavored by every artifice in their power to possess the Indians in general with an opinion that it is the design of the States aforesaid to extirpate the Indians and take possession of their country; to obviate such false suggestions the United States do engage to guaranty to the aforesaid nation of Delaware and their heirs all their territorial rights in the fullest and most ample manner, as it hath been bounded by former treaties, as long as they, the said Delaware nation, shall abide by and hold fast the chain of friendship now entered into. And it is further agreed on between the contracting parties, should it be found conducive for the mutual interest of both parties, to invite any other tribes who have been friends to the interest of the United States to join the present confederation and to form a State whereof the Delaware nation shall be the head, and have a representation in Congress."

By the law of nations this treaty bound the United States to protect the rights thus guarantied to the Delaware nation. The territorial right of eminent domain to a State as large as Pennsylvania was expressly conceded to the Delawares as a nation by this treaty. It was under these promises and guarantees that the most expert and best warriors of that nation went forth to battle for the cause of liberty for themselves and our forefathers. Many of the best scouts were drawn from the warriors of the Delawares. Six hundred effective warriors were furnished General Washington by this devoted tribe during one season. The United States and the Delawares were both fighting on the same issue—for independence of the British Crown and of all the world. The brave warriors of the Indian nation fought our battles; the tribe supplied our troops with food and horses; we paid them in continental money, unredeemed specimens of which remain among the Delawares to this day; the war of independence closed with a halo of glory; the celebrated Delaware chief, Hengue Pushees, had won the rank of lieutenant colonel for his courage, daring, and efficiency as a scout. He was gratefully thanked by General Washington for his invaluable services in the war of the Revolution; and this red hero, with his brave followers, went home to their wigwags to prepare for the admission of their State into the Union.

Where are they now? Alas! their braves are no more; their hearts have been broken by our ingratitude, by our base refusal to keep our treaty stipulations. On the 21st of January, 1785, (see Indian Treaties, page 16,) they are removed with the Wyandotts to Ohio and Indiana; this is to be the new State promised them. On the 9th of January, 1789, (page 28,) a part of the land ceded is taken away; on the 3d of August, 1795, (page 49,) many other Indian tribes are placed on the Delaware lands; in June, 1803, (page 74,) their boundaries are diminished; on the 18th of August, 1804, (page 81,) they surrender more of their lands; on the 4th of July, 1805, (page 87,) a new boundary is established, and on the 21st of August, 1805, (page 95,) the Delawares release to the United States a portion of their lands; on the 30th of September, 1809, (page 118,) another cession is made to the United States, and the United States commissioners pretended that the lands allotted to the Delawares and Wyandotts belonged to the Miamis; on the 22d July, 1814, (page 118,) the war with Great Britain induced us to make a second war treaty with the Delawares to procure their aid, and to make a second faithless promise to establish the boundaries of their lands forever; on the 8th of September, 1815, (page 131,) the United States recognized the fidelity of the Delawares in taking up the tomahawk and going on the war-path in defense of their unselfish allies, of the pale faces; on the 3d of October, 1818, they ceded all their lands in Indiana, the Ohio lands having been ceded before; they removed to the White river in Missouri and Arkansas, and on the 24th of September, 1829, (page 326,) they are removed to the lands between the Kansas and Missouri rivers, and a broken fragment of the nation that had gone to Cape Girardeau, in 1793, where they had received a grant from the Spanish governor for lands west of the Mississippi, was also driven west of the Missouri into Kansas. But they are to hold these Kansas lands forever; this was to be their last removal; the boundaries were fixed by two large rivers, and the other two lines made the square complete which they were to hold forever. They were now happy; they had made great progress in agriculture and manufactures, in the raising of horses, sheep, and cattle; and another fragment of the nation had been removed from a fertile, beautiful tract of land on the Sandusky river to a permanent home in Kansas, under the promise that the Delaware nation should thereby be united under one head, and that thirty-six sections of land should be appropriated for the establishment of schools for the education of the Delaware children.

Where are these brave Delawares now? They have been driven from this last permanent home down near the Canadian river, and a pitiful tract of eighteen miles square is all the territory that remains for this once mighty nation which was to form a State; to have representation in Congress; to hold the vast lands held by them in 1778 by fixed boundaries as an independent State. That pitiful tract of eighteen miles square of land would hardly furnish sepulture for the heroes of that nation who have sacrificed their lives in battle in two great wars, and for the martyrs of that nation whose blood has been shed and whose hearts have been broken by the tyranny, ingratitude, and cruelty of this magnanimous Government, whose Christian mission has been proudly proclaimed to the world to be to protect, nourish, cherish, civilize, educate, and defend these wards and pupils of American civilization! With the history of this Indian nation before us, these friends of William Penn, these allies and soldiers of George Washington, these allies and soldiers of General Harrison, will not be disturbed in their new home until some adjoining marauding band of pale-faced robbers covet it and apply to the Government of the United States to further protect, cherish, and befriend their ancient allies, the Delawares, by driving them back to the waste of the American desert, where they will perish of hunger and furnish a poor repast for the prairie wolves!

The Government of the United States will sooner or later be called upon to answer for these crimes against humanity—not before the executive department, which has been instrumental in negotiating these treaties; nor before the Supreme Court, whose decisions have unjustly taken away the protection of treaties and of the Federal Constitution from these children of the Republic; nor before the Senate, where all these unjust treaties have been ratified; nor before the House of Representatives, which has appropriated all the means necessary to carry them into effect, and the blood-money also for the extirpation of this people whom we had agreed to protect; but at the bar of Eternal Justice, where the spirits of the warriors and chiefs of these nations will stand the equals of the Presidents, judges, Senators, and Representatives of our people, and receive judgment on this long indictment—a judgment that shall direct an execution too terrible to be recorded, and without which the awful retributions of Divine Providence could not be sustained.

The confiding Indians believed in the sincerity, the lasting good faith of the Government when they made these first treaties. I now ask this House and the nation if their loss of all faith and confidence in this Government and its people is not as just as it is here easily accounted for? Every one of these treaties were made with the most solemn assurances on the part of the Government that all of their provisions should be fulfilled, knowing at the same time and intending, without even suggesting it to the Indians, that they were to be violated by this moral, Christian nation, whenever a profitable opportunity should present itself.

I have dwelt thus long upon the dealings of our Government with the Indian tribes of the country to show that our past and present wars and disturbances with these people are justly chargeable to heartless usurpations, national bad faith, and cruel treatment toward them, and not to the faithlessness of a few Indian agents, about which we have heard so much of late;—especially from the chairman of the Military Committee of this House, who appears to be the champion of the measure which proposes to turn the management of all our Indian affairs over to the War Department.

Never before were such insignificant causes assigned for such terrible consequences. A nation scourged with war, robbery, and murder for three fourths of a century, for the crimes of an exceptional few of its people, while the most flagrant wrongs are allowed to go unpunished. Who so unmindful of the teachings of history, who so blind to the dealings of God with the nations of the earth, as to believe that the terrible war, the fiery trials, the fearful carnage, the wide-spread desolation, and all the horrors from which our nation is now emerging, crippled, impoverished and demoralized, have been caused by the cruelty a few hard task-masters to some of the four millions of poor down-trodden slaves, whose shackles and chains, if not literally riveted upon them, have been sanctioned by the Federal Government and recognized by the Constitution and laws, from the first dawn of our national existence.

It was for this and other national crimes, and not for the sins of a few task-masters, that the Almighty poured out these vials of divine wrath upon us. Let us not further provoke that wrath; let us commit no more murders, robberies, crimes, and outrages upon these original lords of the land we inhabit; let us turn from the evil of our ways, repent of these our national sins, and restore to these oppressed and suffering children of our "Father who art in heaven," the rights, privileges, and immunities to which they are entitled by every consideration of justice, equity, humanity, and law. As well might the student of sacred history attribute the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire from heaven to the negligence of the keepers of their city gates; the overthrow of Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea to the occasional cruelty of Egyptian task-masters toward the Jewish bondmen, or the destruction of Jerusalem, "that killest the prophets and stonest them that were sent unto thee;" to the disobedience by the Jews of the Mosaic law forbidding the use of fire on the Sabbath, as for the people of these United States to delude themselves with the belief that our recent national calamities and sufferings as well as our present unjust and fruitless Indian wars, with all of their accompanying horrors, are not a just visitation and punishment from the Almighty for these national sins against the black man and the red man, who were committed to our care and protection by Him who ruleth not only the world and all that therein is, but the wide empire of creation.

It was the violation of the laws of humanity, the laws ordained of God for the preservation of the human race, to break the bonds of sin and elevate the souls of men, that has in all ages drawn down his vengeance on guilty nations. In the exercise of this divine retributive justice we see by the light of history such exhibitions of His irresistible power, of His unfailing justice, and of His eternal judgments, that I tremble in view of the terrible record of my own nation, which must be judged before "the high court of Heaven."

Where are the Assyrians, the Egyptians, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans? Where are the cities of Babylon, Nineveh, Tyre, Thebes, Jerusalem, and Tadmor of the wilderness? Rome, once the mistress of the world, captured savages from the Briton and the German tribes, more barbarous and untutored than our own, and used them to grace her cars of conquest and furnish combatants in the arena of the Coliseum, where they were matched in deadly strife against their fellow-savages or ferocious beasts of prey. Where are the descendants of these savages now? Where are the descendants of their Roman oppressors?

Are we imitating the examples of the pagan Romans? We do not capture our red brethren and exhibit them in mortal combat with each other or beasts of prey in our public theaters and parks for the amusement of the populace, but we are, and have always been, engaged in robbing them of their lands, in degrading, murdering, and exterminating them without regard to age or sex. This is the direct effect of the past and present Indian policy of this Government. While the Christian philanthropists are offering up their supplications and making every effort to send the gospel to distant heathen lands, there are to be found not only self-styled philanthropists and professed Christians, but ministers of Christ even who openly advocate the extermination of their Indian brethren with the same tongue that preaches the divine doctrines of love to our neighbor and "peace on earth and good will toward men."

These shameful transactions have not been confined to the poor Creeks, Cherokees, and Delawares alone, but they have extended to every tribe in the country which is under the control of Federal authority, and the man who cannot see other and more potential causes for our Indian wars than the dishonesty of agents, of which we have heard so much of late, is as ignorant of their true cause as he would be of the contents of a volume by the character of its binding. I tell you, sir, it is for the sins of the nation, for its cruelty to these people, that we are, and have been for years, atoning.

The failure of Congress to make timely appropriations, and the holding back of supplies, has done much to irritate the Indians, who, in many instances, have starved and frozen to death on account of the delay in their delivery. The failure of the Government to afford protection to their lives and property upon their own reservations, where they have been guaranteed perfect security and uninterrupted tranquillity, has also had its influence in destroying the confidence of the Indians in our sincerity. But, among other existing causes for our troubles, there have been unprovoked, cold-blooded murders of peaceable Indians by roving adventurers in the West, and the indiscriminate slaughter of individuals, families, and whole camps even, by the Federal soldiery; to a few instances of which I will call the attention of the House.

An outrage so horribly cruel as to exceed almost the bounds of belief was committed upon the Indians at Fort Kearny in 1856. The facts were substantially as follows: two young Indians belonging to a party of Cheyennes were sent to the road to beg some tobacco of the driver of a mail wagon. The driver fired upon them, whereupon one of them, as the Indians themselves afterward said, "being a fool and mad," shot an arrow and wounded the white man. The chief of the Cheyenne party, on seeing this, ran out with others to the protection of the mail driver, and punished the young Indian who had shot the arrow by whipping him according to the Indian laws. But this whipping did not wipe out the Indian boy's offense. An "Indian outrage" must, of course, be made out of the case and the military be called upon to avenge it. The next day, accordingly, the troops from the fort valorously sallied forth and attacked the Cheyenne party, who refused to fight them and ran away, leaving their horses, bows and arrows, and robes in camp. Six young braves remained behind to make something like a formal surrender. They went up to the soldiers, threw down their arms, and held out their hands in sign of submission, and were mercilessly shot down in cold blood when only a few yards from the troops.

During the summer of 1854 some bands of Sioux were encamped within six miles of Fort Laramie. They were regarded as friendly Indians, and were on terms of friendship with the officers of the fort. A man from a neighboring tribe, whose relations had the year before been slaughtered by the troops of the fort, happened to be among these bands of Sioux. Some Mormon emigrants passed by the Indian camp, and a cow escaped from them and ran toward the Indian village. The Indian whose relatives had been killed, by way of revenge for the loss, killed the cow. Complaint was made at the fort, and the chiefs, on being called upon, said they would see that reparation was made for the damage which had been done. But this was not satisfactory to the commanding officer. He detailed a brevet lieutenant with a company to arrest the Indian. The company proceeded to the Indian camp with two pieces of artillery. Demand was made of the chiefs; but the offending Indian said to them:

"I have taken a lodge here. I am willing to die; you have nothing to do with the matter; the responsibility is not upon your people, but upon me alone."

This remark was no sooner made to the lieuten-tenant than he fired, killing one man and crippling the principal chief. The chiefs rallied and exhorted the men to commit no outrage. Their influence controlled the action of the Indians; but a drunken interpreter excited the lieutenant and caused him, perhaps, to fire his cannon. The next thing was the sounding of the war-whoop, and the lieutenant and some of his men were killed. The others ran and were pursued by the Indians, and every man of them was slaughtered.

Who will say, reasoning from analogy and common sense, and especially from a philosophical view of Indian character, that the whites were not to blame in this case? And yet, concealing or distorting the facts, the ears of the public were made to tingle with the report of "another Indian massacre," and an official announcement from the War Department deluded the Government and people into a belief that the affair was an ambush and part of a deliberate plan on the part of the Indians to massacre the troops and plunder the fort.

I will now cite another glaring case of injustice toward the Winnebagoes, a tribe of Indians formerly located in that portion of the northwestern territory which is now embraced within the State of Wisconsin. Our first treaty with these Indians was in 1816; since then we treated with them in 1829, 1832, 1837, 1848, and 1855. In 1862 we find the Winnebagoes located upon a beautiful reservation in the State of Minnesota, where they were prosperous and happy, many of them having acquired a practical knowledge of agriculture and the mechanical arts. Their treaty of February, 1855, had guaranteed to them a permanent home on a reservation eighteen miles square, and a large sum of money. There they had erected their houses, opened their farms, and remained perfectly peaceable. It was at this time that the Sioux outbreak took place in that State, but the Winnebagoes remained steadfast to their treaty obligations. But their time had again come. Their reservation, their lands, their homes were demanded by the people of Minnesota. The permanent homes which the Government had guaranteed to them must be abandoned. Their attachment to the graves of their fathers and friends availed them not. The Government assented; it lent its aid to forcibly violate its own solemn treaty with these friendly Indians, and without the least valid excuse forced them from their comfortable homes to a barren and inhospitable country five hundred miles westward on the Missouri river. There hundreds of these friendly Indians died from exposure and starvation. When sickness and suffering compelled them to seek the settlements for succor they were forced back by military power over stones and ice, marking their trail with the blood that trickled from their lacerated feet.

I have seen among these same friendly Winnebagoes, while thus persecuted by the sanction of the Government, the starving infant struggling with fretful cries at the breast of a dying mother to draw the warmth of life from those nipples chilled and milkless under the embrace of death. Hundreds of these people died then, and their bones are bleaching upon those inhospitable plains as monuments of foul disgrace to our nation, by whose oppressive policy these innocents have been destroyed.

But all of these atrocities pale into insignificance before those committed upon the Indians of California, Oregon, and Washington Territories on the western slope.

The massacre by Chivington at Sand creek, in Colorado, by which hundreds of men, women, and helpless children were butchered in cold blood, is another striking instance of our cruelty.

During the massacre in Minnesota, in 1862, several white women and children were taken captives and carried to the Upper Missouri. Through the interposition of Colonel Galpin and a number of friendly Sioux, who exchanged their own horses for them, two women and five little girls were ransomed and returned to their friends in Minnesota. The Indians who had performed this act of humanity traveled down to the Yanceton agency, a distance of four hundred miles, where they were to be reimbursed for this act by the Government. Week after week passed away, and neither clothing nor food came to the relief of these faithful friends. Despairing of early relief, one morning ten of their number came to me for a letter, stating who they were, and obtained permission to go out and hunt for the support of themselves and families. The third morning out, and when on Ponca creek, about twenty miles back of Fort Randall, which post was then garrisoned by the sixth Iowa cavalry, a Captain Moreland, in command of some twenty men, overtook them. They presented him with the letter I had given them for protection, whereupon the captain requested them to leave their arms and go with him to the fort for food. The Indians obeyed, but had not proceeded eighty rods when the brutal captain ordered his men to fire upon the Indians, who were in advance, and murdered nine out of the ten in cold blood on the spot. The tenth member of the party escaped and bore the horrible tidings of this damnable tragedy to his kindred far up the Missouri, while the bones of his comrades still remain on that fatal spot to chronicle the foul deed and point unmistakably to the cause of the Sioux war which followed with fearful and just retaliation, and cost the Treasury of the nation more than $30,000,000 and the loss of hundreds of innocent lives.

These and other outrages of a kindred character, added to the causes heretofore named, are the source of all our difficulties with the Indians of this country, while most of the tribes located on reservations with annuities, and under the control of agents, have remained peaceable and friendly in spite of the oft-repeated declaration that the dishonesty of these agents has been the sole cause of our difficulties with the people. The only Indian tribes that have been properly protected in the peaceable possession of their reservations since the adoption of the Federal Constitution are those that have been under State and not under Federal rule. In no instance have these tribes commenced any hostilities against the State or Federal authority. The New York and New England Indians, members of the most warlike tribes in colonial times, have never exhibited a single act of hostility during the past eighty-five years; and as the cordon of civilization has been drawn more closely around them they have abandoned their nomadic and savage habits and adopted and cultivated the arts of civilized life.

In view of these facts, which are the result of eighty-five years' experience, and in view of the utter failure of the Federal management of Indian affairs and the destruction of the noblest of the tribes under its charge, it is a question for the gravest consideration of Congress whether it would not be better to turn over to the States and Territories the future management and control of the Indians within their borders. Such a change can by no possibility place the Indians in a worse situation than they are now under the control of the General Government. It might save them from further wars and desolations, and the national Treasury from the enormous drain produced by fraud, military ambition, lawless rapine, and interminable wars resulting therefrom.

The Federal power is too far removed from these helpless children in the far West to be able to defend them against rapacious frontiersmen, who seek incessantly to destroy them and to possess their property, while the State and the territorial authorities are on the ground, ready and willing to do justice. None are so well fitted to take charge of our Indian tribes as the people who reside with them, whose lives and property, whose wives and children are within the reach of the tomahawk and scalping-knife; who are themselves always vitally interested in maintaining peaceful relations with the Indians by a uniform course of just, fair, and impartial dealing. No people are so susceptible and more permanently affected by generous and kind treatment—none more proud, vindictive, and resolute in avenging their wrongs—than the North American Indians.

But, sir, we have exhausted our theories and must face the practical question which now presents itself to us, and from which there is no escape. Aside from the humane and Christian view of the subject, which appears to have been utterly disregarded by our Government in all of its recent dealings with the Indian tribes of the country, we are met here to-day with the earnest, practical question of peace upon the terms of returning national justice and good faith, or of a long and bloody war, waged and prosecuted by the poor, neglected, starving tribes for the God-given right to live. War, with all its cruelties and the lasting train of more destructive evils, has been resorted to and failed. Hundreds of millions from the Treasury of the nation have been expended in trying to exterminate the Indian race by our system of military murders. But, sir, thus far our force has proved unavailing. Our Army, when marshaled against these people by our most renowned leaders, has been shorn of all its power and its glory save that which crowns the murderer's efforts and entwines itself in serpentine coils around the assassin's brow. Some inscrutable power nerves the arms and fires the hearts of the race in its apparently unequal struggle for existence; and judging from the past, our national Treasury will be bankrupt and our country disgraced long before the Indian tribes of the West will be forced into submission by the military power of the Government.

Our Indian wars are costly. The interest of the money expended in the Florida war exceeds double the amount required for our whole Indian service. The Sioux war cost more than thirty million dollars, the bare interest of which is sufficient to subsist the whole Sioux nation through all coming time. Since that time our Indian wars have cost tens of millions, and are still costing many million dollars a year, every dollar of which is voted by this House without a word of complaint. But, sir, let some member get up here and venture to ask an appropriation of the interest of the amount annually expended in keeping up our western armies, to clothe and provision the Indians, and a cry of opposition will be raised that knows no bounds.

But gentleman ask what line of policy do you propose? How are we to reunite the broken cords of friendship and maintain friendly relations with our Indian tribes? There is nothing easier than this. We have but to reverse our past method of dealing with them, treat them kindly, deal justly, and convince them by our acts of humanity and justice that we sincerely desire to befriend and save them. Extend the warm hand of a brother and raise them from their low estate to a position where life will be a blessing, and not a curse. Then will the Indian, whom we have alienated and driven away, lift up his drooping head; the long lost smile will again lighten up his countenance, and he will meet us more than half way in our work of pacification, justice, and humanity.

Instead of sending soldiers armed with instruments of death and munitions of war to demoralize, degrade, and murder them, let us send philanthropists laden with food and clothing to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, and all the implements of peace necessary for their physical, mental, and moral advancement. Make comfortable homes for the poor, wandering tribes, feed and clothe them until they become sufficiently advanced in the arts of civilized life to provide for themselves.

Learn the rising generation to till the soil, instruct them in the mechanic arts, in all the varied duties of domestic life, and raise them as rapidly as possible toward our own standard, thereby fitting them for a better mode of life, and their incorporation as citizens into the States and Territories of the Union.

No class of men are so easily managed, more harmless and reliable, than the North American Indians when once you possess their confidence; none more unmanageable, heartless, and cruel than they when that confidence is destroyed by wrongs and oppression.

But we are told that the expense to the Government of feeding, clothing, and providing homes for our two hundred and fifty thousand Indians will require an enormous annual expenditure. Let it be remembered that nearly or quite one half of them are already on reservations of some sort, and that they have given us very little trouble. The cost to the Government of keeping quiet and supporting them does not exceed $2,000,000 a year. If this policy is adopted and put into practical operation it will be found that for every dollar expended in support of our Indians we shall save five times this amount, which now goes to support the Army in the Indian country.

I am informed that there are now two deficiency appropriations asked for—one of $500,000 for feeding and taking care of some twelve thousand Indians for eight months, under the charge of General Harney, in the Sioux district; the other for $13,000,000, for carrying on our present Indian war in the southwest for the last six months against a much smaller number of Indians. I have learned to-day that there are now engaged in the Indian country and on our western frontiers about forty regiments of troops, including one regiment of cavalry raised in the State of Kansas, which has been in service since last October. The expense to the Government in carrying on this war will exceed $40,000,000 a year if allowed to continue. Instead of protecting the inhabitants of the frontiers they increase their danger; more than two hundred and fifty having been murdered within the past few months. I do not wish to be understood as imputing to the War Department either dishonesty or extravagance. It is the policy alone that I object to. War is at all times costly, especially when carried on as this one is in a country so remote from the source of supplies that the expense of transportation doubles, triples, and in many cases quadruples their original cost.

If this House would take the trouble to ascertain the annual cost to the Government of keeping up the military establishments of the West, which can have no other object than to operate in the Indian country, it will be found to exceed their conceptions so far as to overshadow the comparatively insignificant amount now expended for the civil Indian service of the country, and stop the cry of extravagance whenever an appropriation is asked for feeding and clothing these people. Three years ago I proposed a plan to this House which looked to the setting apart of a large reservation in the northwest for the exclusive use and occupancy of all of the Indian tribes north of the Platte and east of the Rocky mountains; also, another reservation in the remote southwest for the Indians south of the Platte and east of the Rocky mountains. I am still of the opinion that this is the true policy so far as the unlocated tribes are concerned; and that one or two other reservations should be set apart on the Pacific coast for the location of the tribes west of the Rocky mountains.

Upon these reservations all of the tribes should be located except those now provided for and which are advancing in civilization and toward citizenship. This course will close our Indian wars forever; this will restore peace, permanent and enduring in its character. It will do away with the necessity for at least two thirds of our Army. It will save from fifteen to thirty million dollars annually to the national Treasury. It will save hundreds of valuable lives every year. It will obviate untold miseries, wipe out our national injustice, and reclaim the poor, neglected, down trodden Indians from their present state of abject misery and restore them to the enjoyments of life and its attendant blessings, which are the free gift of God to all of his children.

Nearly two years ago Congress authorized and sent into the Indian country a commission composed of some of the first men in the civil and military service. After a thorough investigation had in the heart of the Indian country, and after having sought all the information which promised to throw light upon the subject, these commissioners were forced to the conclusion that the principle cause of our troubles with the warlike tribes is due to the invasion of their country by the whites, our cruelty toward them, and the bad faith manifested on our part in not fulfilling the treaty stipulations which exist between them and the United States.

It was agreed by the commissioners that good faith on the part of the Government toward the Indians, whose means of subsistence we have destroyed and whose homes we have invaded, as well as economy in carrying on the Government, demanded a radical change, and that a pacific policy was the only one which held out a promise of success. Accordingly, treaties were negotiated with most, if not all, of the hostile tribes east of the Rocky mountains, and although the stipulations for food and clothing were long delayed by the Government the thirty thousand Sioux who were parties to the treaty remain perfectly friendly to-day, and will continue so as long as the United States fulfills its part of the said treaty.

General Harney, an officer of the regular Army, who has seen more than fifty years of honorable service, much of which has been in the Indian country, was selected as one of the commissioners. He was present and took part in making all of these late treaties. He knew just what they contained, what they meant, and was wisely selected to take charge of the large district which had been set apart for the sole use and occupancy of the Sioux nation. It was late in the season when this veteran officer undertook the herculean task of locating and feeding these Indians through the approaching winter. The only means of transportation to the district was up the Missouri river, the waters of which were so low as to more than double the cost of transportation. There had been but $200,000 placed in his hands to enable him to carry into effect the solemn treaty with the Sioux, who, upon the faith of its guarantees, had just abandoned the war path and pledged themselves to a future life of peace and friendship. The number of Indians who, by the terms of this treaty, were to receive a pound of beef and a pound of flour per day exceeded twenty-five thousand in number. Provision had to be made to feed them for at least six months. After making allowance for those who could not get into the reservation before spring, it was estimated that fifteen thousand would have to be subsisted for at least six months before supplies could reach them in the spring. This alone would require three million six hundred thousand pounds of beef, which, at a cost of—

Twelve cents per pound, amounts to.....	$432,000
And 3,600,000 pounds of flour, at ten cents per pound.....	360,000
Total.....	$792,000

In addition to these articles it was provided by treaty that houses should be built, saw-mills erected, horses and cattle purchased, farming and mechanical implements supplied for the use of the Indians; for the faithful performance of which General Harney was provided with the insignificant sum of $200,000. He went forward, encountered the difficulty, and overcame it. He realized that the issues of peace and war were in his hands. To fail to carry out the letter and spirit of the treaty was to rekindle the flame of a long, cruel, and costly Indian war throughout the Northwest, while the discharge of the national obligation promised the enjoyment of peace and tranquillity throughout that entire section of the country which had so long been the scene of savage warfare. By the honest, fearless, and determined efforts of this just man, this true patriot and philanthropist, the peace and safety of our frontiers have been secured, a long and cruel war arrested, and millions of dollars saved to the Treasury, while the warmest gratitude of unnumbered thousands of our citizens in the Northwest attest the value of the meritorious services which he has rendered to them and the country.

But two methods for the adjustment of these difficulties are now thought of. That proposed and so successfully inaugurated by the peace commission commends itself to the favorable consideration of the Christian statesman, the philanthropist, and the true economist. By its adoption the Indians will witness our returning good faith and rejoice; they will abandon the war-path and settle down upon their reservations; peace and safety will reign uninterruptedly throughout our entire territorial domain; hope will once more be lighted in the red man's heart, and the spirit of his brave progenitors will again elevate his depressed nature. On the contrary, if war, murder, robbery, and rapine are to be persisted in, and the policy of extermination, or subjugation even, is to be carried out, our frontiers are doomed to a fresh baptism of fire and blood unparalleled in the history of Indian warfare, and our national Treasury will be doomed to inevitable bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, I have entered on the last month of my congressional duties. I neither ask nor desire political honors. A sense of duty alone has prompted me to the consideration of this subject. On the page of my country's history these feeble utterances in behalf of this down-trodden race will stand as a lasting admonition of past cruelty and neglect toward all the Indian tribes of this country, and as a warning of judgments to come, if time continues and God reigns, unless we discharge the obligations which He has imposed upon this Government toward this oppressed and persecuted people.

Equal Suffrage and the Material Development of the Country.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN R. FRENCH,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1869,

On the constitutional amendment relating to suffrage and the material development of the country.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, we hear much of the "lessons learned of the war." And there have been lessons well learned, many and valuable; of value to us and to our children, and of priceless value to the nations that may come after us. But in my judgment, sir, the great lesson of the war, the one which towers above all others in the infinitude of its worth, and in which we find the recompense for the great cost of the conquest, is this: the conviction which has come home to the hearts of the American people that there is a God. Our fathers were a God-fearing people, but we, their children, with the professions of our fathers upon our lips, were in our hearts and lives a nation of blank atheists. So the war found us; so it was prosecuted through its first sad years. But through terrific sacrifice and overwhelming disappointment and discomfiture we slowly learned that there was a God of justice, who held nations as well as individuals to a stern stewardship. When we had learned this lesson, then the negro was welcomed to the ranks; then the nation put its hand to the proclamation of emancipation; then victory came and encamped with our armies, for then we were fighting side by side with God's eternal equities.

This living belief in God has lifted the nation up out of its stupid sensuality, its sordid worship of gold and love of personal aggrandizement, and the public conscience begins to recognize questions of right and duty, and the single eye of honest intent begins to discern not only the purpose of God in all our past history, but catches gleams of the growing light of His providence, which is opening up our future way. So long as this faith burns in the public heart so long will the nation march with a firm and reliant step along the high road of prosperous success. In this faith the nation to-day demands equal suffrage for all her citizens; the ballot, which is at once authority and protection, a badge of power, and a shield of defense, a schoolmaster for the ignorant, a lifter-up of the lowly, and a bond of fraternal union for all. I am glad to mark the indications that this Congress is ready to respond to this demand of the public conscience, and ready to take steps for planting this doctrine of equal suffrage in the fundamental law of the land.

When during this debate the eternal right and equity of the proposition has been pressed upon our attention, men who yet grope in the twilight have told us of the different colors of the human family, as if human rights were to be measured by such accidents, and essayed to prejudice the measure by stigmatizing it as a proposition for the benefit of the negro race. What if it be so? The dogma that "the negro has no rights which a white man is bound to respect" is dead, as well as its great judicial expounder.

When the nation was in the hour of its direst peril General Sherman was consulted as to the wisdom of arming the negro. "If you place the musket in his hands, and he perils his life for the nation," replied the brave and true man, "it would be very mean afterward to withhold from the same hands the ballot." And so answers the heart and conscience of every man in whose veins flows blood and not water. And he was armed—two hundred thousand black men stepped forth to the defense of the nation, and under perils unknown to the white soldier. They led the terrible assaults at Port Hudson and Fort Wagner, and with their dead bodies filled the trenches at Petersburg and Richmond that the soldiers of the Union might march over to victory.

History, sir, will compel us to say that it was the black skin that could always be trusted; it was the black man who never betrayed; where ever you found a negro there was a soul loyal to the Union and true to our country's flag. Never in the annals of history was there such an example of universal fidelity and faith. Among the twelve Apostles of our Saviour there was a Judas. There was a traitor among the Spartan band of Leonidas. Our revolutionary army had its Benedict Arnold. The cause of Hungary had its Gorgey, who betrayed it at Villagos. The cause of Henry VI and Warwick was lost by the desertion of Clarence. Harold, the Saxon, was betrayed by his own brother, Tosti. Maximilian had his Lopez, and in short, as far back as history carries us into the dominions of the past, treason has played its part. There was no cause, no army, no faith, without its traitors, until the universal experience of mankind was challenged, for the first time in history, by the example of the negro race. Of four million negroes there was not one who betrayed the man who came to him with the magic words, "I am a Union soldier, help me, hide me, save me, my colored friend!" Show me a case in history which is equal to this of a whole race of millions of black men and women throughout the land of whom there was not one who would not have risked his own life for the white Union soldier or refugee who invoked his protection; not one to whom it may not be said in the day of judgment, "I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in."

Such faithful allies in the hour of its victory the nation could not spurn, and in the insurgent States she promptly acknowledged their right to vote. And through such sacrifices as you who were not witnesses can little understand they so voted as to reestablish civil and loyal government in seven of those rent and distracted States. In the light, then, of experience does not the trial of black voting in the South warrant its extension to all the States? Where in all the history of the world has there been better voting than by the colored men of the rebel States during these last eighteen months? And does not the nation owe it to these faithful friends and their white Union allies in the South that she lift the ban from colored voting and make it universal throughout the Republic?

Placing ourselves squarely upon our republican principles, in unquestioning faith that they are to fill and redeem the earth, making all its waste places glad, let us enter upon our grand destiny. Every citizen protected in all rights, the humblest most cared for, the Republic meaning justice and peace, let us turn our attention to the development of the uncounted resources of our country, this grand continent, the first lifted above the waters, but withheld from man's occupancy until the fullness of time when freedom should come down from Heaven to dwell with the children of earth.

We are thirty-five millions, and not a man of us a slave, and garnered from the best blood of all the nations. With common rights and a common inheritance and common hopes, with stout and cheerful heart, let us to our work. Plant and till these rich valleys and broad prairies, capable of feeding the world, until they shall smile with an unwonted luxuriance. Let none of our grand rivers longer run idly to the sea, but with the music of the water-full mingle the hum of the loom and spindle, and the happy shouts of well-paid labor. Let our mines no longer slumber in the sleep of ages, but on mountain slope and through hushed valleys light the fires of the furnace and awaken the ring of the forge until new settlements shall shout to their fellows through all our happy borders. Let us extend our railroads and devise new ones. Somebody has said that "iron is the great civilizer of the age," and it may be added, never more so than when stretched across States and continents in the form of railroad bars. Railroads make neighbors and friends of those who else would be strangers and aliens, bind distant peoples with a common interest, develop business, multiply population, quicken thought, and hasten action. Already has the nation's wise munificence nearly completed a grand iron road across the continent. The rich commerce of the East awaits its completion to come to us, while they in turn await the coming of our institutions and our civilization. And other lines of iron railway should be laid across the continent for reasons that I may not stop here to enumerate. A few weeks since the arguments for a northern line were right royally presented in the exhaustive speech of the honorable gentleman from Minnesota. A like statement could be made in behalf of a southern line more directly connecting the rising and soon to be important States of the South with the Pacific coast. Across these grand national railways is to flow the commerce of the world. With trade will ride ideas and sentiments, and while Asia and the islands of the sea shall give us of their wealth we shall return to them the thoughts and teachings of our better civilization. The Orient and the Occident, no longer distant and stranger, shall become neighbor and friend, and quickened by common sentiment, keep step in the march of life.

But we are often warned, sir, in this House not further to squander the "people's land" upon railroads. What is the land worth to the "people" without railroads? We are also reminded that the nation is heavily in debt, poor, and burdened with taxation. Indeed we are in debt, and grievously taxed; but we are not poor, but beyond all other nations rich in all manner of resources, and the sensible way of lightening taxation and paying debts lies not through despair and idleness, but by the energetic and courageous development and working of these native resources. Let me submit for the consideration of the House a few significant figures, telling what railroads have already done in our own and other countries in the way of developing trade and wealth.

Great Britain has about four thousand miles of navigable waters. For a number of years prior to 1833 the exports and imports of that country had averaged about $400,000,000; but during the seven succeeding years lines of railroads were constructed which have been added to from year to year, and the construction of railroads and increase of commerce is shown to be as follows:

Years.	Miles of railroad.	Total exports and imports.
1840.....	1,200	$581,000,000
1845.....	2,441	659,000,000
1850.....	6,733	840,000,000
1855.....	8,334	1,227,000,000
1860.....	10,433	1,832,000,000
1865.....	13,289	2,393,000,000
1867.....	-	2,500,000,000

Thus it will be seen that the commerce of Great Britain, which had increased but little for many years, received a new impulse from railroad development, and from $400,000,000 in 1833 reached the enormous sum of $2,500,000,000 in 1867.

Let us now see what effect the construction of railroads has had upon the commerce of France, whose people are blessed with about seventy-seven hundred miles of navigable waters.

The following figures will show the progress of commercial development in connection with railroad construction in that country:

Years.	Miles of railroad.	Total exports and imports.
1840.....	564	$403,000,000
1845.....	847	475,000,000
1850.....	1,807	500,000,000
1855.....	3,315	845,000,000
1860.....	5,586	1,134,000,000
1865.....	8,130	1,432,000,000
1867.....	-	1,440,000,000

Here it will be seen that commercial prosperity kept pace with railroad construction; so that from $403,000,000 in 1840 the exports and imports of France increased to $1,440,000,000 in 1867.

I will now bring to the attention of the House the remarkable effect that the construction of railroads has had upon the trade of the two busy little States of Belgium and Netherlands. While under the Government of the United Netherlands their commerce reached a point of considerable importance; but at the time of their separation, in 1830, the total exports and imports of the Netherlands were nearly treble those of Belgium, resulting mainly from the fact of superior means of transportation by canals and by sea; but in 1835 Belgium commenced the construction of a wise system of railroads so as to give her an outlet into Germany, Austria, and France.

Immediately production and trade received a powerful impulse, and with the progress of her railroad system the commerce of Belgium increased in a ratio unparalleled by that of any other nation on earth. The soil was more skillfully tilled; valuable mines were opened; furnaces and workshops were erected, and the little State, insignificant in point of territorial extent, outstripping her neighbor, the Netherlands, has taken a first-class position as a producing and commercial people. The following figures may prove interesting as showing the progress of commerce in Belgium in relation to railroad construction, and the manner in which she outran the Netherlands in the race of progress:

Years.	Miles of railroad.	Total exports and imports.
1835.....	-	$53,000,000
1839.....	185	77,000,000
1845.....	235	130,000,000
1853.....	720	232,000,000
1860.....	1,037	352,000,000
1862.....	1,130	380,000,000
1864.....	1,350	475,000,000

I now wish to compare the figures showing the commerce of those two countries, calling attention to the fact that the Netherlands constructed no considerable extent of railroads until as late as 1856, and that she possessed vastly superior advantages over Belgium in the way of water communication by means of her extensive canals and by the river Rhine, commanding the trade of Germany:

Years.	Total exports and imports.
1835 Belgium.....	$53,000,000
1835 Netherlands.....	105,000,000
1839 Belgium.....	77,000,000
1839 Netherlands.....	130,000,000
1862 Belgium.....	380,000,000
1862 Netherlands.....	285,000,000
1867 Belgium.....	475,000,000
1867 Netherlands.....	322,000,000

This enormous production and interchange of wealth is the result of the labor of a population of a little more than four million five hundred thousand, on a territory of eleven thousand four hundred and two square miles, Belgium being, in fact, but little larger than the State of Maryland.

Now, with that pride which is the right of all of us, I turn to a table showing the progress of railroad construction and commercial development in the United States:

Years.	Miles of railroad.	Total exports and imports.
1830.....	41	$160,000,000
1840.....	2,197	239,226,000
1845.....	4,522	232,000,000
1850.....	7,475	330,000,000
1855.....	17,398	533,625,000
1860.....	28,771	762,300,000
1866.....	37,027	1,003,000,000

Here we see the commerce of the United States, which in 1830 amounted to $160,000,000 reach the enormous sum of $1,003,000,000 in 1866; and while Great Britain, India, France, Belgium, and the United States had a total commerce in 1840 of $1,471,000,000, in 1866 their commerce reached the startling sum of $6,003,000,000.

The pro rata increase of exports and imports of those countries since 1833, for each mile of railroad constructed, is as follows:

Countries.	Yearly exports and imports per mile of railroad.
Great Britain.....	$110,000
France.....	69,000
India.....	65,000
Belgium.....	33,000
United States.....	25,000

As I have just shown, the total exports and imports of those countries increased from 1840 to 1866, a period of twenty-six years, $4,532,000,000, while the increase of railroads during the same period was sixty-three thousand and eighteen miles, which gives an average increase of $71,000 of commerce every mile of railroad built.

Previous to the opening of the Erie canal, in 1827, the tonnage crossing the Allegheny range in both directions, and from the lakes to New York, did not exceed 15,000 tons. This tonnage consisted almost wholly of merchandise going west, the cost of transportation being a complete bar to the movement east of western produce. The only outlet of the interior was the Mississippi river with its tributaries, the navigation of which was tedious and hazardous, and so expensive as to leave little profit either to the forwarder or the producer.

HO. OF REPS.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

The opening of the Erie canal was an epoch in the commerce of the country, but it exerted for the first ten years but little influence beyond the route immediately traversed. So late as 1836 the total amount of tonnage from the western States coming through this channel to tide-water equaled only 56,000 tons. Before the western States could avail themselves of it, they had to connect their territories with it and with the lakes by canals or by the best earth roads they could construct. In 1846 the amount of western produce reaching tide-water by canal was 419,000 tons. In 1851, the date of the opening of the Erie railroad and the removal of the restrictions on the transportation of freight on the New York Central railroad, (which was first opened in the fall of 1842,) the tonnage of western produce on the canal had reached 965,993 tons. This tonnage measured to a very great extent the commerce then existing between the eastern and western States. In 1867 the united through tonnage of the five great lines between the two sections—the Erie canal, the New York Central, Erie, Pennsylvania, and Baltimore and Ohio railroads—equaled 6,000,000 tons, having a value of $1,200,000.

In the light of these facts and figures I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is wise statesmanship for the nation to aid these great lines of Pacific railway, now petitioners at our doors. Yet there is another grand duty kindred, indeed, urgently claiming the attention of Congress, which I would briefly discuss. Railroads are continental, but the ocean washes all lands; and if we would be "a power among the nations" we must command the seas. Pirate craft built in English waters by English gold and manned with English seamen and permitted to go to sea by an English Government, joined later by the depreciated condition of our currency and the heavy impost on all shipbuilding materials and ship supplies have annihilated more than fifty per cent. of our tonnage. We must not resign our strength upon the ocean; and it seems to me, sir, almost the first duty of the American Congress to legislate for its rescue. I give interesting statistics, setting forth both the growth and decline of our commerce, found in a valuable paper on "American shipping," by an observant merchant of Boston:

"In 1789 our shipping comprised about 200,000 tons. On the 30th of June, 1861, it had reached 5,500,000 tons, and was nearly as large as that of all the maritime nations combined, excepting Great Britain. At the latter date the United States had attained a position in the first rank among the maritime Powers; our flag was seen in every port upon the globe; our merchants were competing successfully for the traffic, under canvas, of every ocean; and they participated with profit even in the carrying trade between different ports of the British empire. This great interest had been to that time a source of strength to our Government, a source of wealth to our people. But since 1861 the almost uninterrupted growth of three quarters of a century has been reversed, and a steady decline has been going on which, it would seem, is still in progress, and which must be expected to continue unless arrested by prompt, earnest, and adequate measures of relief.

"The total tonnage of the United States on the 30th of June, 1867, is given by the Register of the Treasury Department at 3,368,615 tons. The total reported on the 30th of June, 1861, was 5,539,815 tons, which was the highest point ever gained by us. The decline for the six years thus indicated is 1,671,198 tons, or about thirty per cent. But in order to be precise in our statements of fact, and intelligent, therefore, in our judgment, it is necessary to separate the national tonnage into two divisions—that which is employed in the internal commerce of the country upon the rivers and lakes and along our coast, and that which is engaged in foreign trade. The figures for the former, or, as it is called, the enrolled and licensed tonnage, are as follows:

In 1867.....2,514,380

Difference.....382,805

"We have here a falling off of thirteen per cent. But, although the tonnage of 1861, as a whole, exceeded that of any year before or since, the enrolled and licensed tonnage reached its highest point in 1864:

In 1864 it was.....3,404,506
In 1867 it was.....2,214,380

Difference.....890,126

"This shows a decline during the three years, in the internal water-borne transportation facilities of the country of twenty-six per cent. But we do not here see the full decline. Since the 30th of June, 1864, a new method of measuring vessels has been in use in the United States, and many spaces were not taken into the measurement which before were not taken into the account. The proportion between the new system and the old changes with every difference of model, and it is difficult to reach an exact estimate in reference to it: the authorities of the Department think that from ten to fifteen per cent. would cover it. If we subtract only ten per cent. from the tonnage of 1867, to bring it to the same terms with that of 1864, we have the following result:

Domestic tonnage in 1864.....3,404,506
Domestic tonnage in 1867.....2,514,380
Less ten per cent.....251,438

Difference.....2,141,564

"We have declined, it would seem, in our domestic tonnage, thirty-three per cent. in the last three years; and these years, be it remembered, were years of peace, and of at least average commercial activity. If this is the condition of the coasting trade, which is jealously protected against all competition from without, what is likely to be the case in regard to the registered tonnage, that is, the tonnage engaged in foreign commerce, in rivalry with all the world? The official report gives us the following information:

1861, registered tonnage, sail.....2,540,020
1861, registered tonnage, steam.....102,608

1867, registered tonnage, sail.....1,178,715
1867, registered tonnage, steam.....173,520

Difference.....1,288,393

"This shows a loss of nearly fifty per cent. But, as before, if we would reach the exact truth, we must allow for the new system of admeasurement.

Registered tonnage, 1861.....2,642,628
Registered tonnage, 1867.....1,354,235
Less ten per cent.....135,423

Difference.....1,218,812

"The absolute decline, therefore, in the foreign tonnage of the country, from 1861 to 1867, has been fifty-four per cent., or nearly a million and a half tons.

"Let us examine this state of things in another aspect. From almost the beginning of our history as a nation our traffic upon the sea has been steadily increasing, with occasional reverses, as between 1811 and 1814, and 1818 and 1825. Even during the period of the last war with Great Britain our foreign tonnage fell off only twelve and a half per cent., although it should be said that during the two years previous to that war it fell off twenty-two per cent. We have prepared the following table for the purpose of indicating the changes which have taken place in the registered tonnage of the country for the eight years from 1789 to 1797, and from 1797, by decades, to 1867:

Year.	Reg'd tonnage.	Change.	Rate of change.
1797.	597,777, increase in 8 yrs.	473,884 or 384 1/2 p.c.
1807.	848,307, " 10	250,530	42
1817.	800,725, decrease in 10	47,582	5 1/2
1827.	747,170, " 10	53,555	6 1/2
1837.	810,447, increase in 10	63,277	8 1/2
1847.	1,241,313, " 10	430,866	53 1/2
1857.	2,463,067, " 10	1,222,664	98 1/2
1867.	1,354,235, decrease in 10	1,108,732	45

"This table shows an average gain of eighty and a half per cent. for the periods given, including the remarkable growth which took place between 1789 and 1797, when, in consequence of the wars then prevailing among the maritime Powers of Europe, our foreign tonnage increased three hundred and eighty-four and a half per cent., and including also the decades between 1807 and 1827, when there was a decrease of five and a half and six and a half per cent., respectively. As the period from 1789 to 1797 may be considered exceptional, let us look at the growth of our foreign tonnage during the three decades between 1827 and 1857: the first of these shows an increase of only eight and a half per cent., and yet the average of the three is fifty-three and three eighths per cent. In looking forward in 1857 through the coming ten years, it would not have been thought extravagant to anticipate an increase equal to the average of the previous thirty years. Let us see how much this difference really is, between what in 1857 would not have been an unreasonable anticipation, and the existing fact:

In 1857 our foreign or registered tonnage was, 2,463,967 or instead of a gain of fifty-three and three eighths per cent., a loss of sixty-eight per cent.; and leaving our foreign tonnage less than one third of what in 1857 we should have been justified by past experience in estimating that it would be."

With this showing, patent to all the world, is it not our duty to readjust our tariff rates, now discriminating so injuriously against this right arm of the nation's power and wealth, and make haste to get back to the rock bottom on which the nations of the earth transact business? How can our shipping interest, with our depreciated currency, compete in the maritime centers of the globe with tonnage built on a gold basis?

As the result of the depreciation of our currency and the severity of our taxation we have it on the authority of a member of this House, Hon. Mr. PIKE, of Maine, that a thousand-ton ship would cost a builder of his State $85,000 in currency, while a similar vessel could be built in the adjoining British provinces for $45,000 in gold; and, as was truly said by this gentleman in the House last winter:

"It is apparent that our ships cannot compete with foreign ships, when the difference of cost is so great, unless a corresponding advantage is in some way given to them in the way of employment. But the House is aware that an American ship has no such advantages. She competes with her great rival on a free-trade basis. The St. John ship comes into the port of New York and gets the same freight and is subject to the same insurance as the American ship. The only privilege the American ship has is that of the coastwise trade, and that is hardly appreciable."

But the great blow given our commerce was dealt by the English-built pirates, and the perfidious English Government should be held to the sternest accountability. A recent writer in one of our popular magazines treats of this subject with such excellent sense that I must beg indulgence while I give a page or two of his sterling argument:

"The restoration of amity with Great Britain is of the utmost importance to both nations. It is not merely the amount of our claim and interest, now seven millions sterling, a large portion of which is held by English insurance companies, that is involved, but great interests of both nations suffer from the questions between them, and the British provinces suffer more than either nation. While Great Britain asserts her claim to San Juan, denies compensation for all our losses, even for the ships of our whalers burned in time of peace by her cruisers in the Arctic sea, and declines to punish any of her pirates who return to her ports after their ravages on the deep; while she seeks to awe the United States by military roads and new batteries at Halifax and Victoria; while she arrests our naturalized citizens, and claims their allegiance after she has banished them from her soil and we have adopted them—hostile tariffs, consular fees, and interdicts must succeed to moderate duties and treaties of reciprocity. Great Britain requires the wheat of California and Minnesota, the corn, beef, and pork of Illinois, the petroleum, bark, and clover-seed of Pennsylvania, at least thirty thousand tons of the cheese of New York and New England, and the market which eight million prosperous families afford. We require her metals, chemicals, and other products. We need the fisherman's salt, wood, and timber, the herrings, alewives, salmon, eggs, cattle, wool, barley, white wheat, and potatoes of Canada; and Canada needs our corn, tobacco, pork, carriages, coal, and manufactures.

"The townships which lie between the St. Lawrence and New England can best supply our factory towns with hay, oats, barley, cattle, horses, and potatoes in exchange for the products of New England. England has ever held her colonies with tenacity, but her American provinces have now grown to man's estate; she has abandoned her colonial system, and draws her pine and spruce chiefly from Norway; she gives her colonists no priority in her markets. They have few interests in common with her; for the last decade their trade has been chiefly with us, and not with each other. Nova Scotia is commercial; New Brunswick is devoted to shipbuilding and lumber; Canada and Prince Edward Island are agricultural. While they might easily enter as States into our Republic, they are not homogeneous, and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would be powerless in Canada. At the present moment Great Britain incurs an annual expense of four or five millions sterling to protect them from the Fenians, and derives from their trade no equivalent for the outlay. As members of our Union they would partake of a coasting-trade we cannot concede to British subjects, and enjoy the free trade of a continent. If our debt is larger than theirs, our wealth, population, and resources are proportionate to our interest. The possession of the provinces weakens Great Britain; it would add to the strength and commerce of our Union. It would bring to us an amount of shipping which would compensate for two thirds of our losses by the war. In the century which expires in 1869 our population will have increased from two and a half millions to forty millions, or sixteen-fold. In another century, at this rate of increase, our population will exceed that of China and require the entire continent. We now hold Maine and Alaska, which overlap the territory of Great Britain, and we already require the forests and arable lands of British America.

"Nearly the whole British America, from Lake Superior to the Pacific, is now held by the Hudson Bay Company as a hunting-field, and yields it a revenue of $275,000 only, or five per cent. less than the cost of Alaska. What a field is there found for Secretary Seward! Were British America annexed we should require no barriers or custom-houses from Quebec to Sitka, and should save in the revenue we now lose by smuggling and custom-house expenses the interest of twice the cost of Alaska. Is not the acquisition of British America and the admission of the provinces as States of our Union the true solution of our questions with Great Britain? Were the provinces members of our Union we should at once relinquish the interoceanic railway through the wilds of New Brunswick and complete the European and American line from Halifax and Louisbourg to Bangor, and thus reduce to six days the run from the Cove of Cork to Boston, and reach Japan in four weeks from London. We should at once deepen the canals of the St. Lawrence, make a ship-canal around Niagara, carry the navigable waters of the St. Lawrence into Lake Champlain, and join hand in hand with the people of the provinces in opening the railway from Lake Superior to the Red River of the North and the forks of the Missouri. Thus should we open to commerce the great wheat-fields of the Assiniboin, Saskatchewan, and Peace rivers, where the elk and buffalo of the plains now resort to calve and winter.

"A ton of sugar is now carried from Boston to Chicago, via Ogdensburg, for six dollars, and may be taken for the same rate to the head of Lake Superior; with a direct railway finished to the Red river wheat may at this rate be taken from the valley of the Saskatchewan to Boston or New York for twenty-five cents a bushel. The prolific West requires new avenues to the sea-board, and the cheapest route is by propellers to the foot of Lake Ontario, and thence by rail to the sea-shore.

"Under the census of 1860 our annual yield of Indian corn was returned at eight hundred and thirty-six million bushels, while wheat was comparatively deficient—actually less by one third than the yield of France, as it was but one hundred and seventy-two million bushels in 1859, the year preceeding the census. It gave us, however, seventeen million bushels in grain and flour for exportation in 1860. Since 1859 the high price of flour has stimulated production; new farms have been opened, and new railways built in Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and the culture of wheat has become more profitable than the gold mines in California; and this year, with a propitious season, our crop of wheat is rated at nearly three hundred million bushels, which should give a surplus of one hundred million bushels for exportation. Nor have we yet reached the maximum of production. The land and climate of Minnesota, on the route of the North Pacific, the valleys of the Red river of the North, the Assiniboin and Saskatchewan rivers are adapted to winter wheat, and give larger and surer crops than Ohio or Illinois. A short railway of two hundred and fifty miles from the head of Lake Superior to the Red River, which may be built for half the money paid out in dividends at Boston on the 1st of July, would open to commerce those valleys, and permit the delivery of their wheat at a freight of thirty cents a bushel in Boston. In the rich valleys and on the fertile hillsides of California wheat yields, without fertilizers, more than fifty bushels to the acre; and a single man, with the aid of improved mechanism—reapers, drums, and threshers—raises five thousand bushels. There ten farmers, or one farmer with nine assistants, can load a ship of a thousand tons with wheat costing the farmer but twenty-five cents per bushel; and, at one time last spring, there were one hundred and fifty ships on their way from San Francisco to the Atlantic ports, laden with seven million bushels of wheat, the only check to production being a deficiency of ships, and the circuit by Cape Horn, which allows a ship to make but one voyage to the year. Were a canal cut through the isthmus each ship could make two voyages in a year, and with the screw each ship could make five voyages, in place of two, each season to New York. So large is the area fit for wheat fields in California and Oregon, that, after reserving ample space for vineyards and sheep-walks, which nearly equal the culture of wheat in importance, twenty thousand men—actually less than the emigration of a single year—could produce there annually a hundred million bushels, on three thousand square miles, near navigable waters, and load two thousand ships of one thousand tons with wheat. One fourth of those ships might be built annually on the coasts of California, Oregon, the Straits of Fuca and Alaska; for there the towering pines and cedars stand waiting for the shipwrights on the very sea-shore, and the first freight of wheat would suffice to pay one third of the cost of construction.

"A nation like ours, with a front on each ocean, and such resources should, by due concessions and subsidies, set the shipwright in motion and should connect the two oceans."

This nation, Mr. Speaker, cannot go backward; neither can she stand still, if she would, either in her defense of liberty or in her grand material enterprises. Her only way is forward and upward! The American people have suffered for principle, and learned how good a thing it is to make sacrifices in the line of duty. Let us stand fast by the faith born of such experience, remembering that we lead the nations in the march of civilization. Above our heads burns the star of empire! Our fathers' God still encompas with us. His Providence, like a pillar of light, leads the way. The nation is brought squarely face to face with the doctrine of the proposed constitutional amendment. We cannot do otherwise than accept the issue. To falter on this question is alike false to our fathers and treacherous to our children. Let the Republic grow until she fills the continent; but let her support and guarantee be the common love and the common sacrifice of all her citizens, native and adopted, white and black, Americans all, with equal voice and equal protection. Peace unbroken will then reign in all our borders, and the eternal blessing succeed all our efforts for material and commercial growth. To-day we are a new people, born of sacrifice and baptized in blood. Master and slave, years of indolence and vice, paltry counseling of our fears, and a cowardly lack of faith in truth and right, are all of the past. Let us catch the quickening spirit of the new dispensation and resolutely go forward to the material conquest of this glorious continent of ours, and the establishing of freedom among mankind.

"Ring out the old, ring in the new;
Ring out the false, ring in the true!
Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right;
Ring in the common love of good!
Ring out old shapes of foul disease,
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold,
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace!
Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land;
Ring in the Christ that is to be!"

In Dresden there is an iron egg, the history of which is something like this: a young prince sent this iron egg to a lady to whom he was betrothed. She received it, held it in her hand, and looked at it with disdain. In her indignation that he should send her such a gift she cast it to the earth. When it touched the ground a spring, cunningly hidden in the egg, opened, and a silver yolk rolled out. She touched a secret spring in the yolk and a golden chicken was revealed. She touched a spring in the chicken and a ruby crown was found within. She touched a spring in the crown and within it was a diamond marriage-ring. The great God in his mystery threw down to us an iron egg. It was rusted with tears and clotted with blood. We took it in our hands and looked at it. We lifted our eyes to Heaven and said, "Great Father, what broods of devils may be hatched from this?" but as we let it fall a spring was touched and a silver yolk rolled out that spread like a broad shield of patriotism all over the land in the days that followed the dismantling of Sumter. When the spring was touched again there came out, not a single golden chicken, but a glorious brood of them—Ellsworth, Banks, Burnside, Hooker, Foot, Siegel, Shields, Logan, Meade, McPherson, Sheridan, Sherman, Grant. Then we found each a spring, and when we touched the spring we found within each a ruby for a crown. Shields gave us Winchester; Logan, Donelson; McPherson, Vicksburg; Sheridan, Five Forks; Sherman, the Carolinas; Farragut gave us New Orleans and Mobile; Grant, the noblest Roman of them all, gave us the Republic. When all these rubies were gathered we put them in a crown, and in the crown there was a spring. We touched it, and within was the diamond ring of Union, unbroken still! And with God's help we have placed it on the nation's finger, and she shall wear it evermore. Grant's election is a grand augury of the nation's future peace, prosperity, and perpetuity. GOD SAVE THE REPUBLIC!

REMARKS OF HON. S. M. CULLOM,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1869.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 621) to authorize the building of a military and postal railway from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York—

Mr. CULLOM said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill before the House proposes to authorize the building of a military and postal railroad from this city to New York. It proposes to charter a company to be called the New York and Washington Railway Company, which shall have perpetual succession; which shall have power in the name of and on behalf of the United States to survey, locate, lay out, construct, equip, maintain, operate, use, collect tolls upon, and enjoy a continuous line of railway of one or more tracks between the political capital of the nation and the great commercial city of the nation. It does not propose that the Government of the United States shall appropriate any money to accomplish this great object. I believe I may say that there is no exact precedent for this proposed legislation. The Government has never yet done exactly what is proposed now to be done by the passage of this bill. It has appropriated money for internal improvements of one kind and another from the beginning of the Government, but has never undertaken to charter railroad companies. There have been millions of dollars appropriated by the Government for the improvement of harbors, for deepening channels of rivers, and for building post roads in different parts of the country. Such appropriations, so far as rivers and harbors are concerned, are made annually by the Government, and the difficulty is not that anybody questions our right to make such appropriations, but it is that we cannot make them large enough to satisfy the demands of commerce. Until the necessity for it seemed to pass away appropriations were made annually for the building of post roads all over the country in the different States, and the roads were built by the Government and the money spent under its own direction and control.

Mr. Speaker, I find an old document, a report made by one Colonel Abert, who was at the head of the Bureau of Topographical Engineers, the report being made in response to a resolution of the Senate, which gives a statement of all the appropriations made by Congress for the construction and repairs of roads, harbors and fortifications, improvement of rivers, &c., in the States and Territories for the years mentioned in the report. This report shows, I think very conclusively, that the people and Government in those days believed that it was the constitutional right of the Government to do substantially what seemed to be necessary to be done for the protection of the Government and the advantage of the people. From 1806 to 1845 over seventeen million dollars were appropriated for these general improvements, and a very considerable share of it was for making roads; not railroads, but dirt and gravel roads. About two millions was spent in making what is known as the Cumberland road through and in the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia; over two millions appropriated for the State of Ohio; over one million for the road in Indiana, and $750,000 for the road in my own State. These appropriations were made by Congress, running through a series of years from 1806 to 1845, and received the approval of Presidents Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, J. Q. Adams, Jackson, and Van Buren. The system of internal improvement which was then carried on by the Government was supported by the strongest men of the nation, among whom were Clay, Webster, and Calhoun. The question of building railroads through different States was never made, because the people of those days were not building railroads; they relied upon other means of commerce, such as wagon-roads, rivers, and canals; but when a common road seemed to be needed for postal purposes or for business purposes in any State or different States Congress appropriated the money and it was built.

Now, the question is whether there is any real difference in principle between the exercise of a power by the Government in appropriating money and building a dirt road through different States, or deepening or cleaning out the channel of rivers running through different States and doing what we now propose by passing this bill. The actual thing done then and what is proposed to be done now is different, but in my judgment the principle authorizing the two is the same. If what the Government did then was constitutional, what is proposed now is also. There were a good many men in the Congress of the nation and out of it who thought that the action of Congress in appropriating money and building the Cumberland road was unconstitutional. They denounced the measure as such; but the road was needed, and the people generally and the States were anxious for Government aid. The people of the country were scattered and poor, and the Government lent a helping hand and went forward constructing roads and making such national improvements as the growth and commerce of the country required.

Times have changed. States have become rich; railroad monopolies have become strong, powerful, and States and Congresses are almost ready to bow at their bidding. What is the result? It is that the people are oppressed by railroad charges; the business commerce of the country bound down by a want of capacity of railroads to carry on the commerce, and there seems to be no relief either in the States or in the national Government. Other charters are refused in State Legislatures for reasons which to the members, while they may not be good, are sufficient, and here we are met with the argument that we have no constitutional power to pass a bill allowing a company to build a railroad through the States. The Constitution is not broad enough to enable the General Government to break down monopolies which are an oppression upon the people, because, as is argued, you cannot cross a State line without interfering with the peculiar and reserved rights of the States.

States may erect barriers or walls around themselves and say, "Thus far shall thou come and no further, except upon our terms;" and the result is, that any man who seeks to come from the extremity of the Republic to this capital or to go to the commercial capital must be subject to extravagant tolls all along the journey. Mr. Speaker, is this to be the policy and solution of the constitutional doctrine touching the power of the Government? I do not believe it is. I am not anxious to blot out State lines or State rights, or to make this a consolidated Government, as it is charged that the friends of this bill are. I am for neither of these things. I am for holding each, the State and national Governments, in their proper position and relation to each other. They should each have all the rights given them by the Constitution. I believe, too, in the doctrine that "there is no power in the General Government but that which is expressly granted or which is impliable from an express grant." I think this is a sound position upon the question; and taking this position, the next question is, does the Constitution expressly or by implication allow the passage of this bill? If neither, then we ought not to pass it.

The Constitution says that—

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; "To establish post offices and post roads; and "To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

If Congress has power to pass this bill at all it must be done under one or all of the provisions quoted. None of them in so many words gives the power; do they or either of them, by implication? "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." How? is the next question that every man would ask. What did the makers of the Constitution mean when they put that clause in the Constitution? Did they mean that the General Government should stand by and watch the movements of the people of the different States in the great commercial enterprises of the country, and give a little gentle advice as to one scheme and another as the people went forward, the Government discouraging one enterprise and encouraging another? Was it to be confined, as some gentlemen argue, to the regulation of bridges over navigable streams; or if a State or corporation created by a State obstruct the passage of citizens of one State over the soil of another by absolute blockade or prohibition, that then Congress should have the power to remove the obstruction or prevent it? Or did the men who made the Constitution mean to give the General Government the power to regulate commerce among the States by building great public highways—railways, if you please—to serve as post roads and military roads, and as an actual means of commerce among the States, when in the judgment of Congress they seemed necessary? If Congress has the power to remove an obstruction to the passage of citizens or goods from one State to another, has it not the power to authorize the building a road through the State without its consent? If a State has not the power to maintain an obstruction to commerce, she surely has not the power to prevent the Government passing over her domain without the State's consent.

Gentlemen opposed to this bill upon the ground that we have no constitutional power to pass it admit that the Government has the power to remove an obstruction. The clause of the Constitution which I have quoted was put there, in my judgment, for the very purpose of protecting the people, without regard to State lines, in the enjoyment of free commerce and trade, untrammelled by assumed State rights or State usurpations. It was that the power should be retained in the Government, so that State lines should not be permitted to become State barriers under State authority, and the energy and industry of the people broken down. It was to enable the General Government, at any time when it might be deemed necessary, to open a way from one extremity of the country to the other for the benefit of the people.

If the Congress has not the power to pass this bill, and the doctrine of the gentlemen who oppose it is correct, then, sir, it rests in the say so of States whether the people of one State shall cross the line and go into another. This is State rights, and, in my judgment, as pernicious as the State rights which brought on the late war.

It is the same doctrine in fact, but applied to a specific subject. I shall never vote for or favor any such doctrine. I shall never support a doctrine which carried to its legal and logical consequences places it in the power of the States east of my own to prevent the people of Illinois from reaching the eastern seaboard except upon the terms satisfactory to those States; and, sir, I may say the same of those west between Illinois and the Pacific. They have the right to go east, west, north, or south, and the Constitution will not tolerate any State in setting itself up as a dictator of the terms upon which the people of Illinois shall be allowed to pass.

The people of Illinois have the right to go to the great commercial metropolis of the nation with their products unobstructed without asking Indiana, Ohio, or New York. And, sir, men need not tell me that the Constitution is not broad enough to clear out of the way all hindrances, and authorize, if you please, a great military and postal railroad from the West to the East upon which could be borne the people and their products. It is charged that we desire to break down the State governments and assume control of all the domestic affairs of the States. No such thing. We claim no more authority for the Government now than was claimed for it in its earlier history. I am for breaking down all attempted usurpations by the States, and allowing them to exercise all the authority that was granted them by the fathers in the days when all the institutions of the country were new.

For many years before the late war the States gradually claimed greater and greater powers under the Constitution, until it became the theory of a large portion of the people of the country that the States were members of the Union with power to withdraw from it at will, and that the General Government had no power under the Constitution to prevent it. This doctrine was instilled into the minds of the people of the South generally, until finally it culminated in a war against the Union, the result of which, I trust, has settled the question that there can be no such thing as peaceable secession in this country.

Now, sir, the doctrine of State rights crops out in another form, and we are told that Congress has no power under the Constitution to open up channels of commerce for postal or military or other purposes through the States, and that these are matters belonging exclusively to the States, to be regulated by them as they please. I will not say that it is an attempt to give life again to the doctrine that inspired rebellion and that we supposed had perished when the nation triumphed over treason in the late war; but, sir, while rebels are hopeful that the lost cause will yet be made a living cause, I think the Government should be very slow to declare by legislative action that it rests with the States to say whether the means of commerce demanded by the necessities of the people shall or shall not be granted.

Gentlemen argue that the exercise of this power by the Government will result in adding largely to the already overgrown lobby around this Capitol. There is some force in this argument. I appreciate the force of it. Legislative lobbies have got to be fearful here already; so they are in the States. It seems that there is no subject of legislation now in any of our legislative bodies that is not watched by scheming men who are determined to secure some special advantage therefrom. All the important legislation here that affects directly or indirectly the financial interests of the people is followed by gangs of manipulators calling themselves committees, perhaps three quarters of whom have no interest whatever in the general welfare of the people, but who are seeking to shape legislation to suit their particular or special interest. This state of things is to be deplored. It is to be hoped that it will not continue in such fearful proportions much longer. But, sir, much as I deprecate any action that would possibly result in any increase of the lobby, I shall not be turned from what I deem my duty to the people by such a suggestion.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent occupies a noble position in the Valley of the Mississippi. She is a long distance from this capital; she is far distant from the Atlantic sea-board; she is further from the Pacific. Many States border upon the great Mississippi river between her southern boundary and the mouth of that great river. That great State, sir, shall never be made subservient to the whims and fancied rights of the States lying by her side, either upon the east, west, or south. The Constitution of the country is broad enough to enable the Government to open the way in any direction that her people may desire to go if the States around her interpose objection, and my votes here shall be in favor of the principle establishing the right. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have more time that I might quote from the great men of earlier times upon this important subject, but I see my time has expired.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. R. DOOLITTLE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 6, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. DOOLITTLE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I look upon this proposed amendment as one which goes to the foundation of our system of government.

We have State governments and we have a Federal Government. The citizen owes allegiance to both. He may be guilty of treason against both.

Neither of these governments is endowed with absolute sovereignty. Before the Constitution absolute sovereignty belonged to the States, but under the Constitution they have only a limited sovereignty. The States are still sovereign, except so far as they have parted with sovereignty under the Constitution, and the Federal Government is sovereign just so far as and no further than the Constitution has clothed it with sovereignty. Ours is a composite system, simple in theory, and yet sometimes most difficult in practice. This very divided empire of ours, by which a part of the sovereign powers of government are given to the Federal Government, while the great mass of sovereign powers is reserved to the States each for itself, independent of all others, is that very thing which distinguishes our system from every other which has appeared upon earth. It was in this very thing that our ancestors believed, and we have been taught to believe that they made a great advance in the science of human government.

Each State for itself must exercise the great mass of sovereign powers as each State must for itself be the bulwark and defense of the great mass of their rights and their liberties, while to the Federal Government must be delegated certain definite and specified sovereign powers necessary to preserve the peace at home and secure us against danger from abroad. There is, therefore, such a thing as State sovereignty, and there is such a thing as Federal sovereignty. Among the other nations of the earth the thirty-seven States united are one nation, not by a league or copartnership or compact to be dissolved at pleasure, but by a constitution of government indissoluble forever; while among themselves under the Constitution for the defense of the great mass of our rights and liberties, and as to all powers not delegated to the Federal Government, they are thirty-seven free and independent States—E pluribus unum: though many we are one. These are the fundamental ideas upon which our system rests.

Now, Mr. President, these two ideas—first, that we are many, and second, that we are one—have presided over our system in every period of its history. They were there in the beginning; I may say from before the beginning. If you go to the Convention which formed our Constitution these ideas were there. There is where they first struggled for the mastery. Like two spiritual forces, each had its representative men in that convention. Some favored centralization and giving enlarged powers to the Federal Government; others in the Convention would restrict the powers of this Government to a very few subjects. After a struggle the Constitution was at length formed, and after a still more powerful struggle in the States before the people the Constitution was adopted. It was to a considerable extent the result of compromise between these two conflicting ideas, each of which must be modified by the other. Hamilton, in that day, was the representative of centralization—of that party who desired to make a strong central government; while, on the other side, Jefferson, perhaps, more than any other, may be regarded as the true representative of those who desired to restrict the powers of this Government and to reserve the great mass of powers to the several States, while Madison, nearly midway between them, neither inclined to the one extreme nor to the other, was perhaps more than any other man the father of the Constitution. His counsel, his advice, his propositions from time to time prevailed, which resulted at last in that great compromise between State sovereignty and Federal sovereignty which our Constitution is, and under which we have lived, and I trust in God we shall still live, and our children after us, to the remotest generations.

But, Mr. President, from the imperfection of human language it is impossible for any man, however gifted, to define the powers of the Government so clearly that no doubt whatever may be permitted to exist. To define the precise line of demarcation between the powers granted and the powers reserved is a most difficult task—to mark in language the precise point where the powers of the State end, and the power of the Federal Government begins. But there are some powers so clearly defined that no man in his senses can be mistaken. Upon this great question, whether the power of the States over the question of suffrage is reserved to them or conferred upon the Federal Government by the Constitution, no sane man can doubt. And, sir, the wisdom of still reserving it to the States is so undoubted that even Mr. Hamilton, the representative of centralization, the incarnation of Federalism, was compelled to say that to put into the Constitution of the United States such a power in this Government to control the question of suffrage and elections in the States would be an engine calculated to destroy the governments of the States.

Mr. President, I do not make this statement at random. I have before me the language of Mr. Hamilton, in the fifty-ninth number of the Federalist, in which he puts this very case:

"Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution empowering the United States to regulate elections for the States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it both as an unwarrantable transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments?"

And yet your proposed amendment does all that. Mr. President, it says that suffrage shall not be restricted on account of race, color, or previous condition, and that Congress shall have power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. Sir, the power to enforce it of necessity implies power over the elections of the States. In order to give to the colored man of the States the right to vote at the elections in the States, to secure to his vote a fair count, and to make sure that if his vote be counted and determine the result that the person elected shall have the office, will draw to this Government the power to control the elections themselves. It is impossible to separate the two. But one authority can decide the result of an election. It must be the State authority or the Federal authority. As it reaches all elections, if the Federal authority is supreme, the State authority must succumb in all elections to Federal control.

The power which Congress must exercise to carry this into effect will call upon Congress to appoint judges at the election-polls; to send officers to attend the elections to secure order; to count the votes and secure the votes of colored men in determining the result—in short, to control the elections. If your constitutional provision is nothing more nor less than a declaration of opinion without the power to enforce it by Congress, it goes for nothing. Necessarily the power to enforce it must go with it, and if that goes with it where is to be the end? How many officers of this Government must be sent to the States to take charge of their elections and to see that these people are admitted to the right to vote?

To force negro suffrage upon the South you have maintained a large standing Army at millions and tens of millions expense. How much will it cost you to force it upon the North? I say, Mr. President, that even Hamilton, strongly as he urged the establishment of a Federal Government with almost absolute powers, shrank back from this proposition as an engine for the utter destruction of the State governments. Mr. Story, too, one of the ablest commentators upon the Constitution—the judge I believe at whose feet the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] was instructed like Paul at the feet of Gamaliel—Mr. Justice Story, though everybody knows he was inclined to Federalism, and inclined to a strong Government here, denounced this proposition in language equally strong as Hamilton himself. He declared "it would be deemed a flagrant violation of the principle upon which the Government is based, that it would be an unwarrantable transfer of power indicating a premeditated design to destroy the State governments." And yet his disciple is one of the greatest advocates for the exercise of this power by the Government of the United States. He sees, or thinks he sees in the Constitution as it is, a power to pass laws on the subject of suffrage in the States, although his great teacher, Judge Story, maintained that the attempt to put such a provision in the Constitution would show a premeditated design to destroy the State governments.

Mr. President, I maintain in the first place that the right to fix the qualifications of voters is essential to a republican form of government, and that any State which has not the right to fix and determine for itself who shall vote and who shall not vote ceases to be republican, for it loses the power to govern itself. If Congress can determine who shall vote in Indiana, Indiana no longer governs herself. If Illinois can determine who shall vote in Indiana, it is not the people of Indiana who govern themselves, but it is the people of Illinois who govern Indiana.

It cannot be too often repeated that it is absolutely essential to republican government that the State for itself shall have the power to fix the qualification of its voters. That clause in the Constitution to which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts so often appeals, "that the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government," is in direct conflict with the proposed amendment, because republican government is self-government, and there can be no self-government in a State if any outside State or any other power above the control of the State can take away from the States the power to determine for themselves who shall exercise the right of suffrage in the States; for those who vote govern the State, and if an outside power determines who shall vote in a State that power governs the State. This is a proposition not to amend, but to revolutionize. It is not in the way of improving and upholding, but in the way of upturning the foundations of the system, and of destroying the very spirit which gives it life, the very ideas of which it was born, upon which it has lived, and without which our republican institutions in a country so vast and so diversified as ours cannot survive.

Why, suppose that a proposition were brought in here by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, or some other Senator, in these times which tend so strongly to imperialism to strike out the word "republican" in this guarantee clause and insert "monarchical," and thus make the Constitution declare that the United States shall guaranty to every State a "monarchical" form of government, would that be an amendment to the Constitution of the United States? I ask Senators is that amendment? No, sir! No! it is revolution. It is striking at its very life; and precisely so, in this attempt by this Government to take to itself control over the suffrage of the States, this Government is striking at the life of republican institutions within the States themselves. Ay, Mr. President, as Hamilton and Story declared, it is a premeditated engine to destroy the State governments.

Mr. President, I maintain that it is essential to the liberty of the individual within the State that the State shall be unrestricted in its power; that it shall govern itself, and in order to govern itself it must determine for itself who shall vote and who shall not vote, for it is in this voting power that Government resides. If the State of Kansas, for instance, chooses to bestow the right of suffrage upon the women of the State, it is a thing which belongs to the State of Kansas to decide for itself; and I agree with what was read from the speech of the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] by the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. VICKERS] yesterday where he said that he, as a citizen of Kansas, would never consent to have the Congress of the United States, or any other power, determine for the State of Kansas what should be the qualifications of her voters. He maintained then that it belonged to the State as a sovereign State, as a State to which is reserved and ought forever to be reserved all the powers not granted to the Federal Government, that it was essential to the existence of the State that it should have this power to decide for itself.

Mr. President, unless we can resist this tendency towards centralization which the war has awakened, and which is hurrying us on with a velocity and a momentum which makes every honest lover of his country tremble for the coming future, while the revolutionists, fanatics, and madmen of our time, like "fools, rush in where angels fear to tread," and all unconscious of impending danger are leaping and shouting with maniac joy—I repeat, unless we can resist and overcome this tendency to centralization and imperialism the days of our republican institutions are already numbered.

Sir, if the powers of the States, one after another, are to be absorbed here the liberties of the citizen are gone. I have already said the great mass of our liberties are defended, not by act of Congress, but by the laws of the States under which we live. What defends my life as a citizen of Wisconsin? Not the laws of Congress, but the laws of Wisconsin. What defends my person against assault? Not the laws of Congress, but the laws of Wisconsin. What defends my reputation? Not the laws enacted here, but the laws of Wisconsin. What defends my family, my wife, my children, my home, all my nearest and dearest rights? What defends all my property against trespass, theft, or robbery? Not the laws of Congress; no, sir, no; but the laws of the State of Wisconsin. Sir, unless we can revive among our people more love for the States, more respect for the rights of the States, not outside the Constitution, but under the Constitution; if we cannot resist this centralization, which is just as much at war with the Constitution as was secession itself, and which is fast sweeping us into that maelstrom of imperialism in which all other republics have been destroyed, our liberties are gone! What the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] said perhaps will be true of us, that we are to follow in the course which other nations heretofore have pursued; that as in Greece, in Rome, in France, under the cry of universal suffrage and universal liberty and equality before the law, all liberty of the citizen will go down; imperialism will be established, and the general, the imperator, which was but the name of the general in the days of Rome, will become the actual sovereign. The forms of republican government may remain; but with power centralized here the tyranny of factious majorities, controlled by secret caucus, will become so odious and despised that the people will prefer the rule of a Cromwell to the rule of Parliament, and will sustain some successful chieftain as master of the Government, like Cromwell, Napoleon, or Cæsar.

Mr. President, the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwark against anti-republican tendencies, and on the other hand the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and our safety abroad, are the fundamental ideas upon which our institutions rest, and by cherishing and maintaining which these institutions alone can survive.

Mr. President, I wish now to call attention to some two or three facts in the history of the party now in power bearing upon this precise question—the power of the States and the rights of the States. The Republican party was organized in 1854, growing out of the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Congress, in an evil hour, listened to the suggestion to enter upon that most destructive measure which, in my judgment, has been the cause of much of that through which we have passed. The Republican party organized at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, in 1854, and in its address and resolutions it expressly declared that—

"The maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend."

It admitted in the very hour of its birth that this balance of power between the two ideas to which I have called attention not only existed, but was essential to the perfection and endurance of our system.

Again, when that party met in convention in 1856, when it first placed in nomination a candidate for the Presidency, it again pledged itself "to support the Federal Constitution, the rights of the States, and the Union of the States."

The Republican convention at Chicago in 1860, which nominated Mr. Lincoln the first time, in its platform repeated these memorable words:

"The maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend."

The Union of the States by the Constitution and the rights of the States under it was the battle-cry of the Republican party under which I helped fight its battles and win its victories. The Republican party in its origin and in all its national conventions, until 1868, in thunder tones always proclaimed the equal rights of the States and all the States in the Union.

We come now to the convention of 1868. Their convention at Chicago declared that while, growing out of the war and its necessities, they will force universal negro suffrage upon the States of the South, yet the question of suffrage in the loyal States properly belongs to them. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] says that means this, nothing more and nothing less: the loyal States shall control suffrage until, by an amendment to the Constitution, we can take it away. Sir, the resolution declares no such thing. It declares for a principle, a principle which was born with the Government, a principle essential to the life of the Government, namely, that loyal States properly control the question of suffrage; a principle which was present when the Republican party was born; a principle which was loudly proclaimed in every national convention of that party, that the rights of the States—and among them the right of a State to control its suffrage and its elections—were just as essential to be preserved as the rights of the General Government. This declaration, made in 1868, has no such narrow and deceptive meaning as the Senator from Indiana now gives to it, namely: the people of the loyal States shall control suffrage for themselves until we, the Republican party, can change the Constitution and take that power away, and then force universal negro suffrage upon them against their will. The language is clear and definite:

"The question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

Mr. President, what do the words mean? Let us practically illustrate them. Take the State of Connecticut, for instance. When this platform was read in the State of Connecticut did it mean, and was it intended to mean, that the people of that State should have the power to control their own suffrage and elections until the people of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Rhode Island should vote to take it away? Is that what it means? Take New York. When this platform was read all over that State, declaring that it properly belongs to the people for themselves, in the loyal States, to fix the qualifications of suffrage, did it mean that the people of that State should properly exercise that right until other States thought proper to take it away? And so in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Delaware, and Pennsylvania. Is it a fair construction of that resolution that the States of Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Delaware shall properly control the question of suffrage until States which have been reconstructed by military power and forced to accept negro suffrage at the point of the bayonet, joining with other States, will have sufficient numbers to change the Constitution of the United States and force negro suffrage down the throats of States containing fifteen millions of loyal people against their will? Is that what that resolution meant? Who can with serious face say that it meant that negro suffrage should be forced upon the greatest and most populous States of the North, and States which contain a majority of the loyal people who put down the rebellion, by the carpet-bag States, as they are sometimes called, of the South? No, sir; it meant no such thing. The people understood it to mean, and understood you to say and to pledge yourselves to them when you passed this resolution, that while from war necessities you were forcing negro suffrage upon the people of the South at the point of the bayonet you left the question to each loyal State for itself; you left the question to the free determination of its own people, whether or not negro suffrage should be adopted.

There is one other thing which I beg leave to mention. It is said—and because of the success of the party in power I suppose the country will accept it as an accomplished fact—that the fourteenth constitutional amendment is adopted. Do you not remember, sir, that in the reconstruction of all the States of the South you forced upon those States that constitutional amendment? At the South it was carried by force of arms; in the North, pressed by party necessity. That constitutional amendment expressly provides that this very question of suffrage shall be left to the people of the States, each State acting independently for itself. Your constitutional amendment is hardly cold; it has hardly been adopted, hardly proclaimed as a part of the Constitution of the land; it is yet as warm as the resolution which you made at Chicago, in which you declared that the people of the States of the North should for themselves control the question of suffrage. Now, sir, how does this thing appear? What a spectacle do you present? The States of the South by force of arms were brought to its adoption; the States of the North, by party necessity, by a combination of the votes of these States just reconstructed by arms, and the votes of other States dominated by Radical partisan majorities. You propose to undo the work just completed in the adoption of a constitutional amendment, expressly leaving the question of suffrage to the action of each State for itself and to all the States in the Union, and in violation of the pledge of your platform to force upon the loyal States, whose constitutions forbid it, universal suffrage against their will, as you have lately forced it upon the States of the South at the point of the bayonet. Sir, it is against good faith; it is against the spirit which made the Constitution, and which alone can preserve it.

REMARKS OF HON. H. WILSON, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 8, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. WILSON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It will be fourteen years to-morrow since I stood at the Vice President's desk, took the oath, and entered upon the duties of a Senator of the United States. These fourteen years have been crowded and eventful years. Ideas, principles, and policies have grappled and contended for the mastery. The Senate has been divided into two distinctly defined classes of public men. The one class has been the persistent friends of a liberal, progressive, and Christian civilization; the other class has been the sturdy champions of a brutal, degrading, and perishing barbarism. By speeches and votes, by acts and declared opinions these two classes of statesmen have made enduring records, by which the present age and the coming ages will interpret their motives, weigh their judgments, and pronounce irreversible verdicts upon their public characters.

You and I, Mr. President, have witnessed this struggle. We have listened to the words of Senators who during these crowded years have contended in this Chamber for the triumph of their ideas, principles, and policies. You and I, sir, have seen the friends of the country and of the rights of man give votes and heard them utter words that have been applauded by earth and blest of Heaven. Misapprehended, misrepresented, and maligned, we have seen them move right on from conflict to conflict, from victory to victory, till they have won triumph for the country, for popular liberty, for human elevation and development, the memory of which their children and their children's children will proudly cherish. In the ages yet to be the record of their achievements, traced upon the historic page, will be read by the champions of popular liberty with beaming eye and bounding pulse. The misconceptions, born of interests, passions, and prejudices will perish in the lights of the future; and these men, who have been faithful to country and true to liberty, will take their places in men's memories beside the faithful and true of other ages and other lands. While history shall record, in letters of light, for the study and admiration of aftertimes the words and deeds of patriotism, liberty, and humanity of the men who have never wavered in their fidelity in the stern trials through which their country has passed and is passing, it will be fortunate for their opponents and assailants, in this Chamber and out of it, if their posterity—those who bear their names and inherit their blood—shall be as silent as are the descendants of the men who opposed the Declaration of Independence and reviled the heroes of our revolutionary age. If the wild utterances and guilty deeds of the champions of slavery and whatever pertains to it shall live in the records of these times, if their words and acts shall be remembered at all, their children and their children's children may seek to hide the shame of such an ancestry. Men who, in the lights of this age in America that flash upon us from battle-fields and patriot's graves, continue to champion the lost causes of slavery, caste, and human inequality are certain, while living or when dead, to meet the doom of men who in other ages and in other lands have disowned, scoffed, and reviled the sublime creed of human equality and brotherhood.

Sir, it is now past six o'clock in the morning—a continuous session of more than eighteen hours. For more than seventeen hours the ear of the Senate has been wearied and pained with anti-republican, inhuman, and unchristian utterances, with the oft-repeated warnings, prophecies, and predictions, with petty technicalities, and carping criticisms. The majority in this Chamber, in the House, and in the country, too, have been arraigned, assailed, and denounced, their ideas, principles, and policies misrepresented, and their motives questioned. Sir, will our assailants never forget anything nor learn anything? Will they never see themselves as others see them? Year after year they have continuously and vehemently, as grand historic questions touching the interests of the country and the rights of our countrymen have arisen to be grappled with and solved, blurted into our unwilling ears these same warnings, prophecies, and predictions, their unreasoning prejudices and passionate declarations. Time and events, which test all things, have brought discomfiture to their cause and made their illogical and ambitious rhetoric seem to be but weak and impotent drivel.

In spite of the discomfitures of the past, the champions of slavery and of the ideas, principles, and policies pertaining to it are again doing battle for their perishing cause. Again, sir, we are arraigned, again misrepresented, again denounced. Why are we again thus misrepresented, arraigned, and denounced? We, the friends of human rights, simply propose to submit to our countrymen an amendment of the Constitution of our country to secure the priceless boon of suffrage to citizens of the United States to whom the right to vote and be voted for is denied by the constitutions and laws of some of the States. This effort to remove the disabilities of the emancipated victims of the perished slave systems, to clothe them with power to maintain the dignity of manhood and the honor and rights of citizenship, spring from our love of freedom, our sense of justice, our reverence for human nature, and our recognition of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. This effort, sanctified by patriotism, liberty, justice, and humanity, is stigmatized in this Chamber as a mere partisan movement. Who make it a partisan movement? The men who are actuated by an imperative sense of duty, or the men who instinctively seize the occasion to arouse the unreasoning passions of race and caste and the prejudices of ignorance and hate? We are content to leave to our country, to the present age, and to future ages, the question of partisanship raised by the opponents of this beneficent measure. This is not the first time that those who denounce this amendment as partisan have stigmatized great, patriotic, and healing measures as partisan. Did they not denounce the great measures for the suppression of the rebellion as partisan measures? Did they not denounce the immortal proclamation of emancipation as a partisan proclamation? Did they not denounce the thirteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution, by which slavery was made impossible in Christian America, as a partisan amendment? Did they not denounce the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution, by which the citizenship and the civil rights of the emancipated race were forever assured, as a mere partisan affair? Yes, sir; every blow we have struck in defense of the Constitution and the Union, of the liberties of the people, the rights, privileges, and elevation of the poor and lowly, have been branded as partisan by passionate, vehement, and unreasoning partisanship.

Mr. HOWARD. So was the Constitution itself.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir, the Constitution, when it came from the hands of its illustrious framers, was denounced by a narrow, contracted, mole-eyed spirit of sectionalism, local attachment and feeling, as centralization, by which the rights of the States were to be absorbed and the liberties of the people destroyed. So, in our age, the thirteenth article for emancipation, by which the fetters of slavery were riven; the fourteenth article, by which the emancipated bondmen were made citizens and clothed with civil rights, and this proposed amendment, denying to States the power to withhold suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, have been, and are denounced as at war with the fundamental law of the land, the reserved rights of the States, and the liberties of the citizen.

It is, indeed, painful to listen, as we have listened during this sitting of the Senate, to the utterance of sentiments so inhuman and unchristian, sentiments so dishonoring to human nature. Sir, we have just been told by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. NOR- TON,] who was once with us, but never of us, that the negro, no matter what may be his wealth, his intelligence, or his personal character, is doomed to be excluded from the society of the fashionable and respectable. The hod-carrier, he tells us, may hope to amass wealth, to ride in his carriage, to be received into fashionable society, to dine others and be dined himself. He can hope, too, he tells us, that his children may be cultured and refined; but the black man is without hope for himself and his children. Fashionable society, carriages, and dinners! Surely these are mighty themes for the consideration of American statesmen. Because frivolity and fashion put their ban upon the black man, be his character ever so pure or his intelligence ever so great, statesmen in this Christian land of republican institutions must deny to him civil and political rights and privileges. Because social life has put and continues to put its brand of exclusion upon the black man, it is therefore the duty of statesmanship to maintain by class legislation the abhorrent doctrine of caste in this Christian Republic. This is the argument, the logic, the position of Senators. This argument, this logic, this position insults reason, outrages humanity, and dishonors the civilization of the age. Sir, it is your duty and my duty, and the duty of any Senator of the United States, to enforce and maintain the liberties, rights, and privileges of every citizen of the United States. The poorer he is the greater is our obligation; the more society averts its face from him, the more God bids us to stand by, shield and protect him. Sir, I am grateful to know that during these fourteen years you and I have given no votes and uttered no words in this Chamber to degrade or dishonor our brother man. We have given no votes here we would recall; many of the friends around us have given no votes and made no speeches they would recall. However much we may be stained or scarred by sins we hope to go to our final account without the fear of finding recorded against us the crime of having betrayed the cause of the weak, the poor, or the lowly. Whatever may be our failing, our sins of omission or commission, we hope that the oppressed and smitten children with skins not colored like our own will not, before the bar of Almighty God, arraign or reproach us.

To the Senator who tells us society is forever closed against the black man, and therefore the ballot-box should be, I say that I know black men of culture and character who are received into society that it would be an honor for him to enter. I know gentlemen and ladies of culture and refinement—gentlemen and ladies who have been received into the most cultivated circles of Europe and America, and who honor that society quite as much as they are honored by it, whose houses are open to that noble specimen of physical, intellectual, and moral power, Frederick Douglas, a gentleman who is every inch a man. I assure the Senator from Minnesota that I

"Enter on my list of friends"

Frederick Douglas, and feel honored by his friendship. The cordial reception given by the Vice President-elect and his bride at one of their receptions, so thronged by noble men and women, was honorable alike to Mr. COLFAX and the great Republican party that made him Vice President. As I witnessed that manly greeting I felt it was but the dawn of a better era, when intellectual and moral excellence would conquer the prejudices of class and caste.

Honorable Senators have grown weary in reminding us that it would be a breach of our plighted faith to submit to the State Legislatures this amendment to the Constitution to secure to American citizens the right to vote and to be voted for. They tell us we were pledged by our national convention of 1868; that we were committed to the doctrine that the right to regulate the suffrage properly belonged to the loyal States. So the earlier Republican national conventions proclaimed that slavery in the States was a local institution, for which the people of each State only were responsible. But that declaration did not stand in the way of the proclamation of emancipation, did not stand in the way of the thirteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution, did not stand in the way of that series of aggressive measures by which slavery was extirpated in the States. Slavery struck at the life of the nation, and the Republican party throttled its mortal foe. The Republican party in the national convention of 1868 pronounced the guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage of all loyal men at the South as demanded by every consideration of public safety, gratitude, and of justice, and determined that it should be maintained. That declaration unreservedly committed the Republican party to the safety and justice of equal suffrage. The declaration that the suffrage in the loyal States properly belonged to the people of those States meant this, no more, no less: that under the Constitution it belonged to the people of each of the loyal States to regulate suffrage therein. I am told that that portion of the resolution was carried by one majority in the committee on resolutions. That construction of the Constitution was not concurred in by great masses of the Republican party; but no one has a right to say that it committed Congress against submitting to the State Legislatures an equal suffrage amendment. Congress is certainly free to submit the amendment, and the State Legislatures are certainly free to adopt such an amendment. The Republican party by its acts and declared opinions is fully committed to the doctrine of the equality of rights and privileges of the citizens of the United States; and its consistency demands that it shall seize every opportune occasion to make the Constitution and laws of the country in harmony with its sublime creed. The march of events, the needs of the country, clear conception of public duty, all impel to action. Better far that political organizations and public men should be right with the lights of to-day than consistent with the errors of yesterday.

Senators accuse us of being actuated by partisanship, by the love of power, and the hope of retaining power; yet they never tire of reminding us that the people have in several States pronounced against equal suffrage and will do so again. I took occasion early in the debate to express the opinion that in the series of measures for the extirpation of slavery and the elevation and enfranchisement of the black race the Republican party had lost at least a quarter of a million of voters. In every great battle of the last eight years the timid, the weak faltered, fell back or slunk away into the ranks of the enemy. Yes, sir; while we have been struggling often against fearful odds, timed men, weak men, and bad men, too, following the examples of timid men, weak men, and bad men, in all the great struggles for the rights of human nature, have broken from our advancing ranks and fallen back to the rear or gone over to the enemy, thus giving to the foe the strength they had pledged to us. But we have gone on prospering, and we shall go on prospering in spite of treacheries on the right hand and on the left. The timid may chide us, the weak reproach us, and the bad malign us, but we shall strive on, for in struggling to secure and protect the rights of others we assure our own.

To the enemies of equal rights, whether they be its life-long foes or recruits from our ranks, I say your shafts now, as in the past, may annoy us, but they cannot penetrate the panoply with which our chosen and avowed policy invests us. The country knows and the world knows your history and our history, where you now are and where we are, what you are and what we are. The friends of free institutions the wide world over recognize the glorious fact that the far-reaching, comprehensive, and crowning deed of emancipation in America was the beneficent work of the Republican party. They recognize the fact, too, that in the great work of emancipation democracy and conservatism had no part; that they were, and now are, the deadliest foes of the African race on the face of the earth. Everywhere the sympathies of the liberal and progressive men are with us. The confidence of the humane, the generous, and the just are with us. By striving to lift up and hold up the feeble and dependent, the smitten sons and daughters of sorrow and misfortune, we strengthen ourselves. That law of our being applies alike to individuals and organizations. Years of devotion to the oppressed have placed the Republican party of the United States on a plane so lofty and in a position so strong as not to be successfully assaulted by foes who have chosen their ground so far below.

Several amendments have been submitted. As we are all anxious to secure the adoption of one that shall be the most perfect in form, I propose this amendment:

No discrimination shall be made in any State among the citizens of the United States in the exercise of the elective franchise, or in the right to hold office on account of race, color, nativity, property, education, or creed.

This amendment is comprehensive, just, and, therefore, strong. It secures the right to vote and the right to hold office to men of African descent, and it embraces others, against whom tests are made in some of the States. In Rhode Island naturalized citizens cannot vote unless they are the possessors of property. In New Hampshire the Catholic cannot hold office by the constitution, though the people of that State, believing that constitutions were made for man, and not man for constitutions, do sometimes elect Catholics to office. In Massachusetts an educational test is demanded, although it has become, through a sense of justice among the people, almost a dead letter. This amendment appeals alike to the friends of the colored race and to other citizens of the United States. It allows any State to try, if it chooses, the experiment of woman suffrage. If this amendment shall be adopted, as I trust it will, it will be strong before the people, and will, I am confident, be sanctioned by the votes of three fourths of the State Legislatures.

Sir, my colleague has prepared a bill to secure equal suffrage. I shall vote for it if it is presented as an amendment to this bill, or in any other way in which it may be presented. But some of the ablest statesmen and most eminent jurists in and out of Congress question the constitutional authority to enact such a law. A portion, perhaps a large majority, of the Republicans of the country entertain serious doubts of the right to secure equal suffrage by congressional legislation. In this state of the public mind I am for submitting a constitutional amendment to the States and putting forth our full strength to secure its adoption. Let us fling ourselves into the contest with that dauntless resolution that crowns conflict with victory.

Railroad from Washington to New York.

REMARKS OF HON. G. F. MILLER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 621) to authorize the building of a military and postal road from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration, which, as reported by the Committee on Railroads and Canals, contains sixteen sections, is to incorporate a company to locate and construct a railroad from Washington city, in the District of Columbia, to the city of New York, with one or more tracks, with a capital of $10,000,000, and shall consist of one hundred thousand shares of $100 each. The bill also provides that the owners of lands through which said road may be located shall be compensated, and if the parties cannot agree as to the amount of compensation a mode is provided by which the damages can be ascertained. It also makes it incumbent upon the company to provide safe and convenient passenger and sleeping cars, and limits the amount of fare to be charged passengers, and also limits the amount to be charged on freight. Upon the whole, the bill is so framed as to protect the public from imposition and to insure a speedy transit between said cities, and to convey the United States mails with dispatch. I will not, Mr. Speaker, enter into an elaborate discussion of this bill, but will briefly notice a few leading features involved, and the first I shall notice is, has Congress power to pass such a law? If not, then it will be unnecessary to consider the importance of the proposed enterprise.

The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power to—"Provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

This, I hold, gives to Congress, in a military point of view, ample power to provide for defense of the Government by having railroads or other improvements constructed through the several States to convey, when need requires, troops and munitions of war, and not have to depend solely upon local roads for that purpose. During the late rebellion we saw the great necessity of such a road, especially between Washington and Baltimore. When the capital of the nation was menaced on every hand by a strong rebel force we had but one railroad, and that belonging to a company little disposed to accommodate; so that the safety of the nation demands an additional avenue for transportation, which is provided for by the bill now being considered; and yet I am sorry to find it opposed on this floor by gentlemen who argue that inasmuch as the war is ended and we are not likely to have another soon, therefore there is no necessity, in a military point of view, for the proposed improvement. What a fallacy! Are we to wait until a war is again upon us before any preparation is made for transportation so as to protect the capital of the nation? Are we to be content with but one road leading to the seat of Government, and that controlled by a corporation that is wielding its influence to prevent competition and keep down a rival road? I would ask, Mr. Speaker, can we, the Representatives of the people, face our constituents and say that we opposed the construction of a great thoroughfare that might do much in an emergency to save the life of the nation and protect the national Treasury?

Sir, it is time we should protect the national honor, and not let a branch road now running between this city and Baltimore have the entire control and power to impose upon the Government. We also need the proposed improvement as a postal road. The Constitution gives Congress also the right "to establish post offices and post roads." We are aware of the vast quantity of mail matter to be carried from Washington to the city of New York, and that it is every year increasing at a rapid rate, and for its transportation a road of the kind proposed is necessary; and as Congress clearly has the power, why should it withhold the granting of the charter? But there is an additional reason why this bill should pass, and that is in a commercial point of view, in case Congress has the power. By reference to the eighth section of article one of the Constitution of the United States it will be seen that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." Thus it will be seen that Congress has the right of regulating commerce, not only with foreign nations, but "among the several States;" and I would ask how is this right to be exercised except by providing for public improvements for the transportation of commerce? This clause of the Constitution has received a judicial construction showing the power to regulate trade among the several States. I refer, first, to the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton's Reports of Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, commencing on page 1. Chief Justice Marshall, who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, says on page 190, speaking in regard to navigation:

"All America understands and has uniformly understood the word 'commerce' to comprehend navigation. It was so understood and must have been so understood when the Constitution was framed. The power over commerce, including navigation, was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their Government, and must have been contemplated in forming it. The Convention must have used the word in that sense, because all have understood it in that sense, and the attempt to restrict it comes too late."

On page 194 of same case the learned judge says:

"The subject to which the power is next applied is to commerce 'among the several States.' The word 'among' means intermingled with. A thing which is among others is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior."

Also, on page 196 of same case, in speaking of commerce among States, he says:

"They either join each other, in which case they are separated by a mathematical line, or they are remote from each other, in which case other States lie between them. What is commerce 'among' them, and how is it to be conducted? Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States commence and terminate outside of each? And if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in another, and probably pass through a third?"

On same page the learned judge further remarks:

"What is this power? It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are presented in the Constitution."

And finally, on page 197 of same case, said judge in the opinion continues to say:

"If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single Government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States."

In 3 Wallace's Reports, 713, Gilman vs. Philadelphia, in which Justice Swayne delivered the opinion, it is held that—

"The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible, and includes necessarily the power to prevent any obstructions to the navigation."

And in 6 McLean's Reports, 237, Jolly vs. Terre Haute Draw-Bridge Company, it is laid down that—

"The power to regulate commerce gives the General Government jurisdiction over navigable streams so far as may be necessary for commercial purposes."

From the above authorities it will be seen that the construction given to the Constitution of the United States by the highest tribunal of the country gives Congress a clear right to regulate commerce among the States. But it may be said that the authorities cited mainly refer to navigable streams. It will be remembered that at the adoption of the Constitution we had to depend mainly upon navigation for our commerce, as our railroads, which have done so much for our commerce, are of recent origin; but in the case of Gray vs. Clinton Bridge, to be found in 16 American Law Register, commencing on page 149, in an opinion delivered by Justice Miller, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is held that the power given by the Constitution to Congress to regulate commerce is as applicable to railroads as navigable streams. The learned judge, in same case, says:

"Under the power to regulate commerce Congress may legalize a bridge erected by a railroad company over a navigable river."

And also, that—

"Railroads which are parts of lines of interstate communication are equally subject to the regulation of Congress as are steamboats."

There can be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, of the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, whether conveyed on water or railroads; and I am somewhat surprised to hear any lawyer on this floor doubt such authority, which to me is perfectly plain by the language of the Constitution without calling in the aid of decisions of our highest courts for its interpretation. It is evident that Congress possesses the constitutional power to pass this bill, and the next question to consider is, whether such a road is necessary in a commercial point of view? I hold that it is. It would be strange indeed, Mr. Speaker, if only one railroad was necessary to lead to the capital of a nation for the immense travel and large amount of products necessarily to be conveyed. We have here a city of upward of eighty thousand of a population dependent mainly upon one railroad, which can exact exorbitant prices; hence the reason why it is so expensive to live in Washington. But we are told that the present railroad can accommodate the traveling public, and that there is no occasion for any other at this time, as it may injure the one now in operation. This is certainly a strange argument against public improvements, that the public must be oppressed for fear another road might interfere with the profits of a great corporation that for years has controlled the transportation to this city. Sir, as statesmen we are not to take such a narrow view. It might as well be said we should allow but so many stores in a city or town, as if more were allowed it might diminish the profits of those now in operation. Competition is the life of business, and ought to be encouraged. As so much has been said about the present railroad accommodation to Washington city, I will mention a fact that is well known to the traveling public, and that is the inconveniences and delay at Baltimore. Passengers to Washington over the Pennsylvania railroad, and Philadelphia and Erie railroad by way of the Northern Central road, cannot check their baggage further than Baltimore, and are there taxed to have their persons and baggage conveyed from one depot to another, and besides are delayed several hours. Whose fault is this? Certainly not either the Pennsylvania, Philadelphia and Erie, or Northern Central railway; for it is well known that they are the most accommodating roads of the country. Then it must be the fault of those having charge of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. To all other important places arrangements are made by which baggage can be checked through, but to the capital of the nation this has been denied. I would ask how long are these inconveniences to be endured? I presume, Mr. Speaker, until we get another road constructed over which passengers and freight can pass without change or delay. I trust, Mr. Speaker, this bill may pass, and that our capital may be more convenient of access.

Railroad from Washington to New York.

SPEECH OF HON. AUSTIN BLAIR,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1869.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 621) to authorize the building of a military and postal railway from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York—

Mr. BLAIR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am indebted to the gentleman from New York for five minutes, in which to express briefly my ardent desire for the passage of this bill. A great, and I think it may be said a crying, evil has induced the bringing of this proposition before Congress session after session for a good while. I believe the time has arrived when the measure ought to pass, and when Congress is about ready to pass it. I said it was an evil. The eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in the conclusion of his speech, was obliged to confess that. But he, for the first time since I have been in the habit of hearing him here, is troubled with constitutional scruples. I have not before observed the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be troubled so much with these scruples as he seems to be upon this subject. He has been one of those who have been wont to declare that this is a nation with powers ample to assert its dignity and its rights as a nation. And if anybody has gone as far as the furthest, I think the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania has been disposed to do so. But now he says this is a doubtful constitutional power. I shall not, more than he, stop to discuss that question here. I am willing to leave it, when it arises, to the courts of the country. But I do not believe this is in the slightest degree a doubtful power. That it has not been exercised heretofore is certainly true, for there has not seemed to be a demand for it. And that it is new makes it strike the minds of gentlemen with, perhaps, a little surprise. But in the Constitution there is a broad power to regulate commerce between the States of the Union. How? That is left to the discretion of Congress, as has been held by the courts over and over again. Whatever will minister directly or by fair inference to that object is within the power of Congress, and Congress must of necessity be the judge in this regard. Now, across this great national highway between the capital of the nation, this metropolitan city where the political power of the nation resides, and the great city where the financial power of the country has its center, there lie two States that forbid any competition with their railroad lines. These States will neither build competing lines nor allow their citizens to do so. They have shut up the way from Washington to New York and will open it to no one.

The gentleman speaks to us about monopolies. Why, sir, is there any worse monopoly than this? Let a man travel from New York to Washington a few times, and he will find as he goes that there is a monopoly there that not only has a grinding power in its hands, but is insolent and overbearing to a degree that can hardly be met with elsewhere. They have no disposition to accommodate the public. They keep up prices to a degree far beyond what other corporations are charging, so far as I know. They are disposed to make out of this monopoly every dollar that it is possible for them to gather from the pockets of those who are compelled to pass over the road.

HO. OF REPS.

Frauds against the Choctaw Indians—Mr. Clarke.

There is the State of New Jersey, substantially supporting its government, so I am informed and believe, by the collection of subsidies that we are all obliged to pay for the privilege of passing over her soil. Shall we longer allow this to continue? And if we shall not, as I believe will be the decision of this House, then what are we to do? The only way, in my judgment, is to create another line and give to some other company the power to go across Maryland and New Jersey, and thus create a wholesome competition. This is a most reasonable and necessary power and will be exercised, not in the interests of monopoly, but in direct hostility to a most unjust and exclusive monopoly already existing.

Gentlemen who oppose the passage of this bill seem to take for granted that every exercise of the powers of the national Government must be in the interests of monopoly and oppression, while the States may be safely intrusted with unlimited discretion. It is to be observed that this is eminently a national route. It passes through four States, and, departing from this District, terminates in a fifth. To admit the right of one of these States to bar the way against all comers, while she stands on her border taking toll of every being and everything that crosses that line, is to confess our inability to do the most necessary thing for the common interest of the whole people. If the power of taxation involves the power of destruction, then a State may upon a given line utterly destroy the whole commerce and business of the country, unless a remedy can be found in Congress. But it has been argued here that the interests of the people of the States may be safely trusted to prevent such a result. Unfortunately for this argument the very evil which this bill is intended to remedy proves its unsoundness. The State of New Jersey finds it largely for her interest to levy black mail upon all the travel and business which pass over this great line of railroad, and she remains stubbornly deaf to all the demands of reciprocity and good neighborhood. Can it be possible that the nation is powerless to prevent this? Are the States of this Union so many independent sovereignties, which are at liberty to build impassable barriers against the people of the whole country unless they will pay tribute to such monopolies as the cupidity or hostility of the States may require? I shall not give my assent to so mischievous, not to say absurd, a proposition.

I am not surprised to see gentlemen on the other side of the House unite to raise the cry of State rights against this bill. They live in the ideas of fifty years ago. We cannot convince them that the world moves. If we tell them that the power to regulate commerce between the States is the power to build trans-state railways; that commerce abandons the lakes and the rivers, and even the ocean itself, and speeds across the continent upon the iron rail, the Democratic party only stares at us. The magnetic telegraph itself can only give it a spasm as it feebly croaks State rights. If a great nation demands national highways for the encouragement of its industries and the development of its resources, no matter how great the necessity, it must yield to every State the right to veto the project. And thus local jealousies, private greed, and ignorant stupidity must be allowed to defeat the most necessary and beneficial measures. My own State is most deeply interested in this question. Surrounded by lakes upon all sides except the south, the great body of her productions and travel must seek an outlet through other States. If these States may at will close up the way by oppressive taxation, our situation is most unfortunate. And I insist that the only security for cheap and speedy transportation must be looked for in the power of Congress to open the way for trade and that intercourse which is a part of trade by annulling repressive State laws or by providing national highways over which the people of all the States may pass upon equal terms. We shall look in vain for any other adequate regulation of the commerce between the States.

If the time allowed me would permit it I should look a little carefully into those interpretations of the Constitution which have been relied upon to maintain the right of the States lying across the line of the proposed railroad to continue the odious monopoly which they have established. But that may not be, and I only say that they constitute a part of a vicious jurisprudence which grew up under the baleful influence of an exaggerated notion of State rights; which finally led those maintaining it to deny to the national Government all rights whatsoever. These interpretations, let us hope, have passed away with the occasion for them, and that hereafter the Constitution may be read in the light of a vigorous common sense, as if it were intended to build up and not to destroy the nation.

With these views of the constitutional authority of Congress over the subject it only remains to consider whether its exercise is now expedient. That the abuse in this instance is great and requires a speedy abatement in some form is not denied. But we are told that to enter upon this system of internal improvement is a most dangerous experiment; that the power is subject to great abuses, and we had better keep clear of the matter altogether. It is true that the power may be improvidently exercised as every other power of Government may be, and in this respect it does not differ from any other; but this does not afford a reason for refusing to perform an act which is clearly proper and necessary; nor is it to be presumed that Congress will act unwisely and in hostility to the public good.

We have been solemnly warned in this debate both from Maryland and Pennsylvania that the passage of this bill will bring down upon Congress the terrible lobby from thirty States, and the whole legislation of the country will be corrupted. Sir, I am not alarmed at this lobby if it shall come, nor do I believe in the danger of its coming. Most of the States already have upon their statute-books free railroad laws, and so far are they from being frightened lest too many may be built that they are stimulating these enterprises to the utmost of their power. There is no danger from the lobby when there are no subsidies, and the virtue of Congress does not need to sound an alarm before the temptation is offered. If the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and Maryland have been able to withstand the terrible lobby while voting special privileges, then I will trust the virtue of Congress while it goes about to destroy those monopolies.

It is difficult to believe that the House will be much moved by this appeal to its supposed weakness, or that it will refuse to exercise a most useful and necessary power in the present case because it is possible that the same power may be abused in some other case. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania is also alarmed lest the company chartered by this bill shall conceive the dangerous design of building its road and running its engines through the middle of his beloved Philadelphia and upon streets at a different grade from that established by the corporation, and in fact smashing up a sidewalk beyond all hope of repair. These be fearful dangers no doubt, but I am sure he will escape them, considering that the company will be obliged to pay roundly for all the property it takes and all the damage it does. And then, sir, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PHELPS] is greatly troubled in a somewhat opposite direction. He evidently fears—and I think we all share in that fear—that the time will speedily come when cars will run past Baltimore by steam. Farewell then, sir, to the charming omnibus line; farewell to the great horse teams which, with the crack of the whip and the sound of a tin horn, take us at the rate of two miles an hour through the metropolis of Maryland with a cheery "Gee-up" and "Gee-ho!" I think we shall reconcile ourselves to this change at Baltimore. It will be some compensation that we shall no longer see women and children, the aged, the halt, and the blind tumbled out of the cars coming in from the Northwest at all times of night and day and in all weather, and delivered over to the howling gang to whom they are compelled to intrust themselves in passing through the Monumental City.

Mr. Speaker, the spirit of American enterprise refuses longer to be bound by these vexatious restrictions upon the speed and comfort of travel. If the States will not furnish the highways required by the people the country calls upon the national Congress to supply the defect, and we shall not long refuse to respond to the call. Let us pass this bill and put upon record our determination to remove out of the way every obstruction placed across the great avenues of commerce and business, whether by State monopolies or otherwise.

Frauds against the Choctaw Indians.

SPEECH OF HON. SIDNEY CLARKE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1869,

On the claim of Heald and Wright against the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, in order to bring this question to the consideration of the House, I will state as briefly as possible the facts in the case. Joseph G. Heald was licensed to trade with the Choctaws in the spring of 1848. In 1858, with a view to retiring, he sold an interest in his store to his two clerks—F. E. Williams and L. B. Dow—and turning over the active management to them, went to live in Massachusetts. In the spring of 1861, the partnership with Williams and Dow having expired, Mr. Heald returned from Massachusetts to take charge of the partnership effects, which belonged almost exclusively to him, the interest of Williams and Dow having been purchased with notes which are still unpaid. In April, 1862, Mr. Heald went back to his residence in Massachusetts.

After the close of the war, on his way to the Indian country to look after his buildings and other property, he heard Commissioner Cooley state to the Choctaws and other tribes who had been hostile that under their treaties and the law of July 5, 1862, these different nations had forfeited and lost all their rights to lands and annuities, but that the President did not wish to take advantage of the forfeiture. It occurred to Mr. Heald that if the Government was willing to restore as a matter of favor lands and annuities to Indians who had forfeited them by acts of hostility it would of course be willing to secure simple justice to its own loyal citizens trading among such Indians under the special protection of a license.

He therefore presented a statement of his claims to Commissioner Cooley at the Indian office, and was referred by him to the Choctaw delegation then in Washington, with the assurance that whatever arrangement they might make for the payment of his claims would be satisfactory to the Department. The claims thus referred to the delegates were under the following heads:

1. For sixty-two bales of cotton taken by the Choctaws.....	$5,580 00
2. For mill property taken by the Choctaws.....	3,923 00
3. For advances to the Choctaw treasurer before the war.....	5,290 76
4. For protested draft on E. W. Lehman & Brother.....	40,943 42
5. For sums due from individual Indians.....	34,551 62
Total.....	$90,288 80

To explain these claims fully as they appeared to the delegates it is necessary to say something of the character of Mr. Heald and of his business. Instead of confining himself to the mere buying and selling of goods it appears that he had taken a good deal of pains to induce the Choctaws to work; had built mills and thus encouraged them to raise wheat; had put up "gins," and distributed cottonseed gratuitously, thereby getting them into the way of raising cotton. He had also contributed largely in various ways toward their schools, had himself built and started a neighborhood school near his store, and had made advances for the schools supported by the nation, some of which advances, amounting to several thousand dollars in gold, were repaid in Confederate paper, now on hand, and of course thoroughly worthless. In his business transactions he had so conducted himself as to secure the implicit confidence of the Indians, and had never had any difficulty or misunderstanding whatever in the settlement of any accounts. All this was well known to the delegates. Two of them had grown up near his store. Of these two one had been treasurer, had kept his money in and conducted his business through Heald's store. He knew that just such advances as are embraced in the claims under the third head had been made while he was treasurer, knew the parties to whom the payments had been made, and also knew that a large sum was actually due to Heald for such advances.

So, too, as to the individual accounts. Heald was unable to give the items, as most of his books had been destroyed, but he furnished the names of two hundred and thirty-two debtors with the balance due from each. The delegates, Page and Riley, and the secretary, Le Flore, knew every one of these names, and knew generally that the parties were indebted to Heald. They did not know the precise amount, but they knew that Heald was not the man to claim what was not justly due him. And it is a remarkable fact that not a single doubt has been cast upon any one of the two hundred and thirty-two items composing the aggregate of $34,551 62, or upon any one of thirty items which made up the sum of $5,290 76 for advances to the treasurer. The attacks upon the claim have been confined to the items for the cotton and the mill property taken by the Choctaws and for the protested draft. The whole amount of $34,551 62 for individual debts was not indeed allowed, but it was reduced in this way: some of the accounts, amounting to $10,000, the delegates said could not be collected. The collection of the remaining $24,551 62 they said would be expensive, and they insisted that $10,000 should be allowed the Choctaw nation for collecting $24,500, thus reducing the allowance for individual accounts to $14,551 62. The charge for advances to the treasurer was allowed by the delegates in full. Its correctness has never been disputed. The claim for cotton was for forty-eight bales and a quantity of unbaled lint and seed-cotton, estimated at fourteen bales more, in all sixty-two bales left at the gin by Mr. Heald in 1862 and taken by the Choctaws during the following winter. The mill property was in charge of an engineer, who left the country in the spring of 1863 to save his life, which had been repeatedly threatened. Before leaving he attempted to sell the engine, mills, gin, &c., but was prevented by the Choctaw authorities, who took possession of the entire mill property and used it for their own benefit until it was captured by General Blunt, of the Union Army. The claim is for the actual value of the property lost in consequence of the seizure by the Choctaws.

The charge of $40,943 42 for the protested draft had its origin in an effort made by the agents of the Choctaw nation to realize in the Indian country the value of certain gold deposited for the nation in St. Louis, on the 24th of August, 1861, for which a certificate had been given, payable twelve months after date, with six per cent. interest on the sum deposited, which was $33,018 89. The certificate had been transferred to E. W. Lehman & Brother, of Philadelphia.

Sampson Folsom states in his letter to the Committee on Indian Affairs that he was specially employed to get this money transferred to the Choctaw country. About the same time Major Heald had a large amount of Confederate paper which he had been compelled to receive in payment for goods, and which he was desirous of converting into funds available in the North, whither he was anxious to transfer his effects. His former partner, Williams, purchased for him Folsom's draft on Lehman and Brother, paying therefor the face of the certificates, namely:

Certificates.....	$33,018 89
With interest from August, 1861, to June, 1862.....	1,649 87
Increasing the sum due in gold to.....	34,668 76
To which he added fifty per cent. premium.....	17,334 38

Making the aggregate paid in Confederate notes.....$52,003 14

The Confederate money, it is admitted, was paid by Williams, and it is also admitted that it was applied at the same rate to the payment of the debts of the nation, its creditors receiving three dollars in Confederate for two in gold. General Pike, one of the creditors, states that he himself was paid at that rate with paper which came from Heald through Williams.

The draft thus purchased was on the 6th of September, 1862, protested for non-payment, and when put in suit a few days afterward the defense set up by Lehman was that he had received the certificates upon which the draft was drawn from his former partner, Johnson, in payment for Lehman's interest in certain partnership property held by and sold to Johnson at Memphis; that Lehman regarded the gold for which the certificates were given as his own property, and had disposed of it accordingly six months before the sale to Williams of Folsom's draft.

The suit against Lehman was still pending, awaiting evidence to rebut Lehman's allegations, when Major Heald's claims were submitted to the Choctaw delegates. Two of them stated that to their personal knowledge Johnson, the former partner of Lehman, had paid the Choctaws full value for the certificates, thereby establishing for Lehman a perfect defense by verifying his statements which Major Heald had regarded as false and fraudulent until the fact of the payment by Johnson, since admitted by Messrs. Folsom and Battice, was made known to him by the delegates.

The claims thus set forth, as presented to the delegates, were of a twofold character, national and individual.

The first four classes, namely—

1. For cotton.....	$5,580 00
2. For mill property.....	3,923 00
3. For advances to the treasurer.....	5,290 76
4. For protested draft on Lehman.....	40,943 42

were all claims on the nation as a body.

The fifth class was of an individual character, namely:

"5. For balances due from individuals, $34,551 62"—swelling the aggregate claims to $90,288 80.

The correctness of this aggregate the delegates, after two months examination of the papers, did not dispute. The only objection raised was to the individual accounts, which, as before stated, were cut down not because they were not justly due, but by striking out $10,000 for bad debts and charging $10,000 more for collecting the residue.

It also appears that the delegates did not wish the alteration discussed in the Senate. They did not want it known at that particular time, when a treaty highly favorable to them was under consideration, that their people had been engaged during the war in seizing the mills and the cotton of loyal citizens, licensed to trade among them, or that their government officers had been guilty of any such swindling as was involved in the double sale of the draft for gold. They therefore agreed to allow the claim, less the $20,000 deducted as above shown from the private accounts, and thereby reduced to $70,288 80, which they requested Commissioner Cooley to provide for in the treaty. Instead of doing so, he prepared the fiftieth article as it now stands, adding $20,000 for Reuben Wright, and requiring the whole to be examined by commissioners who were authorized to investigate other claims, which if allowed were to be paid out of the $90,000 provided for Heald and Wright. Against the injustice of admitting others to share in what was justly due to them, Heald and Wright protested, and appealed to the Senate for redress. To give them an opportunity to be heard the ratification of the treaty was suspended.

The Choctaws and their advisers, unwilling for various reasons to risk any debate in the Senate, appealed to Heald and Wright to withdraw their opposition, and Commissioner Cooley joined in the appeal. It was urged that there were no other claimants who could justly participate in the $90,000 provided by the fiftieth article; that Heald and Wright were the only loyal citizens of the United States who were licensed traders in the Choctaw country, and were consequently the only persons who could claim under that article. Major Heald had objected that it was hard to require him to procure proof in the Choctaw country of the items of his accounts against individuals in the absence of his account books, which had been destroyed during the war, leaving him barely a memorandum of names and amounts due. To this Commissioner Cooley replied that the Choctaw delegates were intelligent men, understood the matter thoroughly, and that their testimony as to the correctness of the claim would be sufficient.

Heald and Wright consequently withdrew their opposition. The treaty was ratified; commissioners were appointed; the claims were examined in this city, and, as the claimants supposed, the case was closed. It was reopened, however, at Fort Smith, in Arkansas, fifteen miles from Major Heald's former trading post. Four attorneys appeared for the Choctaws. No evidence was produced against Wright. That against Heald was confined to the charges for cotton and for mill property. It was not denied that cotton belonging to Major Heald had been taken by the Choctaws. The only question was as to the amount, and whether the Choctaws were properly responsible for it. Witnesses were produced who swore that instead of forty-eight there were only thirty-two bales at the gin; that of the thirty-two only thirteen were taken by the Choctaws, and that the capture and distribution were ordered by the rebel General Hindman, who, it was contended, was alone responsible.

On the other hand, a freedman who had been many years in Major Heald's employment as miller, swore positively under rigorous cross-examination to the number of bales and to the distribution of the whole. Some four or five other freedmen had previously made affidavits to the same effect. There was no sufficient proof that the distribution was ordered by Hindman, and if it was it does not alter the fact that the Choctaws really took and had the benefit of Major Heald's cotton without paying for it. The facts previously stated as to the mill property were fully established before the commissioners, the only opposing evidence offered being that a certain part of the property, now in possession of the quartermaster's department, had actually been restored to Major Heald, (which was shown to be untrue,) at Fort Smith, by the person who then held it for the quartermaster. After hearing all the testimony offered by the Choctaw attorneys at Fort Smith the case was again closed, as the claimant thought finally. But it was opened once more at Boggy Depot in the Choctaw nation, to admit testimony showing that the money paid by Williams for the draft on Lehman was used in aid of the rebellion, which was effectually disproved, not only by Williams himself, but also by Folsom and Battice, who had shown conclusively that the whole amount went to pay Choctaw national debts incurred before the war.

During all these attacks at Fort Smith, at Boggy Depot, and in this city, it is to be noted that not one syllable is said against the justice of Mr. Heald's accounts against individuals or for advances to the Choctaw treasurer, though one of the attorneys who appeared against him at Fort Smith, Campbell Le Flore, as secretary to the delegation at Washington, had examined every figure and was familiar with every name. Another attorney, John M. Nail, was the auditor upon whose drafts the advances to the treasurer were made. And still another attorney, Tandy Walker, lived in sight of Mr. Heald's storehouse, knew all about his business, and was the identical rebel officer who had seized his mills.

It is also to be noted that no allegation has been made affecting Mr. Heald's integrity. Folsom and Battice do, indeed, in sweeping terms denounce the claims of Heald and Wright as unjust, illegal, and fraudulent, but they do not point to a single act of either Heald or Wright, or to a single item in their accounts, as fraudulent in its character. They say that fraudulent means were used in the matter of the protested draft, not, however, by or in behalf of Heald, but in effecting the sale to Johnson, by which Heald was fraudulently prevented from getting his money. And it should be borne in mind that the delegates who first agreed to pay these claims have uniformly insisted upon the correctness of their course, and that the nation was bound in good faith to comply with their engagements. One of them, Allen Wright, has since been elected principal chief, which office he now holds. Two of the others have since the treaty been elected to the council of which they are now members. Moreover, the late chief, who witnessed the treaty and is now a delegate representing the Choctaws in this city, has never taken any part against the payment of the Heald and Wright claims, but on the contrary united with his codelegate, Israel Folsom, in requesting the Secretary of the Interior to provide for their payment. In a word, the only opposition to these claims comes from parties who are to receive one half of all they can save by reducing the payments of Heald and Wright below the awards of the commissioners.

No attack has been made upon the items composing Mr. Wright's claim, which was examined and admitted by the delegates after Mr. Cooley had made provision for it in the treaty. The only charge now made against him affects his loyalty. It is specifically alleged that he furnished supplies to the company of David Harkins, a Choctaw captain in the rebel service. But it appears that Harkins was indicted, with his brothers Clay and Loring Harkins and three others, in the United States district court before the war, for murdering in the most brutal manner a white man living a few miles from Mr. Wright's store. The parties only escaped hanging by obtaining from President Buchanan an order for a nolle prosequi based upon a certain construction of the treaty of 1855 touching the jurisdiction of the United States courts in such cases. The same band during the war butchered a boy on Wright's premises inside of his store-yard. They had frequently threatened to kill Wright himself, and a material point in his case grew out of the manner in which he had been treated by Harkins; and it is a fair inference that it was to avoid any discussion in the Senate of such facts and of the killing of a freedman left in charge of Wright's cattle in the Choctaw country that the Choctaw delegates so readily agreed to pay Wright's claims.

I have thus plainly stated, Mr. Speaker, the material facts in this case. There can be no reasonable doubt but what the sum of $90,000 is justly due to Heald and Wright from the Choctaw nation. There is no question but what the late treaty specifically provides for the payment of this sum; and in full view of all the facts and after a protracted and laborious examination of the whole subject, I do not hesitate to say that the appearance of Folsom and Battice as the attorneys of the Choctaws and under agreement that they are to receive one half of the money due Heald and Wright if they can defeat its payment before a committee of this House is utterly undefensible, shameless, and dishonest, and ought to be rebuked by the prompt action of Congress in the passage of the resolution reported by the committee.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. W. SAULSBURY,

OF DELAWARE,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 8, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. SAULSBURY said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In approaching the discussion of this question I feel embarrassed by the importance and magnitude of the subject. It is presented by its friends in the name of and as a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is no such thing within the proper meaning of the term "amendment" as used in the Constitution. It is a change, an alteration of the Constitution of the United States. It is more: it is a subversion of the Constitution and Government of the United States, and it is a subversion of the constitutions and governments of all the States composing the Federal Union. It is revolutionary in its character. It is such a subversion of the Constitution and Government of the United States, and of the constitutions and governments of the States as, if proposed by two thirds of Congress and ratified by three fourths of the States, will have no valid obligatory force upon any State of this Union which refuses to ratify it.

Sir, in considering a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States in reference to any matter whatever, however comparatively unimportant, it is necessary and proper that its consideration should be approached with great wisdom and caution. The example of the framers of the Constitution should be imitated by us; we should gather wisdom and instruction from that example. The men who framed that instrument were great men, learned men, learned in all the learning of the past. They knew the history of the rise, decline, and fall of the many Governments which had preceded them; and they assembled for the purpose of forming a Government by which civil liberty regulated by law should be for all time secured to them and their posterity. They had been subjects residing in separate colonies dependent upon a foreign Power. They had achieved their independence of that foreign Power while united under Articles of Confederation for the common benefit of all of them. And here, sir, I will remark that such was the love of the framers of the Constitution for the independence of their separate and distinct communities or States, that in those Articles of Confederation they secured, as they supposed forever, to themselves all the principles of independent government which have ever been claimed by any wise legislator as embodied in the doctrine of State rights. That confederation, by the very terms of its articles, was to be a perpetual confederation or union; and to show that the rights of these distinct communities or States were not to be subject to the absolute control of Congress under them, I will cite the second of these articles. State rights, if they had not their origin in the Articles of Confederation, were secured by the Articles of Confederation; and he who now derides and scoffs at the doctrine of State rights is ignorant of the history of his country or willfully perverts the theory of this Government from its earliest foundation. Article two of the Articles of Confederation reads:

"Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

This was the doctrine held by the fathers in the year 1777, when these articles were entered into. Having achieved their independence and having lived some ten or eleven years under these Articles of Confederation and enjoyed their benefits, but finding that they were not adequate to all the emergencies of the States respectively or of the States united, these wise men, these great men, these giants in intellect, in learning and in wisdom, in comparison to whom the legislators and the public men of the present day are but "pigmies perched on Alps," met in convention, and how did they meet? Did they go there at the bidding of some great, central, consolidated power, to receive its commands and to execute its behests? No, sir; they went as ambassadors from sovereign, independent States. They went with power delegated from political communities who exercised sovereign rights, who had secured by the Articles of Confederation that sovereignty to themselves and their posterity forever. Where was the man then in any State who scoffed at the doctrine of State rights? Where was the man so bold as in the face of the community in which he lived to say that his State was not a sovereign State, that his State was not an independent State? Where was the man then who said that it was in the power of any association of States, either under the Articles of Confederation under which they lived or under any form of government that might be proposed which would meet with general favor, to deprive the States of this sovereignty and independence?

What, sir, did these great men do? But, perhaps, I am presumptuous in my utterances in view of the vast learning of the present day; this progressive age, when political science is learned from newspapers and lectures, when the teachings of the fathers have almost ceased to be studied, and when it is the boast of the mere politician to say that such a Constitution as was framed by the fathers and such principles of government as were recognized by them to be salutary and wise would do for them, but that we live in a new era, in a progressive age, that we have learned something, that the world has become more enlightened, and that the legislators and so-called statesmen of the present day carry heads as the special depositories of all that is wise in the science of government and every other science! Sir, they assembled; and did they act hastily, rashly, when they met to propose changes and alterations in the existing Articles of Confederation or to establish a new Constitution; did they agree upon such Constitution hastily; did they say that its wisdom was so manifest, so plain, that it commended itself to the judgment of everybody, and that they must have a night session to hurry it through? No, sir; they proceeded cautiously, wisely. They were men raised up by the Almighty to form organic laws for political society; they were men specially raised up by the Almighty to lay the foundations of empire and to secure to the people of this western world forever the priceless boon of civil liberty regulated by law. That was the object of their high mission, and they applied themselves to the discharge of its duties free from any partisan bias, free from any selfish object, uninfluenced by any other motive than that of the good of the whole country.

They had their differences in reference to the nature and character of the government which should be established. Various plans were submitted to the Convention for the consideration of its members. While there was no one who denied that under the Articles of Confederation each State was sovereign and independent, some thought it would be better to create a new government possessing stronger powers, more comprehensive powers, but none questioned that the States whose representatives were there assembled were sovereign and independent.

I cite these facts because they have relevancy to the question now before the Senate. They go to the nature and character and foundation of the Federal Union as it exists under the Constitution of the United States. Some proposed that a national Government should be established, with a national Legislature, a national Executive, and a national judiciary—a strong centralized Government, whose supreme authority in reference to almost all subjects should be recognized and obeyed from one extent of the country to the other, and within whose keeping should rest the rights of the people of the States. What was the action of the fathers upon that question? Did they mean to establish a national Government? Did they mean to establish a national Legislature? Did they mean to establish a national judiciary? If they had so meant, they would have established them. What did they do? Why, sir, the proposition to establish a national Government, with a national Legislature, a national executive, and a national judiciary, was solemnly voted down in that Convention; the words were stricken out of the plan, and it was then, after long, cautious, and wise deliberation, determined upon by them to establish a Federal Union; and that there might be no mistake in reference to the nature and character of that Federal Union, of the powers to be possessed by the Federal Government and the powers to be enjoyed by the States, they reduced their agreement and bond of union to writing, solemnly signed it, and sent it forth to whom? To the people of the United States? Not at all, sir; because they did not know that there was any people of the United States.

There was then no people of the United States, and in its strict and legitimate sense there is no people of the United States to-day, any further than you may call the inhabitants of this country the people of the United States, because they are the people of the States united. In that sense they are the people of the United States, but in no other legitimate and proper sense. They are the people of the several States united together under one common form of government, with very limited and delegated powers. They did not send it forth to the people of what you call the United States for their ratification. Those men were not in the habit of sending forth organic laws to the great mass of people inhabiting a vast country to be considered in a great Democratic assemblage of unlimited numbers and determined by a unanimous or majority vote of the assembled multitude. The example of the inhabitants of ancient Poland, among whom no law could be enacted but by the unanimous voice of the people, did not commend itself to their judgment. They submitted the organic law framed by them for the common government of the confederated States of the Union to those States respectively—an organic law which, in the language of Mr. Madison, did not so much confer new powers on the Union as it strengthened and invigorated those already possessed by the Union. "Truth is," says he, Federalist No. 39:

"That the great principles of the Constitution proposed by the Convention may be considered less as absolutely new than as the expansion of principles which are found in the Articles of Confederation."

And, sir, the very form of the submission of the Constitution for ratification indicates most clearly and shows most conclusively the nature and character of the Constitution itself. It was framed, not by representatives elected by the whole people of the United States, nor was it framed by delegates appointed by the several States according to population; but it was framed by delegates appointed by the several States, each State having an equal vote upon all its provisions. There is the sovereignty of the States indicated; there is the independence of the States indicated, recognized in the very formation of the Federal Constitution, and while the fathers lived recognized by every act of legislation and every act of amendment of the Constitution.

It was submitted not to the people of the United States, nor to the people of the States; it was submitted to independent, sovereign States, and it was ratified not by the people of the United States, but it was ratified by the several States; and so the form of ratification of every State of that instrument appears of record. My own State, then fewer in population than now, was the first to accept it as the bond of union between the States. She was one of the thirteen that gave the opportunity to these new States to come in and enjoy with her the blessings of a common Federal union; and now, although they have outstripped her in the race of States and outnumbered her in population, and are more extensive in domain, these new States, which were then a howling wilderness, the native domain of the buffalo and the wild animals which roved in their forests—and of these new States one, the youngest of them all—comes and proposes to fasten upon my State and other States, against their will, an amendment, as it is called, to the Constitution of the United States which subverts her government, destroys her sovereignty and her independence; makes her a mere creature to do the will and bidding of a so-called Federal Congress. Modesty, sir, if nothing else, should have kept the State of Nevada, extensive in domain, few in population, a political baby in its swaddling clothes, from coming into the Senate of the United States and attempting to force upon the States which gave Nevada the only right she has to be heard in this Hall, laws and constitutional amendments not only repugnant to the wishes of their people, but destructive of their rights of self-government.

Sir, the fathers framed no national Government. The term "national Government" is of comparatively modern origin. It required the illumination of more modern times to apply to a Federal Union the term "nationality." I suppose, Mr. President, if there were any three men in the United States who understood the true nature and character of the Government meant to be established by the Constitution of the United States those men were Madison, Hamilton, and Jay. Their expositions of it in the Federalist are cited by all parties in this Chamber, and are recognized, in theory at least, however disregarded in practice, as the clearest and most authoritative expositions of the text. And what was the doctrine of these men in respect to the nature and character of our Government, Federal and State? Did they hold that the Federal Government was a sovereign power; that its authority was unlimited, and that the States were created by it, derived their authority from it, and could exercise none except by its permission? Nay, verily. "We have seen," says Mr. Madison in the number of the Federalist already cited:

"That in the new Government, as in the old, the general powers are limited, and that the States in all unenumerated cases are left to the enjoyment of their sovereign and independent jurisdiction."

They held that the authority conferred by the States upon the Federal Government was supreme within the legitimate exercise and operation of that authority, and that the authority of the State governments was sovereign and independent in all matters and in reference to all subjects within their jurisdiction. They nowhere claim for the Federal Government in any one or all of its departments united the possession of sovereign power. Sovereign power is inherent, original, self-existent, and incapable of limitation. Supreme power may be derivative, limited to the objects of its exercise, and by rules established by a superior or sovereign for its exercise.

The States by the adoption of the Constitution created the Federal Government, and in this exercise of their joint sovereign powers limited its authority or derivative power from them to enumerated subjects, and made this derivative power in its just exercise supreme over any attempt to exercise authority in reference to any of these subjects by any other power. But the reserved power or authority of the States is supreme over any attempt to exercise authority in reference to subjects and powers reserved to the States, and within their sovereign and independent jurisdiction. It is a remarkable fact, indicating their precision of language and caution in the use of words, as well as thorough knowledge of the character of our complex system of government, and one which I recommend to the calm and deliberate reflection of those advocating the sovereignty, absolute sovereignty of the Federal Government, that there the earliest and most authoritative expositors of the Constitution nowhere and on no occasion apply the term sovereign to the definition of the powers of that Government, and so frequently employ that term to the State governments.

It may be said because I honestly hold these opinions, and give utterance to them, that I am disloyal; for it is now claimed that any one who believes in the doctrine of State rights is disloyal. It may be said that I am not thoroughly and at heart attached to the Federal Union. Sir, I do not justify my loyalty. I enter into no defense in reference to my attachment to the Federal Union. Harlots can prate of virtue, and men who are sapping the foundations of their Government and plotting its destruction may prate of loyalty. Let such men defend their loyalty and their love of the Union. It becomes not one who has taken his lessons in reference to the nature and character of the Government under which he lives from the teachings of the men who made it.

I say that the fathers held that the Constitution of the United States did not establish a national Government, and was not a national Constitution, and had not the features of a national Constitution in the sense in which that term is now so generally applied.

I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading extensively from the Federalist on that subject; but in one number, written by Mr. Madison, in which he was commending the Constitution to the people for their adoption, he expresses the opinion that it is neither national nor Federal in all respects, but that it is partly Federal and partly national; but nowhere does he say that it confers sovereign power upon the Federal Government. I submit, however, that even in the comparatively unimportant relations in which it is considered by him as partaking of the character of national, it is strictly Federal. He considers the character of the Government first in relation to "the foundation on which it is to be established," "the assent and ratification by the people, not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong." In this respect he declares the Government to be Federal, and not national. The second relation he considers is the "sources from which the ordinary powers of government are to be derived." "The House of Representatives," he says, "will derive its powers from the people of America, and the people will be represented in the same proportion and on the same principle as they are in the Legislature of a particular State. So far the Government is national, and not Federal." Instead of saying that the "House of Representatives will derive its powers from the people of America," it would have been more accurate to have said that the "House of Representatives will derive its powers from the Constitution," and "shall be composed of members chosen every second year," not by "the people of America," but "by the people of the several States," as the Constitution declares, article one, section two. "So far the Government is Federal, and not national."

Without reading from the opinions of Mr. Madison further, I resume my own argument to show that the Government established by the Constitution is Federal, and not national. The composition of the Senate establishes, so far, the correctness of this principle. Article one, section three, provides that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote." The mode of electing the President of the United States is also evidence of the Federal character of the Government. Section one of article two provides that he shall be elected as follows:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress."

In case the election of a President shall devolve upon the House of Representatives, "the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote." If the character of the General Government be considered in relation to the extent of its powers, it is Federal and not national:

"The idea of a national Government involves in it not only an authority over the individual citizen, but an indefinite supremacy over all persons and things so far as they are objects of lawful government. Among a people consolidated into one nation this supremacy is completely vested in the national Legislature. Among communities united for particular purposes, it is vested partly in the general and partly in the municipal Legislatures. In the former case all local authorities are subordinate to the supreme, and may be controlled, directed, or abolished by it at pleasure. In the latter the local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent portions of the supremacy, no more subject within their respective spheres to the general authority than the general authority is subject to them within its own sphere. In this relation the proposed government cannot be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects."—Federalist, No. 39.

I admit that in the operation of its powers, in declaring peace and war, in regulating commerce, in levying taxes, and in coining money, it presents characteristics of a national Government, but not characteristics peculiar to a national Government, a Federal Government. A confederated Government or distinct Government, united by a league, the feeblest of all Governments, may possess the same powers by compact and operate those powers not only on the same subjects, but in the same manner and to the same extent.

The manner of amending the Constitution further establishes the fact that the Government created by it is Federal and not national.

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified"—

"Not by three fourths of the people; but—"
"by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States or by conventions of three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Convention."—Article 5 of Amendments to the Constitution.

From this review of the formation of the Constitution we learn the character of the Government established by it. That Government is a Federal, not national. It is composed of three departments: the executive, judicial, and legislative. Each of these departments is limited as to its powers by the express provisions of the Constitution. The powers of the General Government are delegated, not original. The powers of the States are original, not delegated. To the States respectively or to the people are reserved all powers not delegated by the Constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States. Congress, therefore, can do no act unless the power authorizing the act to be done is delegated by the Constitution to be exercised by Congress.

This is a principle of law which has received a favorable judicial determination, and which is not questioned and cannot be questioned, that the powers of Congress are not sovereign, but limited and governed by the express delegation contained in the Constitution; whereas a State Legislature can do anything that it is not restrained from doing by the constitution of the State.

Mr. President, the power to propose this amendment is claimed to reside in Congress, because in the article providing for an amendment of the Constitution it is declared two thirds of Congress may propose, and three fourths of the State Legislatures may ratify, any amendment. Let us consider the soundness of this proposition. In construing that article of the Constitution of the United States which provides for its amendment we are bound to look at the objects and purposes which the framers of the Constitution had in view when they incorporated that provision in the Constitution, what it was that they contemplated could and might be done under that provision of the Constitution. It does not follow that because the power to propose amendments to the Constitution is secured to two thirds of Congress, and the ratification provided for by three fourths of the States, therefore, under the pretense of amending the Constitution, two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States may incorporate into that instrument any provision which they may arbitrarily choose to incorporate into it. If so, you make two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States absolutely sovereign, and all sovereignty under this Federal Government would then reside in two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States. But mark you, sir, the States, in the Articles of Confederation, reserved to themselves severally and respectively sovereignty and independence, and retain under the Constitution, according to Mr. Madison, a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all objects over which they have not delegated power to the United States. Did they ever part with these attributes? If they have ever surrendered their sovereignty and independence you will find that surrender in the existing Constitution of the United States. Now, show me, sir, in the Constitution of the United States when, where, and how that surrender has been made. If they have not surrendered them—and it is incumbent on you to show that surrender if it exists—they are reserved by an express provision of the Constitution to the States respectively or to the people.

The object of the formation of the Constitution being the establishment of a common Federal Government of limited and well defined powers by compact, agreement, or Constitution between or created by independent and sovereign States, and that compact having been entered into or that Constitution having been made by independent and sovereign States, and there having been no surrender of that independence or sovereignty; the States remain by express reservation in the Federal Constitution independent and sovereign States. The object, then, of the formation of the Constitution being union between sovereign and independent States, with the power of amending the bond of union between them, the Constitution, that power of amendment must be considered in reference to the rights of the parties forming the Constitution and in reference and solely in reference to objects common to all its members; and when you go beyond an amendment of that character, and propose a measure subversive of the rights of any one of the members entering into the Federal Union under this Constitution you become revolutionists, your so-called amendment ceases to be an amendment, and becomes the exercise of absolute and tyrannical power. Sir, had you attempted it in the days of the fathers they would so have treated it, and the fields of these United States, if it had become necessary, would have been reddened with blood; not blood so causelessly and so needlessly shed as that which has been recently shed in the struggle for political power, but blood shed in vindication of the solemn, essential, inherent rights of sovereign communities; blood shed in vindication of their reserved rights of independence and sovereignty; and for such a patriotic vindication of their rights they would have had the sympathy of the wise, the good, and the brave in all times, for the love of freedom and of liberty, regulated by law, has ever animated the hearts and nerved the arms, excited the hopes and inspired to deeds of high emprise the noble and the great.

Is that disloyalty? The world says that Hampden was a noble patriot, but Charles I and some of those who surrounded him denounced him as disloyal and a traitor. You, sir, have talked of the glorious deeds of Hampden. Orators and statesmen have spoken his praise, and of how nobly he vindicated civil liberty against the exercise of tyrannic power. What did he say, sir? In his only recorded speech he declares this as a test of loyalty:

"To deny obedience to a king commanding anything against God's true worship and religion, against the ancient and fundamental laws of the land, and endeavoring to perform them, is a good subject."

How different from the test definition of loyalty applied of late in the free Republic of the United States! To resist the king when infringing the fundamental law, says Hampden, whose merits as a patriot you have lauded, and whose character is the admiration of the world wherever civil liberty has a votary or human freedom has a lover, is a test of true loyalty. And yet, sir, when the late President of the United States, by his own will and of his own motion, suspended that great guarantee of civil liberty and human freedom, the writ of habeas corpus, and when members of this body or citizens of the United States devoted to the fundamental law of the land questioned his authority to do so, this Chamber and the Representative Hall, and the columns of a vitiated and polluted press—these which should have been vindicators of the rights of the citizens and of civil liberty—rang with denunciations of them as disloyal, and willing pens were given to the disreputable task of attempting to show that under the Constitution of the United States the President had the right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. What did you do? What did the self-styled loyal men, many of whom profited by the profession of loyalty, afterward do as evincing their true opinion upon that question? They brought a bill into Congress and passed it, authorizing the President to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and also a bill to indemnify the President and others for acts done under presidential suspension of the writ. The inconsistency in this regard was only equalled by your inconsistency in reference to another measure. President Lincoln assumed and presumed by proclamation to abolish slavery throughout the United States, which you said was all right and a legal exercise of power. It was right as a war measure, and necessary, and slavery was therefore abolished. Then, to show whether you thought so or not, you subsequently proposed an amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery, and you sent it to the southern States, and you said to those States, "If you will only adopt it you shall come back into the Union." What did you want them to adopt it for if slavery was already abolished throughout the United States? And yet to question Mr. Lincoln's power and authority to abolish slavery by proclamation at one time was evidence of disloyalty. You questioned it yourselves. I am sorry that my personal friends, but my political opponents, should have ceased to be loyal and become, like the rest of us, publicans and sinners. You ceased to thank God that you were not like other people, even as these poor Democrats, but laying aside your loyalty you came and joined us and undertook to do over again and cause to be done over again that which you said had been effectually done before.

I do not refer to this subject for the purpose of reviving any discussion upon the subject of slavery, but to stir up the pure minds of my political opponents by way of remembrance, and to show them that though at one time they were sincere saints, like the Pharisee who went up and thanked God he was not like other people; they lapsed from their pious state of political virtue and became like the publicans and other sinners.

Sir, I might cite numerous examples in the history of the world to show that the votaries of civil liberty in all ages entertained the same opinion of the rights of the citizen to resist arbitrary power that Hampden did. Sir John Elliot, one of the greatest orators that ever lived in England, and who suffered imprisonment and died in imprisonment because of his devotion to liberty under a charge of disloyalty to the king, refused to vote supplies for the armies of his country when that country was engaged in a foreign war until a redress of grievances should be granted by the king at home. You have read with enchantment the words of that noble patriot; you have regarded him as one of the noblest spirits, the manifestation of whose genius ever flashed athwart the world; you have held him up to the admiration of your people, and yet he would not vote supplies for the support of the army of his country, though engaged in a foreign war, unless the king should cease to violate Magna Charta and grant the request contained in a petition for the redress of grievances.

Sir Robert Philips, another able and distinguished orator and patriot of the days of Charles I, for declaring that civil liberty under Magna Charta was the birthright of the subject, was seized in his own house, dragged away to prison, incarcerated like a felon, and there languished and the wife of his bosom denied the sight of him; and all because he was disloyal, and disloyal because he held that the British subject had rights secured to him by the provisions of Magna Charta. The officer chief in command under Charles I wrote to his wife that his heart was not in the cause; that there were many occasions to get rid of the king's service, if it was not for what he called "grinning honor." He knew that Charles was warring upon liberty; he knew that Charles was warring upon the British constitution, and yet he wore the commission of an officer, and he could not, as he said, draw his sword in any other cause. Mistaken notion! A sword stained in an unjust cause is not an honorable sword by whoever worn if that war is against the liberties of one's country, and it requires no punctilio of honor to enable even the most gallant and patriotic officer to refuse to wear it in such a cause. Admiral Vernon, though engaged in the service of Charles, had not, as Clarendon confesses, his heart in the struggle; and why? Because it was an attempt by tyrannic power to crush out the liberties of the English people.

I cite these examples, illustrious in the history of that country from whose people we are descended, as examples to show that the entertaining of honest principles and views in reference to the constitution of one's country and the rights of the people under it, although those views may not harmonize with but are antagonistic to the views and opinions of the majority in power and those who exercise the functions of government, is consistent with the greatest devotion and love of country, and, instead of being an evidence of disloyalty, is an evidence of the highest and greatest loyalty.

But, sir, why go back to English history for illustrations? Simply to show you the views entertained by the lovers of freedom and liberty there. I will not raise that dark veil which is spread over your own political transgressions. I shall not attempt to summon up before you the tears of heartbroken wives so copiously shed over the incarceration of innocent husbands because they dared, in the exercise of the intellect which God Almighty gave them, honestly to protest against your usurpations of power in the past. I will not unlock the doors of your bastilles and show you where innocent men have suffered unjustly that party might triumph, for no offense but the honest exercise of their judgment in reference to the Constitution and rights of the people of the country. Would that oblivion might cover the past, and the historian's pen might become powerless when he attempts to record your enormities as a political organization. For the credit, the honor, and the future glory of my country, that the rising youth from generation to generation might look upon the pages of that history and find no tarnish or spot of blemish, I would that forgetfulness might come over the human mind, even though the example might be profitable as one of warning, that this nineteenth century, which you boast is a century of such enlightenment and such progress in the science of government and in the spread of the principles of civil liberty, had furnished the worst example of modern times of the oppression of a free people for opinions honestly entertained and honestly expressed.

But, sir, I come back to my proposition that two thirds of the Congress of the United States and three fourths of the States have not, when the true character of that Constitution is considered and the purposes and objects for which it was formed are considered, the right to incorporate this provision into it and make it a part of the fundamental law. That question depends upon this: what is the legitimate exercise of the power of amendment as proposed by two thirds of the Congress and ratified by three fourths of the States? I maintain that to determine your authority and the authority of three fourths of the States in this regard, the nature and character of the government must be considered, and are essential elements in the consideration of the question. I assert that anything that is destructive of the nature of that Government or of the rights of the parties to it, the States, which are expressly reserved by the Constitution, is not an amendment, but a subversion of the Constitution.

I maintain that there are limitations upon the power of amendment growing out of the nature and character of the Government originally established by the Constitution, and that any alteration or change in the essential nature and character of the Federal Government and of the government of the States is not an amendment within the meaning of the Constitution, but lawless revolution, and that counter revolution may, if necessary to prevent it, be resorted to by the disagreeing States, and that forcible resistance on their part will be justifiable, legally and morally, and that such resistance by the people of those States may become the evidence of the most exalted and noblest patriotism.

An amendment is something which may be done to perfect the Constitution so as to enable the Federal Government to exercise more easily and more advantageously to the people of the States the powers granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government. Any amendment which is not confined to this specific purpose is not an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, but is a subversion of the Constitution. Take this amendment; view it in the light of the Government of the United States as established by the Federal Constitution, and see whether it is necessary in order to enable the Federal Government to exercise more easily or with greater advantage to the people of the several States the powers conferred upon the Federal Government by the Constitution. As I have said, the Federal Government established by that instrument was one of limited delegated powers, confined principally to questions relating to our interests with foreign countries, the regulation of commerce, the coinage of money, and the power of taxation. This is the doctrine laid down by the Federalist. To the States were reserved all authority and power necessary for their internal government and their absolute independence in respect to all questions pertaining to that internal government. That is not only the doctrine of the Federalist, but it was the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, and was the doctrine of all political parties until every man in the country became a lawyer and every mountebank a statesman.

What does this amendment propose? Does it propose to leave the Government of the United States to the exercise only of what were properly and legitimately considered Federal powers—powers which could be properly exercised for the benefit of the different States composing the Union, and which do not interfere with any of the rights of the States to local self-government? No, sir. It proposes that three fourths of the States may not only destroy their own State governments, but that they may destroy the State governments of the remaining fourth. I say "destroy;" I mean "destroy;" I mean destruction; I mean annihilation of the States. It proposes to make this Federal Government, which was designed to be, and which is nothing else under the Constitution but a common agency for the States, a great sovereign power, exercising all authority, not only of Federal, but of State legislation. That Government, the Government of the United States, which is not sovereign and never was a sovereign power, is to be made an absolute sovereignty among the nations of the earth; and the States that made it are to be by the exercise of its authority deprived of all their rights of self-government.

I know that according to the modern newspaper learning on the science of government, according to those luminous views and logical enunciations of the principles of the science of government which we hear on the lecture boards from white and black assembled together by strong-minded women and weak-minded men, women in breeches and men in petticoats, this will be considered a heresy; it will be considered disloyalty. Well, sir, I have one consolation. There are but very few newspapers that I read, and as for public lectures upon the science of government I never listen to them. I never went up to Boston to learn the principles of government or of civil liberty. I have consulted the writings of the able statesmen of New England of our revolutionary period, and of their immediate successors; but I have not afflicted myself by listening to the babbling of her modern empirics in statesmanship. I do not think that these questions are to be determined by the vote of a town meeting. A knowledge of these principles can only be acquired by long study, by observation, and by wise reflection upon the teachings of human experience.

I said that this Government was not a sovereign power in the true sense of that term. Why do I say so? It is a creature. It was created. There is something greater than it; and who are the parties greater than it? The States. They made it; and they can unmake it, and not by revolutions either. By the exercise of constitutional authority and power the States can make it, although it was intended, like the Union formed under the Articles of Confederation, to be perpetual. The States not only made it, but can unmake it. Can that which is a mere creature be greater and sovereign over its creator? Can that which can be destroyed by another power be greater than the power which can destroy it?

Some of my friends here smile. I do not know whether it is with amusement, or whether they are wondering at my boldness.

MR. THAYER. Amusement.

MR. SAULSBURY. Let us see whether it may become a matter of instruction to my honorable friend [Mr. THAYER] rather than of amusement. I do not presume to instruct; but if he is amused at this doctrine, which implies that he doubts it, let us notice it for a moment. I say the States made the Constitution under which only the Government exists. He cannot successfully controvert that position, because it was ratified by the States. The answer sometimes suggested is, "Oh, well, take up the Constitution, look at the preamble, and you will find it reads, 'We the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.'" Therefore it was the people of the United States, the whole body of the people, who did ordain and establish the Constitution. Let me call the attention of my honorable friend to a historic fact. When that Constitution had been agreed upon by the Convention, and had been submitted to a committee on revision and style, not to alter the substance, but simply to consider the style and arrange its provisions under appropriate heads, how did that preamble stand? It stood thus: "We, the people of the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." That is the way the draft stood as it was agreed upon, and if you will read the historic records of the times you will find the fact to be so.

Then, when it was simply submitted to the committee on revision and style for arrangement, to shorten the phraseology, and for no other purpose, they inserted the words "We, the people of the United States," which they intended to bear, and which legitimately bear no other construction than "We, the people of the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Plantations, Connecticut, New York, &c., united, do ordain and establish this Constitution." That is the historic fact; and your Constitution was no more ratified by all the people of the United States than it was ratified by the people of England or France. There was a reason for this change of phraseology of the preamble, as the historians of the Constitution will tell you. The Constitution provided that when ratified by nine States it should be the Constitution of those States. The committee on revision and style found that New York, Virginia, North Carolina, Rhode Island, or some other State might not, as those States did not for a time afterward, ratify that instrument, and might never do it. It would not, therefore, be proper to put into the preamble "We, the people of these States"—naming them; but they put into it its equivalent, "We, the people of the United States"—meaning the people of the States which should unite under that form of government. It was ratified by the States. If it was adopted by the people of the United States what became of New York, Virginia, North Carolina, and Rhode Island? It was a Constitution in force and operative without their assent for a long while. Rhode Island resolutely refused her assent to the Constitution for a considerable period of time. Was there any attempt to force her in? There is an answer to your whole doctrine that the ratification was by the people. If the Constitution was ordained and established by the people of the United States it was a Constitution obligatory upon the four States named before they ratified it.

I also assert that the States can destroy the Federal Government which you assert to be sovereign, peaceably, effectually, and forever, and that the Federal Government, and those claiming to exercise authority under it, could not rightfully resist the exercise of this power of destruction. And how? By the most simple means. Let but a majority of the States refuse to be represented in Congress by Senators and Representatives and the Federal Government falls into ruins and its pretended sovereignty vanishes—a sovereignty not having within itself a sustaining principle of self-existence, but dependent in its essential nature and by the very law of its being upon the will of others, its creators, which can rightfully become its destroyers.

Now, Mr. President, this amendment proposes to change essentially the nature and the character of the Federal Government. In the exercise of the authority which is delegated by it, and under the provision that Congress may enforce it by appropriate legislation, you can absorb all the independence of the State governments, all control over their own State institutions; you can deprive them of every vestige of State authority, and make them absolutely dependent upon the will of Congress. I submit this question, Mr. President, to you and to the Senate: if two thirds of Congress were to propose an amendment and three fourths of the States were to ratify it, to blot out the State of Rhode Island, and the State of Delaware, two of the smallest States in the Union, could you legitimately do so? Would it be a legitimate exercise of the power of amendment to destroy the members composing the Federal Union, to destroy the parties to the Federal Union? I presume that that will not be contended as possible.

What is the difference when two thirds of the Senate propose and three fourths of the States ratify what they call an amendment, which deprives the States of Delaware and Rhode Island of the exercise of authority within their own limits? Your amendment declares that there shall be no distinction in reference to the right to vote or the right to hold office within the States, not only of voting for Federal officers and to hold offices created by the Federal Government, but to vote within the States for officers created by the State, including Governor, members of the Legislature, and every possible officer that exists under State law.

It is a perfectly legitimate mode of testing the soundness of a principle by carrying it out to its logical conclusions. If you have the authority to say who shall vote in a State you have the authority to say who shall not vote in a State. If you have the authority to say who shall not vote in a State, you have the authority to say that no one shall vote in a State. If you have authority to say who shall hold office within a State, you have authority to say that no one shall hold office within a State. If you have that authority, you have the authority to say what shall be the law of that State; how that law shall be enacted; by whom the functions of government shall be exercised. If you can do that, you can go to the hub of the universe, the modern Athens, from whence comes all this modern illumination, and send some one of the wise men from the East to my State to do all the voting and hold all the offices. If you have this power, you may establish a test of political orthodoxy, and you may even make it as a test of the right to vote and to hold office that the voter or person to be entitled to hold office shall swear that he does now most thoroughly believe, and never in his life has questioned, not only the equality of the negro with the white man and his equal right to civil and political privileges, but that he is a little better than the white man, and exclusively entitled to vote and hold office. You can do anything; you can do everything. You can appoint members of the Legislature, if you choose to permit a State to have a Legislature, to make laws to govern me and my people. Do I know that you would not do it? I am afraid to trust you. Confidence, said a British statesman, is a plant of slow growth in aged bosoms; and it is a plant of slow growth in the bosoms of some men who are not very aged, especially when they take into consideration the arbitrary exercise of powers by your party for the last eight years. If you can do these things under a misnamed amendment to the Constitution, by the same means you can abolish all the powers of the State governments and govern the people directly in every respect by congressional legislation. You can establish a congressional despotism upon the ruins of free constitutional government.

Now, sir, I defy any man to show me what single authority any State of this Union would possess if your proposed constitutional amendment is adopted and it be recognized as a legitimate exercise of power in two thirds of Congress proposing and three fourths of the States adopting it. You went a great way when you passed your famous civil-rights bill; but this is an annihilation of the State governments, depriving them of the right to do anything for the government of their own people, for the protection of life, liberty, or property. Why, sir, in the estimation of the party in power, this is a Government of wonderful, almost unbounded power. In fact, it is a Federal Government, as established by the fathers, with but few, and very few powers. Are the people of my State or of your State, and were they meant to be made by the Constitution, dependent upon Federal power, Federal authority, or Federal legislation for their protection in any of their rights of life, liberty, or property?

Mr. President, from earliest childhood I was taught to revere the union of these States, and to love it with all the ardor and affection which youth could show to any object. I had heard the old men speak of what the fathers dared and what they did to achieve independence, and how patriotically they acted in the formation of the Government which secured to every man the right to sit in perfect security under his vine and fig tree and enjoy all the blessings of civil liberty. I had heard them tell how the people of the Colonies had been oppressed by the mother country; how denying to them a voice in the legislation of the country they taxed them for the support of a Government obnoxious to them. As I advanced in years I read in the history, not only of my own country, but of foreign countries, how the love of civil liberty had animated the hearts and nerved the arms of the brave and the good in all nations and in all ages of the world; and how men dared to face every danger and to die upon the field of battle that they might leave a heritage of liberty and of freedom to their children. As I advanced in years I heard the noblest spirits of my own land, gathering inspiration from the mighty theme, tell of the noble struggles of the fathers, of their wisdom in council and their valor in battle, that their descendants, under the protection of that noble flag which was borne on every breeze, over every sea, and in every land, might gather together and rejoice in the heritage bequeathed to them by noble sires. I heard them tell how the poor, friendless boy, with none to guide and direct his steps, under the free genius of American institutions could rise by honest effort and well-doing to fill the highest position under the Government. My youthful heart bounded with joy at the thought that this land was not only mine, but the heritage of countless thousands, and to be the heritage of countless millions throughout the infinite coming ages. My devotion to it did not die when madness, having its origin in fanaticism, led to that fatal struggle which, if this legislation is submitted to, will have been the cause of the loss of all the inestimable privileges and rights of which we vainly supposed that we and our posterity would be possessed forever.

To snatch from the profaning hands of those who would bear away this covenant of our political ark into the possession of the Philistines I come here to-day to attempt to show, although I cannot hope to convince this body, that they have not, under the power to amend the Constitution, the authority to propose this amendment, because in its exercise it would lead to the destruction of the governments which framed the Constitution and the rights of the people secured and meant to be secured by the Constitution. Sir, after you adopt this amendment, if you are disposed to carry it out to its full extent under that provision which gives you the right by appropriate legislation to enforce it, what is there that any State of this Union can do? You take away the power of determining who shall vote and the power of determining who shall hold office within the States, and you leave nothing of the State governments except their ruins. Under the exercise of the power to carry this amendment into execution by appropriate legislation what cannot you do? You can send your soldiery into my State to see who shall vote; surround the polls in time of peace in that State, as you did in time of war, by armed soldiery, and make me walk under crossed bayonets to deposit my ballot, to say whom I should like to be Governor of my State, and who to make laws for my government and the protection of my life, liberty, and property.

Suppose that some man whose whole soul is filled with modern loyalty imagines that one of Afric's tribe has not been allowed to vote, and he bases an accusation against the authorities of the State of Delaware that the denial of his right to vote was on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. By "appropriate" legislation—a word not defined in the instrument, but leaving its legitimate and proper meaning to be determined by each particular head in this Senate Chamber and in the House of Representatives—you send your soldiery there, arrest the State authorities, and subject them to punishment at the will of irresponsible power. One of your loyal men says that the judges of election are not impartial; we must have honest judges. By appropriate legislation you can appoint them. Another says that the return to be made of the votes cast will not be truthfully made by these judges; you must appoint a board of canvassers to make the return. You can do this by sending your military, by the application of test-oaths, by fine and imprisonment, or by any instrumentality which you in your wisdom may think "appropriate." What remnant of State authority is there left? If you can determine all these things, you can determine that we shall have no election; and knowing from your own observation that the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is not only good at law-making, but most excellent at constitution-making, you may appoint him to go down there and make laws for us and make a constitution for us. Sir, our constitution was made by our fathers, and our laws have been enacted by men in whom we have confidence politically and morally; and we would say to all whom you might send there, "Procul, procul este profani."

Mr. President, if Congress by a two-thirds vote can propose this amendment, and if three fourths of the States can ratify it so as to make it binding upon the people of my State and the other States, you can go further, and you can blot out the existence of the States. When you have blotted out two or more than two thirds of the remaining members of Congress may propose to three fourths of the remainder of the States an amendment to blot out, destroy four or five other States, and the same process of proposing amendments and ratifying them may finally reduce your thirty-seven States to four or five or two or three. You can go further. If you can properly propose this amendment—and it is within the competency of three fourths of the States to ratify it—you can propose an amendment to the Constitution to abolish the office of President of the United States, the judiciary of the United States, and the Congress of the United States, and provide for an emperor with absolute power. What would the framers of the Constitution and the men who lived in the days subsequent to our revolutionary struggle and up to a very recent date have thought of a proposition of that kind? What would the framers of the Constitution have thought of it, had it been proposed in the Convention which framed the Constitution? They would have thought of it just as they would of this proposition, that it was a thing not worthy to be entertained, and it would not have been entertained for one single moment. If you can exercise this power in reference to the right of voting and holding office in the States you can exercise it in reference to any subject-matter whatever, even to the subversion of the form of our confederated Union or union of States, and create an absolute despotism at will in its stead.

Sir, if you as a lawyer, or any lawyer in this body, in the discharge of the duties of your or his profession, should have submitted to you an instrument of writing, say articles of co-partnership, in which there was a provision that two thirds of the members might propose and three fourths ratify alterations to the articles of agreement, and it were stated to you that three fourths had turned out of the copartnership one of the copartners and appropriated to their own use the property of the partner so deprived of the benefits of the copartnership, would you say that could be rightfully and legally done? That is, in principle, just what you are doing now.

Mr. President, what are to be the effects of this amendment if adopted? I speak now not in reference to the rights of the States, but of some interests which gentlemen on this floor and members of the Republican party are supposed to have deeply at heart. I have stated that the consideration of a constitutional amendment ought to be approached with great caution and wisdom. You have a large public debt. If I cannot appeal to your understandings and your love of liberty and the rights of the States, I propose for a moment to appeal to your interests. You have a large public debt; your rich bondholders sit back and give their money to elect Presidents and to control elections; you say that you are going to pay that debt, at least my distinguished friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] said in a speech that you could pay it in twenty-one years; only wait, wait, wait a little longer. By this amendment what class of people is it that you are making voters? Already repudiation has been whispered in some quarters. Are you calling to the exercise of the elective franchise prudent, wise, discreet men, who are governed by a sense of honor? Are you not putting the ballot into the hands of half a million of ignorant, uneducated men, who know nothing of honor with reference to your obligations? Take warning, sir. If the standard of repudiation is ever raised you will find in this very class of voters the first to rally round it. I have no knowledge on the subject. I judge them as I would judge other men situated in like circumstances.

What is to be the effect upon society? You give them the right to vote and to hold office, not only under the Federal Government, but in the States. What will be the result? You are either lifting them to the political platform of your own race, or you are dragging yourselves down to theirs. It is in vain, Mr. President, to speak of bestowing equal political rights upon a class of men and then withholding from them those social privileges which, I suppose, will soon come to be considered social rights, where they are equal in every respect. I will not at length cite to you the examples of the nations of the earth who have tried this experiment. History has but one voice upon that subject, and that is the degradation and degeneration of what was the superior race, and not the elevation of what was the inferior race. Sir, with nations and peoples it is as true as with individuals, that "the voice of destiny is in the blood of descent."

History furnishes no example of a hybrid or mixed race that has ever manifested wisdom in council or efficiency in action. Not only the highest, but even a respectable civilization, is unattainable by such a race. The experiment of the civil, political, and social equalization of distinct, of superior, and inferior races, although not so extensively, persistently, and thoroughly attempted as by you, has nevertheless to some extent been made by other people, and invariably such attempt has resulted in the degradation of the superior race to the condition of the inferior, instead of the elevation of the inferior to the condition of the superior race. The descendants of the proud and courtly Spaniard in Mexico can boast, if such can be a cause of self gratulation, that he can embrace those of essentially inferior races with whom he mingles as friends and brothers while exhibiting to the world in his own person and character an example of frightful and loathsome degeneracy arising from the practical operation of a theory repugnant to the instincts of nature, violative of its law, and of the inexorable rule and immutable economy of Heaven. "Equality before the law" has resulted in equality in disregard of law, producing its legitimate fruits of equality in crime, in ignorance, and barbarism. The changes in government and rulers in the mis-called republic of Mexico during the forty years of its existence are equal to those years of continual strife and anarchy, and no intelligent mind can assign other cause of that strife and anarchy than the attempted equalization "before the law" of essentially unequal races. Inhabiting an extensive and one of the finest portions of the world, rich in all the elements and resources of mineral and productive wealth, the people of Mexico have shown themselves incapable of self-government—objects of such solicitude to the more civilized nations of the world as may lead to the establishment over them of an uninvited protectorate in the interest not only of civilization but humanity.

After the abolition of slavery in some or most of the West India islands, the Governments of Central America, for the purpose of increasing their population and thereby developing the resources of their country, invited the then recently emancipated slaves to immigrate to Central America, promising "equality before the law," the right to "vote and hold office, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The invitation was accepted. The emancipated slaves flocked to the land whose fundamental law was equality—political, civil, and social. The Central American Governments faithfully redeemed their promise, and an opportunity was afforded the nations to witness the results in practice of a theory so beautiful in idea. A negro was elevated to the responsible office of chief justice; and when some fourteen years ago, during what is known as Walker's war, a minister accredited from this country to Central America entered upon the discharge of the duties of his mission, he was honored by an official and social call by the learned, distinguished, and sable chief justice. Unable to solve a question which seemed to possess but greatly to trouble his mind, he propounded it to the American minister in the following form: "Mr. Minister, I should like to know what in your opinion will become of the peoples when the populations is all gone?" I commend this illustration of practical "equality before the law, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," to the sober reflection, if of such they are capable, of those who by this measure madly essay the same experiment in this country, where the essential and inherent inequality of races has been so universally recognized and so thoroughly evidenced, and where that inequality is much greater than among any other people inhabiting the globe.

Mr. President, I have thus briefly, but more extensively than I had intended to do, discussed the views of this question which seemed most important to me. I had hoped that before the Senate was called upon to vote on this question we should have heard some reasons assigned for its adoption. I have been disappointed in that hope. Scarcely any one has deigned to give us a reason why the measure should be adopted. I know my honorable friend from New Jersey, in the few brief remarks which he made, said that it had been discussed before the people fully and the people understood it; but some of us had not the benefit of hearing what those cogent reasons were which had convinced the people of the necessity and the propriety of this measure.

The people of New Jersey were not convinced; the people of Kansas were not convinced; the people of Michigan were not convinced; and there is but one State where the people have been convinced, and they were only convinced because negro suffrage was put upon the ticket with General Grant at the head, and it was not allowed to be voted upon as a separate proposition. I know of no people of any State, therefore, that has been convinced of the propriety of this amendment, or of the adoption of its principle by the people of any State.

Mr. President, this question of amending the Constitution of the United States as proposed never was made before the people of any State. Striking out the word "white" in the constitution of some of the States as an act of the people themselves in relation to their own State constitutions had been considered and decided upon and rejected; but when you announced in your platform that the people of what you termed the loyal States should decide this question for themselves you never dared, in any speech that I ever saw reported made by any of your orators, to say that you would appeal to the people of three fourths of the States to determine that question, not only for themselves, but for the people of the States who were opposed to it. No, sir; had you done so I doubt not, notwithstanding you took General Grant for your candidate for President, and as the only hope of your political salvation, and would not have taken him if you had thought there was salvation anywhere this side of the grave for you as a political organization without him—although you took him, you would have been defeated, and most disastrously defeated; and I have a right to presume that you so think now, or you would agree to submit this amendment either to Legislatures or conventions hereafter to be chosen by the people of the respective States.

You are acting in the same mode that you acted with the southern people. You have secured Legislatures you think in sufficient numbers to ratify it; and although it is so unpopular with the people, although the people of the country are so opposed to it, that according to the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] there is not a square mile in the United States where the doctrine is not unpopular, you undertake to force it upon an unwilling people to whom it is obnoxious and odious. What right have you to force a measure upon an unwilling people? If this measure be as unpopular as its friends confess it is, admit it is, what right have you to propose it? Who made you the guardians of the people? They are your masters. I trust in God, after you have exercised this last tyrannical, despotic act, they will show you that while you may "Play such fantastic tricks before high heaven

As make the angels weep,"

yet they have the power to review your action and hurl you from political power as willful violators of sacred trusts unwittingly confided to you.

Sir, the Senator from Nevada, who has this resolution in charge, declined to enter into any elaborate discussion of its principles, or to enlighten us with the reasons which were so manifest to him and so apparent to everybody else why it should be adopted. He tells us that he declines to enter into the discussion because its reasons are so plain, so palpable; and he winds up by saying it is the crowning act of the measures of the Republican party during the last eight years.

Mr. President, it is true it is the crowning act, a fitting crowning act, to the measures of the Republican party during the last eight years. What have been those acts? I do not propose to enter into a detailed enumeration of all the acts of this party during the period selected by the Senator from Nevada, and to consider them in connection with this, the crowning act of them all. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate with enumerating the transgressions of that political organization. I will express my opinion of it in the language of Holy Writ, and that is that "from the crown of its head to the soles of its feet there is naught but wounds, bruises, and putrifying sores. Your sins have been sins of commission and sins of omission. You have done the things which you ought not to have done, and you have left undone the thing you ought to have done, and there is no health in you." And now, before I leave you, I will only express for you the same kind feeling which the judge always expresses to the murderer when he has concluded the sentence of execution against him, "May God Almighty have mercy on your souls," ye murderers of my country's Constitution.

Mr. NYE. I should like to ask a question of the Senator. It is, if when the judge says that, he does not generally stop.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I cannot hear the Senator's question, but when I conclude, if he will raise his voice so that I may hear I shall be very happy to give some attention to so good-natured a gentleman.

Mr. NYE. That is generally the last that is said, is it not?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I will reply to the Senator's question by relating one of his own anecdotes—he is full of them. He stated that on one occasion some one saw a man beating a dead skunk with a club. The man beating it was a Universalist. His neighbor remonstrated with him for beating the skunk, as it was dead. Said he, "You are a Universalist; you do not believe in a state of future rewards and punishments; you ought, therefore, not to beat the skunk after he is dead." "Well," said the man who was beating it, "that is my faith in general, but in reference to this particular skunk I think it deserves punishment after death." [Laughter.] So in reference to this political party. [Laughter.] Although sentence may have been passed and prayer offered, it is not dead yet, [continued laughter;] but if it was dead it is a political skunk that needs punishment after death.

Mr. NYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware if the other party is not dead? If it is not, it ought to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, Mr. President, it lives, and you saw last summer its manifestations of life, and you were compelled to nominate as your candidate for president a man who always professed to be a Democrat, and whom you hoped might carry you through the last presidential election on his military record. You were afraid to take a man that had ever voted your ticket or been identified with your party, and you nominated a Democrat simply because you thought you could elect him on a good war record and could not elect one of your patriotic citizens who preached war but did not fight.

Mr. President, I said that I accepted it as true that this was a fit crowning act to the measures of the Republican party during the last eight years. Measures may be either by enactment or measures adopted in action and evidenced by action. The Republican party has two records of its measures, one expressed in writing in the form of legislative enactments, and one evidenced by its action. Sir, I will enter into no history of the origin of the late struggle. I content myself with saying that it was precipitated by the fanaticism, intolerance, and obstinacy of the Republican party, and might have been avoided by the exercise of wisdom, patriotism, and justice by those representing it in the Congress of the United States. What did you do after the inauguration of war? Without authority of law, as a party you suspended by presidential proclamation that guarantee of civil liberty and the constitutional rights of the people, the writ of habeas corpus. Instead of suspending it, if necessary to be suspended, directly yourselves, you undertook to delegate authority to suspend that writ to another, to the President of the United States; and hundreds and thousands of innocent men have lain in bastilles and suffered from this exercise of tyrannical power which you authorized. Seized suddenly with a love for the negro, you established for his benefit a great Freedmen's Bureau and taxed the white people of this country millions and millions of dollars every year to support him in idleness. Without enumerating all your misdeeds, you passed what you called the civil-rights bill, which invaded every State of this Union, and divested the courts of the States of the power of determining questions relating to the rights of property, life, and liberty within their own States in certain cases; so that in the cases contemplated by your bill the Federal courts could not only try title to lands, titles to or the possession of land, but also usurp the administration of the criminal law, and oust the State courts of their jurisdiction of the criminal law within the States. That was one great stab that you gave to the constitutional rights of the people of the States. I will not argue the questions involved in the miscalled civil-rights bill now. I argued them fully when that measure was before the Senate.

You have wantonly violated every provision of every article of the thirteen amendments designed to protect the citizen in his rights of life, liberty, and property.

Finally, passing over many of your legislative enactments, which, in my judgment, were flagrantly unconstitutional, you dissolved the Union; you annihilated nine or ten States; you destroyed the right of property within these States; you let loose upon the community, if your reconstruction measures were constitutional, the assassin and the murderer to roam and destroy life at will, subject only to the authority of Ulysses S. Grant. In those States you dissolved society, you arbitrarily loosed the bands of society, and sent forth the inhabitants of those States houseless and homeless in a state of nature, vagabonds and wanderers, with a license to all to kill and murder them without the possibility of judicial conviction and punishment of the crime committed.

Sir, gentlemen here from the South may doubt this, but if your reconstruction measures were constitutional at the time they were adopted, and when the representatives of the South had not seats on this floor, I say that no man in any of those States which were not recognized by these acts as in the Union owned a foot of land or any article of property of any character or description whatever. You established a military despotism over nine or ten States greater in extent than England and France and Austria combined, and over eight millions people; and now you propose this as a crowning act of all your measures in the past—an act, an amendment, which leaves unfranchised thousands of the white race, and only enfranchises the negro. Yes, sir; it fitly crowns them all. There is no star in that crown. It is black, horrible, hideous. It is the crown of despotism over the other States of this Union and over the people inhabiting them. It is an attempt to do in the States that never assumed to secede what you did by the adoption of your reconstruction measures—to destroy the State governments and to subvert the liberties of their people. Should it be a subject of rejoicing to the honorable gentleman from Nevada? Sir, it is a measure which, if adopted, will send a thrill of horror through the soul, and fill with sadness, gloom, and despondency the heart of every lover of the Constitution of his country and the constitution and independence of his State in this broad land. No longer can we as Americans boast of our freedom, no longer can we invite to our shores the oppressed of foreign climes; for then the freedom of our fathers will have disappeared; in the place of a free and happy Government the wings of despotism will overshadow us all.

To justify any amendment of the Constitution these facts must be made to appear:

1. Authority to make it.
2. Necessity of its being made, arising from evils suffered from its not having been made.
3. That these evils would not exist if the amendment should be made, and that those evils are greater than would result from the making of the amendment.
4. That society and government would be improved by its being made.

I admit that two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States are, under the Constitution, the judges of the necessity of amendments; but their judgment is not to be exercised arbitrarily, but must be founded upon an honest conviction that amendment is necessary. Apply the four tests of justification which I have suggested to the resolution under consideration, and what honest man can give it his support? It may be within the range of possibility that such a man can be found, but he who accords to such a one honesty of purpose must do so from the charitable conviction that he is intellectually, inherently, and essentially weak.

Mr. President, this proposition has its origin in the supposed necessity of party, not in the necessity of good or wise government. This is so manifest from the uniform action of Congress in relation to kindred subjects, as well as to the proposition itself, that no artifice can conceal the fact, and no denial of it is worthy of credit.

Sir, I protest against the passage of this resolution. I protest against it in the name of the Constitution of the United States of America. I protest against it in the name of the constitution of my State. I protest against it in the name of civil liberty, which is dear and should be dear to the heart of every American citizen. I protest against it in the names of our departed heroes and sages. Were it given, sir, to the wise men who framed the Constitution to look down from the heights above upon their descendants in these Halls of Congress, and could it be possible that sadness could be known in heaven, they would shed bitter tears of anguish over the action of those who are engaged in destroying that which they fondly hoped might exist forever. Pause, Mr. President. Pause, Senators. The destruction of the Federal Union, the destruction of the State governments, the destruction of civil liberty are to be the consequences of your inconsiderate action.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. BAYARD,

OF DELAWARE,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 6, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. BAYARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Without a hope that any argument of mine will avail to prevent the adoption of the pending amendment, yet I owe the duty to the people of my State and to my country to protest against its adoption in any of its forms as not only subversive of our system of government, but also irretrievably disastrous to the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the whole country.

The amendment now proposed to the Federal Constitution, if adopted, not only effects its particular object, to confer the franchise of suffrage upon an inferior race, but, in effect, it subverts the system of government organized by our ancestors, and converts a confederated Republic into an elective despotism. Universal suffrage, the hobby of the day, gives no security for the preservation of civil liberty; and the imperial Government of France, with its six million majority, affords ample illustration of the inefficiency of such a remedy to secure liberty against the aggressions of power. The legitimate object of all government is the greatest good of the whole people, but it does not follow that this object can be attained and secured by vesting political power in every member of the community. I am aware that this is generally assumed, but I have yet to hear any rational and convincing argument in its support. Admitting, fully as I do, that the just basis of all government is "the consent of the governed," yet like all general propositions it is subject to exceptions, and is in fact but a sound political maxim, dependent for its practical application upon the condition of the country and the community to which it is applied.

I am also aware that in characterizing this Federal Government of ours as a confederated Republic I subject myself to the charge made about a year ago by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] of libeling the Constitution of my country. I will not say what our Government now is, but that by those who organized and framed it it was intended to be a confederated Republic I can entertain no doubt.

Mr. President, on former occasions I have given my views of the structure of the Federal Government, and they remain unaltered. I was never an extreme State-rights man, but have always believed that the States had rights. I shall not now attempt to repeat or defend the views I then urged as to the character and structure of the Government. It is sufficient for the present to rebut the charge of the honorable Senator from Missouri, made in his speech on the 6th of February, 1868, which I have before me, by authorities which he will scarcely controvert, which the Senate certainly must respect, and which I am sure will have a preponderating weight with the people of the United States. The language of the honorable Senator in that speech was:

"Mr. President, there are millions in this land who have heard of the Union all their lives, and yet cannot intelligently answer the simple question, what is the Union. Other millions there are who have from the cradle been taught to regard it as anything but what it is, and will answer that it is a confederacy. I hear it labeled sometimes on this floor by being so called."

Mr. President, if in error at least I have high authority for the alleged heresy of considering the Government of this country a confederated Republic, and I beg leave to refer to it for the purpose of sustaining my opinion. When the Government of the United States was organized in the year 1789, after the inaugural address of George Washington, the first Senate of the United States, composed in part of men who had framed the Constitution they were then about to set in motion, ordered that the Vice President should sign an address adopted unanimously in reply to the inaugural address of George Washington. I quote its exact language at its conclusion:

"We beg you to be assured that the Senate will at all times coöperate in every measure which may strengthen the Union, conduce to the happiness, and perpetuate the liberties of this great confederated Republic."

You will find the address at length in the annals of Congress 1789-91, page 32. In the answer to this address by the "Father of his Country" he attributes the same character to the Government. He expressed his happiness in the conviction "that the Senate will at all times coöperate in every measure which may tend to the welfare of this confederated Republic." (Annals of Congress, same volume, page 38.)

I trust, therefore, I may be pardoned, or at least excused, from the charge of heresy when I characterize this Government as a confederated Republic.

Sir, all governments may be divided into governments of will and governments of law, and, in my judgment, a government of law is alone a free government—a government of liberty. A government of mere will, whether it be the will of a single despot, of an oligarchy, or of a majority of numbers, is equally a despotism; and, in my belief, the most remorseless and tyrannical of all despotisms is that which exists by the unrestricted will of a majority of numbers. The reason for this is obvious. A single despot would be restrained in his tyranny from the fact that by its oppressive exercise, the physical force of the community being against him, he would hazard the continuance of his power. The same restraint would operate upon an oligarchy; but the majority of numbers implies physical force, and with its will unrestricted there is no security against the most unrelenting despotism.

Montesquieu, perhaps the most philosophical of all writers upon public law, tells us that no government can be a free government unless its powers are subdivided and confided to different depositaries; and the "Federalist" thus characterizes a government of mere will:

"The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or the many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may be justly pronounced the very definition of tyranny."—No. 47, p. 373, Hamilton's edition.

The State of Massachusetts has embodied this principle in her constitution with great distinctness:

"In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, nor either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judiciary shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end that it may be a government of laws, and not a government of men."

The principle of this division of powers is that from the tendency in man of unrestricted will to tyranny, "the limitation of power," wherever confided, is essential to the permanence of free government. The severance of these general powers of government into legislative, executive, and judicial, intrusted to different bodies, is but "a limitation of power," and except for the purpose of this limitation all the powers of government might as well be confided to one and the same body.

This limitation of power has existed in England since the revolution of 1688, and been rigidly adhered to, notwithstanding the omnipotence of her Parliament. It has been embodied in the constitution of every State of this Union, not perhaps as distinctly in some as in that of Massachusetts; and it is, with some modifications, embodied also in the Federal Constitution.

But, Mr. President, this is but one limitation, and in this confederated Government of ours, as established by our ancestors, there is a still more important limitation of power. It is limited by its decentralization. Decentralization is the leading political principle of the common law; and whatever may be the defects of the common law otherwise, it has been the mother of freedom all over the world. In this Federal Government of ours it cannot be doubted that all laws within the scope of its authority are paramount; but the Constitution which created it makes it a Government of specially delegated powers, and reserves all residuary powers beyond those which are enumerated, and such as are necessary and proper to carry into execution the enumerated powers, to the States and the people of the States.

Among those residuary powers which are thus reserved to the States, beyond all question the control over the franchise and trust of suffrage has from the origin of the Government been exercised by them exclusively until now. The Federal Government in the past has neither attempted to usurp the power as within the limits of the Constitution, nor has it been yielded by the States or their people. Its retention by the States is more important as a limitation of power than even the division of powers among three coördinate departments of the Government. Whenever under any pretext, whether by the name of universal suffrage, impartial suffrage, or uniform suffrage, the control over this franchise is yielded by the people to the Federal Government I shall lose all faith in the preservation of the liberties of the country, for civil liberty cannot be maintained under a centralized elective despotism.

The Government will become consolidated and the limitation upon its power by the people of the States will exist but nominally. The sole security for the decentralization of power rests in the control of suffrage by the people of the respective States, and it has always been hitherto maintained from the origin of the Government.

Now, the proposition is made by some to take away this power altogether, by others to restrict the States in their control over suffrage for a particular purpose. Sir, let this amendment be adopted in any of its forms and the States will have no more real power in this Government than the pie poudre courts in England. They will stand but as "the shade of a name." When this barrier against consolidation is broken down or overleaped, construction will concentrate all power in the Federal Government and leave the States standing to it solely in the relation of counties. Such was not the intention of those who organized the Federal Constitution. Such is not, in my judgment, the true mode in which the liberties of this country can be preserved. One illustration of the usurpation of power by construction, if the control over the elective franchise is surrendered by the people to the Federal Government, will suffice, though there are many more which might be stated did I not fear to overtask my own strength and tax the patience of the Senate. It shows how readily construction may usurp the powers reserved to the States, and take from them all control over even the soil within their respective boundaries against their consent.

The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has already proposed, though the Senate has not yet sanctioned it, to wrench from the States the power of eminent domain and vest in the Federal Government the authority to construct railroads and canals and artificial works all through the States without their consent. Other instances might be given; but the past history of the world and the commonest knowledge of man's nature should teach us that whatever their form, in all governments, the tendency of power is toward its own increase, until ultimately it ends in despotism. If this amendment shall be adopted the honorable Senator will succeed, and one power after another will be usurped by the Federal Government until all are absorbed when it attains control over the right of suffrage, which alone constitutes a real limitation upon Federal power. We shall become a single consolidated republic, which is but another name for an elective despotism. If I am right in my view, of the correctness of which I have the most profound conviction, that only by the decentralization of power can civil liberty and a government of laws be permanently preserved, then you are taking a long stride toward the destruction of the liberties of this country when you take from the States the control of the elective franchise.

I have already stated that I am not an extreme advocate of State rights, and would freely concede to the Federal Government all the powers requisite for the purposes for which it was organized. But I believe that the States have reserved rights, and are necessary parts of our composite system of government. If you look through the debates in the different State conventions, or even the short notes of the debates in the Federal Convention, you will find that the idea throughout, both on the part of those who opposed and those who sustained the Constitution, was that the States were, in the language of a delegate from Connecticut, "the pillars upon which the system rests." I propose to read a short extract from the argument made in the Pennsylvania convention by one of the most practical and able members of the Federal Convention which framed our Constitution, Judge Wilson. His speech was an elaborate one, carefully prepared; because, having been a member of the Federal Convention and having been one of those most active in forming the Constitution, he necessarily had to develop in the convention of his own State the grounds and reasons upon which that Constitution had been framed and the necessity for its ratification by his own State. At page 427 of the second volume of Elliot's Debates I find in that speech this language used by him:

"The United States may adopt any one of four different systems. They may become consolidated into one government, in which the separate existence of the States shall be entirely absorbed. They may reject any plan of union or association, and act as separate and unconnected States. They may form two or more confederacies. They may unite in one federal republic. Which of these systems ought to have been formed by the Convention? To support with vigor a single government over the whole extent of the United States would demand a system of the most unqualified and the most unremitting despotism. Such a number of separate States, contiguous in situation, unconnected and disunited in government, would be at one time the prey of foreign force, foreign influence, and foreign intrigue; at another, the victims of mutual rage, rancor, and revenge. Neither of these systems found advocates in the late Convention."

Sir, in that language is embodied my views of the Federal Constitution. If it is to be consolidated into a single government over the whole Union, usurping all powers, then I hold, with Mr. Wilson, that it would become an unqualified and unremitting despotism. I am as sincerely opposed to severance as any man, but I am also opposed to the consolidation of all powers in a single government, and believe that the amendment now proposed to the Constitution, if adopted, removes the last barrier which secures to the States a single right as against the Federal Government.

Nor must it be forgotten that the extent of our country has been doubled since the Government was organized under the Constitution and this exposition of its structure made by Judge Wilson. A despotism may be established, but it could not long be maintained over a country with such an area as ours, inhabited by so intelligent a people as those by which it is now occupied. I am perfectly aware that whatever may be their benefits in a commercial sense, the telegraph and the railroad have extended the area through which a despotic government is practicable, but not sufficiently to maintain one over a country so extensive as ours, inhabited by such a population.

But a despotism once permitted can only be overthrown by revolution and civil wars, and the demoralization of the people would be the necessary result, ending in sectional divisions and subsequent wars, until from exhaustion we settled down into many nationalities. To avoid so deplorable a result I would adhere to the limitation of powers embodied in the Constitution, and restrict the Federal Government, existing as it does over separate distinct communities which are semi-sovereignities, to the exercise of those delegated powers which are necessary and proper to effect the objects for which it was organized. Among those objects neither uniformity nor universality of suffrage was contemplated, but the franchise and trust was left to the people of the States, who better understand their own condition and the character of their respective populations than the people and representatives of other States possibly can.

For these general reasons, Mr. President, which I will not pause further to elaborate, I am opposed to the adoption of the proposed amendment in all its forms, apart from the particular object which is intended to be effected by its adoption. Before I proceed with my objections to that particular object, let me call the attention of the Senate to a point which has been presented by several other Senators, and been much discussed—I mean to the question of good faith to the people involved in the attempt to adopt this amendment at the present session of Congress, with a view of submitting it to the existing State Legislatures for ratification, without any question having been made as to its propriety before the people of the respective States when the members of those Legislatures were elected.

In the resolutions of what is generally known as the Chicago platform there is contained a declaration of principles by the party there represented, not only in support of its candidate for the Presidency of the United States, but also as presenting the questions which that party advocated in its struggle for the purpose of retaining its majority in Congress. I will read, although it has been read before, the second resolution:

"The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to the loyal men of the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained."

I do not propose to controvert that portion of the resolution now, however objectionable I may deem it in many respects. The resolution then continues thus:

"While the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

Sir, I suppose that when the Representatives of the dominant party made this specific declaration of their principles to the people of the United States and to the people of the respective States they intended the words to be understood in their natural import; and how is it possibly consistent with good faith to the people when they have enunciated in their declaration of principles that the question of suffrage properly belongs in the loyal States, to the people of those States, for the same party at this session of Congress, after having succeeded in carrying the election, to now force through a Congress antecedently elected an amendment of the Federal Constitution by which the people of those States to which it has declared the control over suffrage properly belongs will be deprived of that control, and then by the submission of such an amendment for ratification, not to conventions, but to Legislatures elected under this professed principle of State control over suffrage to attempt to secure its ratification by the agency of party spirit, though it abrogates the constitutions of at least ten States, many of which elected their Legislatures on the faith of the principles thus declared by the dominant party? Sir, no ingenuity, no special pleading can excuse or palliate such political perfidy. We cannot be told that the people would not understand from this explicit declaration of party principles made by the Republican party at Chicago that the party neither contemplated or intended to deprive the people of the loyal States in any mode whatever of a right which it declared properly to belong to them. No sane man can attach any different import to the language of this second resolution, and by no subterfuge can its plain import be explained away. The people could not fear that even the Republican party could be guilty of the political atrocity of depriving them of a right which it had so solemnly declared properly belonged to them. Would that party have dared to go before the people of the United States with all the personal popularity of their candidate, on such an issue as is embodied in the pending amendment? The declaration is explicit, and the attempts made to interpret away its plain meaning, contrary to the natural import of the words, makes the platform but an act of duplicity and evasion. There is no escape from the alternative; either, taking language in its ordinary meaning, it is an explicit declaration that the question of suffrage belongs properly to the people of the States, in the loyal States, or it is an evasion, and they did not dare to present the question to the people. Yet a Congress elected anterior to the late political contest propose now to pass an amendment abrogating the constitutions of ten States of the Union, and submit that amendment for ratification, not to conventions of the States, but to Legislatures elected without reference to any such issue, and after a formal and explicit declaration by the successful party that no such measure was contemplated.

Mr. President, is this good faith to the people, or is it supposed that their perceptions are so dull that the duplicity will not be appreciated, or have the dominant party so little respect for public opinion as to suppose that the people will submit without a murmur to so palpable a fraud and so great a defiance to their will? Is it not, sir, such an act as in the controversies of individuals in courts of justice would be held to be an estoppel in pais because in fraud of the declaration of the party? Is there a necessity for its passage at this session? If this Government is a Government founded upon the will of the people, is it not a dangerous and hazardous experiment, is it not wrong in itself, to attempt to change the organic law of ten States of this Union without ever having submitted the question to the people for decision? That is all embodied in any one of these proposed amendments if they are to be submitted to existing State Legislatures.

Sir, I could make no better—no, not so good—an argument against this proposition as that which the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] made, unwittingly, perhaps, on another constitutional amendment introduced by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] two days before this discussion commenced. The amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania related to the mode in which electors of President and Vice President are to be elected, and its object was to prevent the Legislature from forestalling the will of the people by the choice of electors who would cast the vote of the State for a candidate against the will of the people of the State. It was considered a defect in the Constitution. It was referred to a committee; and the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] reported it back with some amendments, but as it stands now that is the object of the amendment. I will read, as the remarks are very short, what the Senator from Indiana said, that the Senate may see how strong the argument is, not for the purpose of showing inconsistency on the part of the honorable Senator from Indiana—that is of small moment—but because his argument, where his mind was unbiased by party feeling or party objects, on the same principle is clear and conclusive, and more than a sufficient answer to his subsequent pressure of this amendment two days afterward. This is the language:

"It is proposed by this amendment that the people of each State shall appoint the electors, and that the Congress may determine the manner in which these electors shall be appointed. The effect of this amendment is to take away from the Legislatures of the several States the great power which they now have, and which may under certain circumstances be a most dangerous power, and which might bring on civil war and revolution where a Legislature, finding itself in a minority, and unwilling that the people of the State shall vote directly for President and Vice President, may, as it has the power now, repeal the law by which the people can vote at all for these officers and select electors who shall cast the vote of that State. In the desperation of party and in the contingencies of politics such a great power as this should not be left to the Legislature of any State; and while we are engaged in the business of amending the Constitution we should now provide that the people of the several States shall themselves appoint these electors, and that the powers shall not be left in the hands of the Legislatures."

Does not the principle vindicated in these remarks apply with more force in reference to a proposition to submit this amendment to Legislatures elected without reference to any discussion upon it? If this Congress had at its first session reported by a committee in favor of such an amendment as is now proposed, and the propriety of its adoption had been a question before the people of the States, you might without breach of faith, when you had succeeded in that election, have adopted the amendment and submitted it to existing Legislatures elected with a full knowledge on the part of the people that such a question was to be passed upon by them. But you did not do that. Whatever may have been your individual opinions there was no report of a committee, no attempted action of the Senate to deprive the States of their control over the right of suffrage before the presidential election. I do not speak of the reconstruction laws, which are based, in regard to ten States, on totally different grounds.

Well, sir, unless it be indeed true that the possession of power by the election of a President of the United States for the brief term of four years, with the offices that are held and appointed under him, is of more importance to the people of this country than the fact that their State constitutions, organized by themselves, shall not be abrogated by the Federal Government through the means of Legislatures elected upon different issues, upon what principle is it consistent with the doctrines of the Senator from Indiana that this amendment can be properly referred to existing Legislatures of the States?

If it be true that the Legislature of a State ought not to possess the power to take away from the people of the State the right to vote directly for President, beyond all question it is equally true and far more important that it should not be in the power of the Legislature of a State to alter the constitution of the State without the consent of its people. Yet that is the operation of this amendment if confided to existing Legislatures. A proposition like this submitted to any Legislature would necessarily have to be passed upon by the people of the State if submitted in the State Legislature to alter their own constitution. By the organic law of at least ten of the loyal States of this Union the right of suffrage to an inferior race is denied; suffrage is confined to the white race. This amendment proposes to abrogate the constitutions of ten States in this particular, and it proposes to do this through the medium of Legislatures who have not been elected by the people since any such question was made before them.

Sir, the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana in reference to the election of President I believe to be sound, and I accede to it entirely. My only doubt is whether it would not be better to carry the change so far as to provide that the candidate for President and Vice President should be voted for directly without the instrumentality of electors, which is a mere form. I accede to the principle contained in that speech, but the principle applies with far more force to this amendment, and any attempt to obtain its ratification so as to embody it in the Federal Constitution by means of State Legislatures elected anterior to the question being made. When I speak of the question being made I mean an amendment having been reported favorably in the Senate and becoming a matter of known party declaration and party support.

Is it not also true, Mr. President, that within the past twenty years the people of many States have considered and decided on this question of granting suffrage to an inferior race? Within a few years the grant of suffrage to the black race has been before the people, and in many States in which the Republican party had and still have a majority it has been refused by the people. In Pennsylvania the party have not ventured to make the issue. I think I am not mistaken in saying that though the proposition was made to submit such a question about a year ago to the people of Pennsylvania for an alteration of their State constitution, it received but thirteen votes in the Republican Legislature of that State, and could not be made a question of party. Why? Because they well knew that the sentiment of their people was against any such change in their constitution. In the State of New York, within a few years past, the people have refused to change the modified form in which the franchise is there allowed to the black race. Within a few years the experiment has been tried in Ohio, and though the Republican party succeeded in electing their Governor, the proposition was rejected by a majority of near fifty thousand. In Kansas it was rejected by a large majority, and in Michigan also. The franchise of suffrage is denied to the black race by the constitution of Illinois and by the constitution of Indiana, and yet it is proposed, without any appeal to the people, who are the source of power in this country, to abrogate the constitutions of those States by the influence of party spirit acting upon Legislatures who were elected by the people for other purposes and on other issues, with an assurance from the successful party that the control over suffrage properly belonged to them alone within their own States.

Mr. President, it is probable that this amendment in some form will pass by two thirds of both Houses. It may be—I do not know—that the overswaying and perverting influence of party spirit may tempt the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, in defiance of the will of their constituents, to ratify and adopt it as part of the Federal Constitution. But Senators and members of State Legislatures should pause in their action and reflect that however much they may be devoted to the object to be attained by this amendment that this is a Government founded on the will of the people, and that they are acting as representatives. Sir, there is a Nemesis in all human affairs; and deception and broken faith, whether with the people at large or between man and man, will always sooner or later meet its just punishment.

Mr. President, I should not have cared to make, indeed I should have abstained from any remarks in reference to this amendment, could I have had the assurance that the Senate would submit this amendment, when proposed, to conventions of the people in the several States. The Constitution provides for both modes of ratification. If the people of three-fourths of the States of this Union with this amendment fairly before them shall, by the election of delegates favorable to its ratification, determine to yield control over suffrage to the Federal Government, of course it must be submitted to. It will in that event be submitted to. But the effect may be very different if you over-rule the will of the people in the States through the agency of party spirit operating upon Legislatures elected without reference to the question.

If, as the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has declared in reference to the selection of electors of President by the Legislature, that the power should be taken from them by a change in the Constitution, because it is a dangerous power from the possible contingency that "the desperation of party" might tempt the Legislature to elect a President against the will of the people, "which might bring on civil war and revolution," is there not more reason to fear that if "the desperation of party" tempts the Legislatures of the large States to abrogate a vital provision of their State constitutions against the will of its people the hazard of civil war and revolution will be much greater? It requires no change in the Federal Constitution to avoid such a result. You may under the Constitution submit this amendment fairly to the people, or you may seek to adopt it in defiance of their will. I may be told that it has not been usual; that the precedents show that previous amendments of the Constitution have not been referred to conventions. Sir, the Constitution was ratified by conventions. It is also true that up to within the last few years, since civil war has so much demoralized us, of all the amendments proposed to the Constitution not one was intended or did in any respect deprive the States of any right secured to them under the Constitution. Most of them were assented to generally, and many were made conditions in the conventions of some of the States that ratified the Constitution. The subsequent amendments related merely to the organization of the Federal Government without touching the relative powers of the Federal and State Governments.

But this amendment proposes to change the relations of the States to the Federal Government. It changes our system of government, and deprives the people of the States of the last remnant of their control over the Federal Government; and for this reason, if none other, it should be submitted for ratification to conventions in the several States as the Constitution itself was. The change is so vital that it ought to be sanctioned by the people with a full knowledge of its effect, and not by their representatives elected for other purposes. In changes under the authority of the States all alterations are on principle submitted to a direct vote of the people; and if peace and tranquillity is desirable, the same direct sanction should be given to this momentous change. I cannot agree with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania that the slight cost of such conventions, when the magnitude of the alteration is considered, should prevent its submission for ratification in that mode, and no other plausible reason has been given for preferring a ratification by the Legislatures.

A strong reason in favor of this mode of submission is, that if ratified by the direct action and with the free consent of the people of three-fourths of the States there will be cheerful and entire submission by those who believe the change it is intended to effect unwise and prejudicial; but if it is forced upon an unwilling people by means of Legislatures elected without reference to its adoption, so far from producing peace or union or union sentiment in support of the Government, it will lead to irritation from the degradation of the franchise of suffrage, hasten the conflict of races, and be one means by which the free Government under which the people have so prospered will be disorganized and ultimately overthrown. Can it be possible that one motive for this course of action is so to degrade the suffrage as to prepare the way for an elective despotism? I have heard such preferences for despotism expressed by individuals, but I am loath to believe that such a motive can actuate any Senator of the United States.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] will be adopted; and if so, I shall care but little whether the amendment so modified is passed or rejected by Congress. I am perfectly willing to abide the deliberate judgment of the people of the States of this Union if the amendment is submitted to their decision in conventions in the several States; but if that is refused you cannot decline accepting the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, unless you desire and intend by the influence of party spirit to force the suffrage of an inferior race upon the people regardless of their will and your duty to them as their representatives.

I proceed now with my objections to the particular object this amendment seeks to effect. I have never been able to accede to the dogma that suffrage is a natural right, or that universal suffrage is essential or even conducive to permanent free government. It cannot exist in a state of nature; and when men form themselves into communities the governments they adopt must of necessity depend upon the condition and capacity of those over whom they are to be organized. I concede fully the soundness of the maxim that the just basis of all government is "the consent of the governed;" but in fact there never has been such specific consent given by each individual in the organization of any government, and there is no natural right violated when it is denied. A government may be organized on this maxim, and yet numbers subject to its control have no part and no voice in its organization. The frailty of humanity and the tendency of power to corruption forbid its deposit in the hands of a single individual and his posterity, or in the hands of a few, for in either case this corrupting tendency of power would end in tyranny and be used at the expense of the happiness and welfare of the community.

The powers of Government, therefore, are most safely for the benefit of all intrusted to the people at large. But this general truth, like all other general propositions, must be modified in practice, and is subject to exceptions. As to the exercise of the franchise and trust of suffrage there are many exceptions; they vary in the different States of this Union. Idiots and lunatics in all States are excepted from incapacity; felons as a punishment for their crime. There is residence also required, for the obvious reason that to vote with an approximation to intelligence the voter must have had an opportunity to become acquainted with the condition and habits of the community in which the franchise is to be exercised, and also to acquire some knowledge of the character and general standing of those who may be candidates for office. The length of residence required varies in different States, and the people of each State can best determine that for themselves. In some the prepayment of taxes is requisite. Although that exists in my own State I have always been opposed to such a qualification, and have endeavored to have it modified, because the prepayment of taxes has a tendency toward corruption, which is the growing vice of our country. But that, also, is a question for the people of the States and not a question for the General Government.

In a few States there is what is called an educational franchise. It is made a prerequisite to the exercise of the franchise that the voter shall be able to read the Constitution of the United States or of the State or some other paper, and to write his name. I should never object to any State adopting such a franchise if such is the will of her people, for the right properly belongs to them to regulate suffrage within their own State, though I should be entirely opposed to the adoption of such a qualification of the franchise in the State of Delaware; because though I have no doubt that the training of the people is necessary to enable them to sustain self-government I do not believe that merely teaching a man to read and write is such a training as specially fits him for the exercise of the elective franchise.

Moral culture, which depends mainly upon the mother, is far more effective and far more important in securing an intelligent performance of this trust of suffrage. The great principle of the common law to which I have already adverted, of decentralizing power, is the surest basis of self-government by the people, and indeed essential to the maintenance of their capacity for self-government. The institutions of the common law all tend to the decentralization of power. They require that all local business shall be transacted by the inhabitants of the locality. Trace them as you will—overseers of the poor, juries, grand juries, levy courts, and all county organizations—you find that its institutions all aid in training and instructing the people in habits of self-government. It was such training that formed the habits of the people of this country, implanted in them the love and the appreciation of civil liberty, and enabled them to sustain self-government and maintain a government of laws, in contradistinction to a government of will, when they threw off their political allegiance to Great Britain and declared their independence. Centralize the powers of Government now and degrade the suffrage, and the people will lose their capacity for self-government, and one or more despotisms establish their ascendancy, and thus all security of the citizen against the aggressions of power, essential for the preservation of free government, will cease beyond recovery.

Beyond the minor exceptions which I have stated to the maxim that the just basis of all government is "the consent of the governed" there are three general exceptions—age, sex, and race. I have said that I do not consider uniform or universal suffrage is any security for the preservation of freedom, and have given you an illustration which I think conclusive as to its inefficiency for that purpose. I might add, as bearing upon the exception of race, that the historian, in speaking of the Roman empire, tells us "the Romans desired to be all equal; they were leveled by the equality of Asiatic bondage."

First, as to age. If suffrage were a natural right you would find it very difficult to justify the exclusion of boys of sixteen or eighteen, for in general they have quite sufficient mental capacity for its exercise. Indeed, were it a natural right any child old enough to be sworn and give evidence in a court of justice might claim it.

But the right is restrained universally throughout this country. Nay, the age is fixed arbitrarily at twenty-one, founded no doubt upon the principle that the human passions develop more rapidly than the intellectual and the reflecting powers, and that the control over the passions is not sufficient under the age of twenty-one to trust men with the exercise of the franchise. The result would be personal conflicts and riots at elections becoming so general that to avoid anarchy the people would accept despotism. There are boys of eighteen who might be safely intrusted with suffrage, but no tribunal could be possibly organized to determine fairly on the individual exceptions. The question of boyhood suffrage has not, however, yet become a hobby, and it is useless to discuss this exception further. To use the slang of the day, the community has not yet been educated up to the idea because some boys of eighteen may have more intellect and self-control than the average men of forty, and be quite competent to exercise the franchise of voting, that therefore all boys of eighteen ought to enjoy the franchise. But in this age of progress, according to the ideas of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton,] no prediction can be made as to when this question will seriously arise. He has told you that the Democratic party is not a party of progress. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to defend all the measures of the Democratic party even during the period of my own public life. It has often erred, but it has been eminently a party of progress. That honorable Senator should recollect that there are two kinds of progress, and that progress down hill is much more easy and rapid than progress upward. To the "facilis descensus avari," exemplified in the headlong career of the Republican party, the Democratic party has been opposed. Whether that opposition can yet save the country and preserve civil liberty rests with the people to determine.

The next exception is that of sex. I will not argue this question either with communists or socialists, nor with the woman's rights party, because the folly of this species of fanaticism, though it has made great progress lately, is not sufficiently widespread to need an elaborate refutation. The general objections may, however, be stated. Inordinate vanity and the love of notoriety may have tempted some women to unsex themselves, both in their dress and their pursuits; but woman's heart and the instincts of maternity will keep her true to the greatest of her duties in life, the culture and formation of the character of her offspring, the implanting of that second nature, which can only be done early in life, which influences and controls the happiness and welfare not only of her own generation, but that of her posterity. No higher or holier duty could be imposed upon humanity; and this duty rightfully performed is enough to occupy the head and the heart of any human being. There may be exceptional cases of individual women resembling men more than their own sex in their mental and moral organization, who thirst after direct power and revel in notoriety. They must be great women. My answer to them is, I have seen it somewhere written that there are three orders of great men, the worshipers of power, the worshipers of fame, but, for the last and greatest, those who are content with happiness in the performance of duty, history inscribes no tablet. Surely a wise woman should be content to be enrolled in this last and greatest order. Let it not be supposed, Mr. President, in stating these objections to female suffrage, that I mean to characterize the sex as inferior to man. In their combined mental and moral organization I hold them to be quite our equals, if not our superiors. But there is a difference in the physical, mental, and moral structure of the sexes which fits them for the performance of different duties, and the pursuit of different avocations. Sir, it would perhaps be well for the country if duties were a little more considered, as well as so-called rights.

If I desired an illustration of the fallacy of the idea that the ballot, as it is called, is essential for the purpose of protection, I should select the condition of woman in this country. I feel proud and gratified that in this, our own America, there is a chivalrous devotion to the sex which has been equaled in no other age or country. I yield to none in my deference to the sex, and desire to secure and protect woman in all her rights; but suffrage is not a right, but a trust and a franchise.

Can there, Mr. President, be a doubt that the possession of the franchise of suffrage is entirely unnecessary for the protection of woman in all her rights? Has not the observation and memory of every Senator satisfied him that in controversies between man and woman in this country, whether in courts of justice or elsewhere, the general sympathy and the bias is always, though she has no vote, with the woman, and not unfrequently even at the expense of justice, such and so great is her influence? Sir, with all my deference for the sex, I believe there is truth in the advice supposed in one of the "imaginary conversations" to have been given by Roger Ascham to Lady Jane Grey, that "women, like the plants of the woods, derive their sweetness and tenderness from the shade." In my belief, if the sex is dragged down into the political arena, the coarse and selfish, and too often brutal struggle for place and power and spoils, will impair its influence and demoralize woman's nature, and that deference which now exists, and her real influence over man will gradually but certainly fade and be lost, and with that loss we shall, as a people, retrograde in civilization.

The third exception, Mr. President, to the general proposition that the consent of the governed is the just basis of government is that of race. On a former occasion I submitted my views in reference to the relation of the races, and I do not propose now to repeat them; but I hold it to be a truth and a fact uncontradicted by history that where two races of men exist in the same country in large relative numbers so dissimilar in organization as to prevent the fusion of races, equality of political power can only end in the conflict of races. I am unwilling to suppose that there are many members of this body who contemplate social equality and the fusion of races. If there be such I will not pause now to answer them beyond referring to the condition of Mexico with her sixteen different crosses of the Indian, negro, and European. The experiment of self-government with such a population has been tried there, and what has been the result? One revolution has followed another, and one military despotism another, until a country with high natural advantages and great sources of wealth has sunk into a state of insignificance and chronic anarchy, and advancement in civilization has become impossible from the insecurity of protection for either life, person, or property. Elevated as the people of this country now are, social fusion with an inferior race will be followed by the same results to our posterity.

Our own Indians afford another illustration. Numerous as they were at the first landing of the white man, they have perished before his onward pathway, and though humanity may earnestly desire to prevent their ultimate destruction, it cannot be doubtful that to confer upon them political power would only hasten that destruction, and it is at least questionable whether they can be preserved under any circumstances from extinction in contact with so dissimilar and so superior a race. This exception does not depend, however, upon the mere inferiority of races, though I believe the race to which you now propose to yield political power is an inferior race.

But, sir, take a case of races nearly if not quite equal. The Saracens or Moors invaded Spain in the commencement of the eighth century. They overrun and conquered nine tenths of that country. They were the equals if not the superiors in point of civilization to the Gothic nation which had been established there. Nine tenths of the country became subject to their sway, and those who resisted it were driven into the mountainous country of the Asturias. The two races were too dissimilar for fusion, and from that time the conflict of races went on for seven centuries, with all sorts of atrocities perpetrated upon both sides, until ultimately the superior race, in military capacity at least, triumphed in the struggle, and when they did the Moors or Saracens were driven bodily and en masse out of Spain. That is one of the lessons of history as to the certain conflict of races within the same country in the struggle for political power.

Senators are aware that we have in one portion of the country—in California and may have in Oregon—the effete civilization of the Chinese. They are not yet citizens of the United States, but the professed principle of this amendment authorizes, sanctions, and demands their admission to political power, and when that power is granted to them the conflict of races on your Pacific coast becomes inevitable. The Senator from Oregon desires to avoid this. The Senators from California solace themselves under the delusion that the Chinese are not and will not become citizens. They will yet find that the injury they are so willing to inflict upon the people of other States in regard to a different race will recoil upon their own constituents, for by the operation of this amendment, if adopted, and on its principle, the Chinese will be entitled to become, and will become, citizens and voters. They have a higher grade of intelligence than the negro. They have more capacity for persistent labor than the negro, and when they exist in sufficiently large numbers to aspire to political power you will have the conflict of the Asiatic and Caucasian races in California, and perhaps in Oregon. The relations between the Chinese and Americans in California is but another instance of the antagonism of race in the struggle for power. If I am correctly informed, in California the Chinaman is not even admitted as a witness in their courts of justice, except, perhaps, in special cases, and much less will the people of that State suffer political power to be conferred upon such a population against their consent without resistance.

Let me suggest another case. Is any man so little conversant with the characteristics of humanity as to believe that if England were to grant political power to the Hindoo race, which is also an effete civilization, or to even one tenth part of their number, she could hold India two years? Do you suppose the conflict of races would not arise? Sir, the instinct of race is the primary law of nature. Call it prejudice, if you please, but it is ineradicable except by fusion. The Roman lawyers gave to it its proper name. They tell us that the primary law of nature "consists of those instincts which are common to all animals, such as natural affection and the like." You may war against this law of nature, but such legislation will produce but confusion and bloodshed. This amendment is intended to confer political power on an inferior race, and if adopted will cause the antagonism of races to culminate in conflict where the two races exist in such numbers as to affect the social status of the community. Color alone does not constitute the diversity of race between the negro and the Caucasian. The organic difference, though not so obvious, is greater and more permanent.

I will state briefly the results of my own reading and personal observation in regard to the characteristics of the two races.

The negro is more animal than the white race, indolent, but kindly tempered, though when the animal passions are aroused they are less within his control. Wherever he exists in large numbers among the whites as a freeman the negro seeks and sometimes monopolizes those employments which, though precarious, are most highly paid in proportion to the labor and do not require persistent exertion, such as barbers, wood-sawyers, porters, and the like. Improvident by nature, the cases are exceptional in which the desire and capacity for acquisition are developed. In crossing with the white races the intellectual capacity of the offspring is quickened, but the moral nature usually degenerates, and though the mixed race is not absolutely hybrid, the power of reproduction is materially diminished and the duration of life shortened. Doubtless there are exceptional instances of this inferior race who possess more than the average capacity of the white race, but no tribunal could be organized to decide upon the exceptions more safely than in the case of boys under twenty-one. In fact as a race they are children all their lives, and require both protection and control.

Such have been the results of my own observation and my reading in regard to the characteristics of the two races; and yet I have no unkind feelings toward the African race, though I would deny to them political power for their own benefit as well as ours. In the course of a long life I never had the slightest collision with any individual of that race, and I certainly have protected many of them from oppression and wrong, and if I know my own heart, have no feelings in relation to the race other than those of kindness and a desire for their protection and welfare. Neither I nor any of my kith or kin have held slaves or had any interest in the question of slavery since my boyhood. I have, however, stood in a position where I have had an opportunity, unbiased by any interest whatever, to observe the relation of races, and such is the result of my observation. If there be one opinion on which I have a more decided conviction than any other it is that if political power is conferred upon this inferior race the conflict of races sooner or later will be inevitable. I hope earnestly that it may never come in my day; but when it does come, the primary law of nature, the affinity of race will assert itself, and the inferior race will perish in the collision. For their sake, therefore, as well as for the prosperity and happiness of my country, I must resist this partisan attempt to retain power by means of forcing upon the country, against the sense of the people of at least ten States of the Union, a race of inferior organization as their political equals.

Sir, I have already told you that if you will refer this amendment to the people of the States in their conventions, or if, as the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes, you will submit it for ratification to Legislatures to be elected after it has been proposed by Congress, and the people ratify your action, it must be submitted to without hesitation, whatever may be the views of its opponents of the injurious and destructive effect of its adoption.

But, Mr. President, if this amendment is to be passed in any of its proposed forms at the present session of Congress, and is to be referred to existing Legislatures who have been elected by the people of the States without reference to this question, and without the slightest intimation that such an amendment was contemplated by the Republican party, the result may be very different. Nothing can lead to its ratification by the Legislatures of many of the States without first taking the sense of their people, except the overruling and perverting influence of party spirit. It will be a dangerous experiment to make upon the patience of the country to force through an amendment to the Federal Constitution which abrogates the constitutions of at least ten States of the Union against the consent of their people by the faithless betrayal of trust by their representatives. Though this great wrong may be perpetrated those faithless representatives both here and in the State Legislatures may yet find that "it is the last drop in the cup which will cause the waters of bitterness to overflow."

Unequal Distribution of Employes of the Government.

REMARKS OF HON. J. P. C. SHANKS,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 13, 1869.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. SHANKS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I take this occasion to put upon the record, for the benefit of the members of the House, a subject of some importance to the House and the country. It is that of the unequal distribution of the number and rank of the employes of the Government. In a great Republic like this the benefits as well as the burdens of the Government should as near as possible be divided equally among the people. I find, by examination of the Blue Book of 1867, that in eight Departments—the Interior, War, Treasury, Navy, State, Agricultural, Attorney General's, and Post Office—there are employed in this city four thousand three hundred and ninety-four clerks. I take none of those holding higher positions and I take none holding lower positions than of clerks. I include no heads of bureaus, many of whom are also from this District. Of those four thousand three hundred and ninety-four clerks, I find the District of Columbia furnishes directly one thousand one hundred and fifteen; and while that is true, there is a large number credited to different States who absolutely live in the District of Columbia and vote here.

The District of Columbia, in addition to having this number of clerks, has the day laborers and almost all the messengers in the Departments I have named and the employes for all the other public works, offices, and places located here. In the eight Departments named some of the States have but one clerk, some two, three, four, five, six, seven, and so on, the highest number of any one of them being New York, which has seven hundred and ninety; but that is a large State. The following table shows the inequality that exists, and I call special attention to it. This District furnishes over one fourth of the Government clerks in employ in the capital, of whom a large number are grossly disloyal; but aside from their want of loyalty the thing is unjust to the people:

Inequality of numbers of Government civil employes in the Departments at Washington.

The District has all the day laborers in these and all other public employments, and almost all the messengers. In addition to the above showing, there are some accredited to the Army; these are generally employed in the War Department. There are of these two hundred and four there, and some twenty in other Departments.

I think that this matter is one of very great importance to the people of the country, because from these offices, if equally represented from the various districts and Territories, employes would go out to and correspond with the people of the different parts of the country, giving information touching what is going on in the Departments and in the capital, thus keeping up a healthy channel of communication between the Government and people, as valuable and faithful as though it went out from this House. A few days ago I introduced a bill, No. 1711, which may be found on the files, on this subject, which I insert in my remarks, and to which I also ask the especial attention of members. The system of selecting cadets for the Military Academy at West Point and midshipmen for the Naval School at Annapolis is from the congressional districts, so as to equalize the representation and benefits of those beneficiary public schools, and there is no reason why the same justice should not be extended to the Government employes here. Of course, the employments through the country must be made where most convenient, and have in them no national representative character, or position. The more channels of communication that we can open between the Government and people the better for the Republic, and the safer are the people from combinations here.

Our common-school systems and other educational resources have prepared every district with qualified persons for any of these trusts, and justice and the public interest demand that they be afforded, with their fellow-citizens, an equal opportunity to exercise their talents and acquaint themselves with the Government, and in turn acquaint the people with the condition of affairs here. The following is the bill:

bill (H. R. No. 1711) to distribute the number and rank of Government employes among the several districts and Territories.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretaries of State, War, Navy, Treasury, and Interior, the Postmaster and Attorney General, Commissioner of Agriculture, Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and the officers of the House and Senate, to severally cause to be made alphabetical lists of all the employes in their respective Departments or forces, and to correct the same as changes shall be made, and to keep said lists in their several offices, respectively, subject to inspection.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said lists shall contain the name, rank, and pay of the employes of the respective Departments or forces, date of employment, and residence, giving town, county, State, or Territory, designating those who have served in the Army or Navy of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several congressional districts, organized Territories, and the District of Columbia shall be entitled to equal numbers and ranks of employes in the said several Departments and forces. No district or Territory shall have more than one of any rank until every district and Territory, as herein provided for, shall have at least one of the same rank; and all appointments in said Departments and forces hereafter shall be to equalize the number and rank of employes as above provided for; said equalization of numbers and rank of employes from the several districts and Territories aforesaid shall be made by the 4th day of March, 1871: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to regulate the employment and service of day laborers, and boys under the age of sixteen years.

I wish to call the attention of Congress to this matter now, because I think it is due to the people that I should do so. I have sought this opportunity to-day to put these few remarks on record, so that the attention of members may be drawn to the subject when it shall be brought before the House for action.

Question of Privilege.

SPEECH OF HON. S. SHELLABARGER,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 11, 1869.

The House having under consideration the resolutions that the House protest against the counting of the vote of Georgia by order of the Vice President pro tempore—

Mr. SHELLABARGER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to state that in all that I shall say I shall accord most sincerely and fully to every gentleman upon the floor all that integrity of purpose and desire fairly and properly to dispose of the important matter now before the House which I claim for myself. It is not wonderful, sir, that we have fallen into doubt and trouble about this matter, so new, so undefined, and one in which we are to so great an extent unaided by precedent furnishing to us a guide. I shall aim at making my utterances to-day practical and as intelligible as my feeble abilities will enable me to. The resolution the gentleman from Massachusetts has submitted for our approval reads as follows:

The House protests that the counting of the vote of Georgia by the order of the Vice President pro tempore was a gross act of oppression and an invasion of the privileges of the House.

Profoundly as I regret that occurrence, and deeply as I feel the wrong which the resolution does, I shall consider, calmly if I can, the justice of it. I shall do that by first assuming what I understand to be the position of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr.

BUTLER,] who introduces the resolution, that both the twenty-second joint rule of the date of February 6, 1865, and also the concurrent resolution of the two Houses of the date of February 6, 1869, are alike unconstitutional, alike without legal significance and force, and, to adopt his words, equivalent to waste paper. From this stand-point of the gentleman from Massachusetts I proceed to consider the resolution which he has seen fit to introduce.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will permit me to say that in the language to which he refers I was not characterizing the joint rule, but the concurrent resolution recently adopted.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker. I understood the gentleman to characterize the joint rule of 1865 as unconstitutional also. In the morning Chronicle he is reported as using these words:

"Think of it a moment, gentlemen! Suppose at the next election the House of Representatives is one way and the Senate is another. Under that joint rule, if it is constitutional and operative, the House can say 'We will not have the Republican votes counted,' and the Senate can say 'We will not have the Democratic votes counted,' and there is an end to presidential elections."

Let me now bring together some very familiar things, but things which dispose of this resolution. Let it first be remarked and kept in mind that the Constitution provides that the Legislatures of the several States shall fix the manner of choosing the electors. In the next place Congress is authorized by the Constitution to fix the time of casting the vote of the presidential electors. The language is—

"Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States."

Next I beg that the purposes and importance of this provision of the Constitution shall be kept in mind. It requires that the day of voting in the several States shall be the same. With reference to the importance of this constitutional provision Justice Story, in his commentaries, uses this language:

"The propriety of this power would seem to be almost self-evident. Every reason of public policy and convenience seems in favor of fixing a time of giving the electoral votes, and that it should be the same throughout the Union. Such a measure is calculated to repress political intrigues and speculations by rendering a combination among the electoral colleges as to their votes, if not utterly impracticable, at least very difficult, and thus secures the people against those ready expedients which corruption never fails to employ to accomplish its designs."

Next I invite the attention of the House to the legislation of Congress, carrying into effect and providing for the things covered by these provisions of the Constitution. The act of Congress of 1792 fixes the time, in accordance with the constitutional requirement, upon the same day throughout the Union. The fifth section of that act provides, in substance, the same thing that it provided in the terms of the twelfth amendment itself, and I shall presently read it.

It will be seen that this act of 1792 furnishes no additional guide for the counting of the electoral votes beyond what the Constitution furnishes.

I shall now proceed to consider the resolution before the House as if there was no twenty-second rule nor any concurrent resolution of this Congress upon the subject; and I am inquiring whether the resolution ought to be passed, assuming that we have no other guide than the guides furnished us by the statute and the Constitution. That article of the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, in so far as it relates to the matter now before the House, provides for that matter in these words:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, open all the certificates; and the votes shall then be counted."

That is the light the Constitution gives us on the subject as to how the count shall be made, and by whom it shall be made. The thing, it will be observed, to be done in express terms by the President of the Senate, is to open the certificates. The count is to be made then, but by whom is not expressly stated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I go to the difficulty that exists in the Constitution itself, which has brought upon the Government again and again, at least three times over, the same experience which we encountered here yesterday, an experience regretted at its first occurrence with the most intense feeling of anxiety and alarm by all the country, and pointed to as an indication of weakness and of danger in the very framework and structure of your Government. To that danger Mr. Story points in exceedingly suggestive words, to which I will now call the attention of the House. He says:

"In the original plan as well as in the amendment no provision is made for the discussion or the decision of any questions which may arise as to the regularity and authenticity of the returns of the electoral votes"—

The very difficulty we on yesterday, under circumstances so painful, were brought again to encounter. He proceeds:

"Or the right of the persons who gave the votes or the manner or circumstances in which they ought to be counted. It seems to have been taken for granted that no question could ever arise upon the subject, and that nothing more was necessary than to open the certificates which were produced in the presence of both Houses, and to count the names and numbers returned. Yet it is easily to be conceived that very delicate and interesting inquiries may occur, fit to be debated and decided by some deliberative body. In fact a question did occur upon the counting of the votes for the Presidency in 1821 upon the reelection of Mr. Monroe, whether the vote of the State of Missouri should be counted; but as the count would make no difference in the choice, and the declaration was made of his reelection, the Senate immediately withdrew, and the jurisdiction, as well as the course of proceeding in a case of real controversy, was left in a most embarrassing situation."

Then follow these words: "Another defect in the Constitution is," &c.; indicating that the learned commentator regarded this as one of the defects of the Constitution. I call attention to this uncertainty and defect in the Constitution for the two purposes: first, of reminding gentlemen of the high and commanding duty which the existence of this uncertainty and infirmity in the Constitution imposes upon us, and that in dealing with this matter of the electoral vote the utmost forbearance, wisdom, and moderation in our conduct is required, and that violence, excitement, and precipitate or erroneous action here may overthrow the Government itself; second, I allude to this uncertainty in the Constitution to show that the action of the President of the Senate denounced by this resolution was, in a matter where it does not become us nor the gentleman from Massachusetts to be over-confident of his being right, and where language or resolutions of denunciation are exceedingly inopportune, unworthy, and dangerous.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me now to the first and elementary proposition in the poor argument I am about to submit; and it is this, that whatever infirmity there may be in the Constitution in this regard, that infirmity does not go to the extent of leaving everything uncertain, but that there are at least two things made certain, mandatory, and conclusive upon Congress in the terms which the Constitution employs. One of these is that the President of the Senate and nobody else can be authorized either by an act of Congress or by concurrent resolution or otherwise to open the votes. That must be done by the President of the Senate. So in words says the Constitution. The other thing made absolutely certain is that when that thing is done, called in the Constitution "be counted" occurs, then and there there must be present together in one presence, along with the President of the Senate, the two Houses of Congress, and that nothing which in the sense of the Constitution amounts to a counting can occur except in that presence. This is a presence made up of three constituent elements, namely, a President of the Senate, a Senate, and a House of Representatives. So that nothing that amounts to a "counting" can occur, whoever it is that may be permitted to make it, no refusal to count, no agreement to count, nothing that comes to a count can, by any rules or contrivance, be made to occur except in that presence and body or convention made up of the three elements I have named, to wit, a President of the Senate, a Senate, and a House of Representatives. Thus far, Mr. Speaker, there is no room for doubt or debate.

Now, sir, what conclusion does that bring us to? To this: first, that there can be no authority given by law or otherwise, resolution or otherwise, that a count shall be made up by the separate constituencies, acting as distinct or separate bodies, that make up the convention in whose presence a count is to be made. It follows from this inevitably that no concurrent or joint resolution, no act of Congress, can be law which shall resolve these elements making up the convention that makes the constitutional count, and which sends them to make the count in their separate Chambers as separate bodies. It is therefore exactly impossible that this provision of the Constitution can be made by the aid of any concurrent resolution or rule, or even act of Congress, to permit either the Senate or the House or the President of the Senate to separate and go to themselves and by themselves adopt any form of order or decision which shall render it impossible for the joint convention when reassembled to count any one of the States.

Next, Mr. Speaker, I come to the question who it is in the convention that makes the count; and I here venture to state this as a proposition which I stand upon, with an unaffected deference to the opinions of other gentlemen, and yet I state it with very great confidence, that that count, in the absence of legislation upon the subject, is to be made by the President of the Senate. Why? First, Mr. Speaker, because that seems to be the natural sense of the Constitution. It provides that the opening shall be by the President himself. It provides simply that it shall be done in a particular presence, not giving any office or duties to that presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, except that they shall be present. It does assign a particular duty to the President of the Senate in opening the votes, and there it stops, it is true; but taken in connection it seems natural to me that it should be supposed that he is to do the counting.

I know the difficulty that we will encounter from this position, that it gives very great power to the President of the Senate; but it will be seen that there are difficulties whichever way we turn—difficulties pointed out by Justice Story in the language which I have read to the House. The danger of giving the power to reject the votes to either or both Houses, in at least some views, is even greater than in giving it to the President of the Senate, because by rejecting the votes the Senate and House can throw, by their own act, the election of the President into the House and of the Vice President into the Senate.

Another reason why I think it probable that under the present state of the legislation upon this subject, and in the absence of the twenty-second joint rule, or if it be invalid, the President of the Senate is to make the count in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, is that the act of Congress of 1792 so indicates. This act is older than the twelfth amendment itself—for that twelfth amendment was brought into existence by reason of the difficulty that occurred at the election by the House of Representatives of Mr. Jefferson in 1801, as is stated in Story's Commentaries, section fourteen hundred and sixty-six. The fifth section of that act of 1792 provides—"That Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February, 1793, and on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, and the said certificates, or so many of them as shall have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution."

The use that I make of this section is simply that it will be seen here that the statute declares that certain things shall be done. One is that the votes shall be opened; another is that they shall be counted. The Constitution says who shall do the opening, and therefore we are not in doubt about that. But that statute connects the opening and counting together, seemingly making it the act of one and the same instrumentality. But as we know that one of these acts—the opening—must, by the Constitution, be the act of the President of the Senate, and as the statute seems to require the person who does that to do the counting also, it thereby seems to indicate that the President of the Senate counts the votes. This is of course an argument not conclusive; it is only persuasive. But now I turn to another authority, which is more than persuasive in the absence of higher law. I turn to that man who is recognized by us all as one of the masters, not only of our American law, our constitutional law, but of the civilized world's common and international law; I allude to Chancellor Kent. In his commentaries on this part of the Constitution he uses this language:

"The President of the Senate on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be all important; and, I presume, in the absence of all legislative provisions on the subject that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors."

There, sir, for the purposes of my argument to-day I leave this proposition. It is a proposition that commends itself to my own judgment as a sound one, one vindicated by the most illustrious private opinions that are obtainable in this country. The use I shall make of that proposition will appear more fully as I proceed. It is sufficient for me to say here that if Chancellor Kent be indeed not mistaken, and if the President of the Senate "in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject"—and I am now assuming that the twenty-second rule is invalid, because it deprives, as would seem, everybody of all power to count any State if either the Senate or House should by its separate vote refuse to count it—then, instead of the President of the Senate having been guilty of "an act of oppression and an invasion of the privileges of this House," it was an invasion of the powers and solemn duties of that officer for this House by its separate vote to attempt to compel him not to set down the vote of Georgia in the way he did set it down, provided that way was not evidently "unfair" or dishonest.

Let us go now to consider the consequences which will logically be absolutely inevitable from holding that a separate vote of this House shall be permitted to estop both the President of the Senate and the Senate, and the joint convention of President of Senate, the Senate, and the House, each, all, and either, from ever setting aside the decision of this House that Georgia should not be counted. For, mark you, that if the President of the Senate has grossly oppressed and invaded the privileges of this House, it has been done by denying this House the privilege of refusing by its separate vote to reject the vote of a State for President. Suppose that each House separately may proceed to ascertain and decide upon the counting or not counting of the vote of any State, what consequences will follow from it? They have been in part stated already by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in what I have already quoted in vindication of the position that he takes, that it will enable the Senate or the House, either and each, to defeat the election absolutely and in every case of any President, and this for partisan or for worse than partisan purposes. That is so evident that to state it is to prove it. Indeed, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who proposes this most severe and extraordinary censure, has exclaimed himself more than I can exclaim against the frightful consequences which would come from permitting one or either House of Congress to get by itself and there, in separate session, by the per capita vote of its individual members, without debate, vote out the decision of the people of any and every State in selecting the Chief Magistrate of the Republic.

This, then, Mr. Speaker, brings us to again direct attention to the logical and startling consequences of our here declaring that the President of the Senate has been guilty of an act of usurpation and outrage. Outrage in refusing to do what? In refusing to permit the House of Representatives by its own separate vote to defeat (if the case had been, as it might be, of that sort) the election of a President at all; and that is an exceedingly possible case, and one that could have readily occurred at the time of the count of Mr. Clay's last vote for the Presidency. And when the privileges of the House are declared by this resolution to have been invaded, it is material for us to know what those privileges so invaded are. The privilege invaded is the very one the supposed existence of which the gentleman from Massachusetts himself denounced as one of the most fearful suppositions that could be conceived. The power of the House which has been invaded is that power which would enable this House to elect every President, or else to defeat the election of every one. This is the only power that the House has sought to exercise. The act of oppression is in refusing not to obey the separate order of this House, by counting Georgia's vote in the way it was.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Not now; after I have concluded my remarks I will yield to the gentleman for a question if I have time.

Now, I agree, therefore, with what I understood was most earnestly said by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, that the House has not the power to determine by itself whether the vote of any State shall or shall not be counted; and therefore no power of this House or privilege of this House has been invaded, for no such power did in fact exist. I do not allude, in all I have or shall say, to what was done by the President of the Senate in the matter of not entertaining the gentleman's appeal, because the resolution does not allude to or complain of that, but of counting Georgia in the way it was counted. The mistake of the President was in not ruling the gentleman's objection to counting Georgia to be out of order when it was made. It was clearly his duty, under the concurrent resolution of the 6th of this month, to have done that at the time the objection was made, because then it was known that the vote of Georgia did not change the result, and it was therefore known that that resolution required Georgia to be set down in the specific manner pointed out by the concurrent resolution. But the fact that he did not rule it out of order then and did order the Senate to retire, and the fact that the Senate sustained what the President had declared in convention, when the gentleman made the objection, that he was inclined to hold the Houses to their own rule as to what should be done about Georgia, and the fact that the Senate went out, and the fact that it voted the objection to be out of order, and the fact that the President, on the return of the Senate, said that the Senate had voted the objection to be not in order—I say these facts all put together or taken separately did not add to or take from the power and duty of the President of the Senate to decide, at any and all times, that as Georgia's vote did not change the result it should be entered according to the command of our

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Question of Privilege—Mr. Shellabarger.

HO. OF REPS.

concurrent resolution. The error of the President was one committed on the invitation of the gentleman from Massachusetts in permitting the Senate to withdraw; but that took away no power given by the concurrent resolution. But this is aside from the question. I consider that the counting of Georgia was an invasion of the privileges of the House. There is another consideration which makes the danger of holding that the separate vote of this House can defeat the power of the President and the joint convention of the two Houses to count any one of the States so clear that it will strike us as does the sunlight at noonday. It is this: this House, if it have the power by rejecting the vote of a State, may throw the election of the President into its own body, for it goes into the House of Representatives whenever no candidate shall have received the votes of a majority of all the electors appointed. It will enable the House to take away from a candidate really having a majority of the electoral votes the votes of a single State or of several States, thus reducing his vote below a majority; and in that way you give to the House the power to turn into its own body in every case the election of the Chief Magistrate. It is only necessary to call attention to such a consequence and its resulting danger to make it absolutely appalling, and drive us with one common instinct and consent from it. The idea that it could have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution to so frame it that this House alone should have the power in every case not only to defeat the choice of the entire nation in the election of the highest and most powerful magistrate of the nation, and that they should be invited to do so by a bribe put into the Constitution rewarding the House for this defeat of the people's will, by giving to it the selection of that magistrate, is so preposterous and shocking as that it is incapable of argument. And yet if any privilege of this House has been invaded, as the gentleman's resolution says, then it is this privilege of the House to do that identical and monstrous thing!

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The House itself, according to the gentleman's own authority, may defeat the election by withdrawing from the convention and not returning.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. It may be well enough for me to say right here, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, what I meant to say in another place. He is shrewd and learned and knows how to put things. But, while he is all that, he also knows right well how useless and impotent, when we are discussing with intelligent men, is the supposition of extreme and unassailable cases. The case that the gentlemen suppose, that the House has the right to retire and break up the joint convention, is simply to suppose the case of blank, unmitigated revolution; is to suppose an act done in defiance of the plain, express provision of the Constitution, for it commands that the House shall meet with the Senate and its President, and that then, in this presence, the vote shall be counted. To suppose that the House would leave, break up the convention, and defeat the election, is to suppose that the Representatives of all the people have decided to overthrow their Government. It would be shorter and equally sensible to suppose that the people had refused entirely to vote, or that no electoral college had been created, or any other thing that would bring the Government to an end. The gentleman, of course, sees how different the case he supposes is from the case his position in the argument supposes, namely, that the framers of the Constitution deliberately put it into the Constitution that the House of Representatives alone should have power to defeat the people's election of their President and then elect one themselves!

If the true interpretation of the twenty-second joint rule is that no vote shall be counted until both Houses, by separate votes, concur in deciding that it shall be, then it is plainly void as in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which requires in so many words that every act that enters into and makes a counting of the votes shall be in the presence of the two Houses—"the votes shall then be counted."

What I have now said results in this, that if the gentleman be right in declaring our own concurrent resolution of the 6th of February, 1869, unconstitutional, and not a justification of what the President of the Senate did, then his resolution is not aided by its abrogation, because it is impossible to hold that this House had the privilege by its separate vote, in its separate Hall and out of the presence of the Senate and its President, to count or to refuse to count Georgia. The House having no such privilege to be violated, the President of the Senate did not violate it. And yet this is the only privilege of this House which the gentleman's resolution says the President of the Senate violated. I surely cannot be mistaken in this, sir. If I am not, the President is entitled to his country's gratitude—and mark it, sir, he will receive it—for delivering his country from the peril into which we had fallen.

Now, that brings me to an inquiry in regard to what occurred yesterday. We did take a separate vote here in the House upon the question of receiving the vote of the State of Georgia. Against receiving that vote the great body of this House, including myself, voted. How came we to do that, it may be asked, if this was not, as I have argued, a constitutional method of the exercise of this House's power (granting it has some) of counting the vote of Georgia? The answer to that is to be found in two considerations. In the first place there was no other privilege left to the members of this House to vote at all except the privilege of voting in the separate meetings of the two bodies. Whether it would have been wiser for a member of this House who did not regard as constitutional that provision of the twenty-second joint rule which separated the two Houses and compelled the members, if they voted at all, to vote alone in separate bodies to have remained silent, or whether it was better for each to vote according to his convictions of what he ought to do if in a convention of the two Houses, is a question upon which I do not propose now to enter. It is sufficient for the purpose of this case to say that the votes which were cast in the House were such votes as we ought to cast in convention, if we had been permitted to vote there at all, a privilege which we did not have. Whether we erred in casting the vote or not, I need not debate. To have been silent would have, as things were compelled to be conducted if the twenty-second rule were enforced, resulted in forever preventing the count or rejection in any way of Georgia, and thus it would have defeated the determination and official announcement of the election of the President of the United States.

I wish now to inquire for a moment whether the vote of Georgia is one which ought to have been counted by any body under any circumstances. Sir, I maintain that if it be not the law, as Kent says it is, in the absence of legislation, that the President of the joint convention shall do the counting; and if, on the other hand, it be true that the joint body in convention counts the vote, then the vote of yesterday was a proper vote, had it been cast in convention. And this is the true defense of the vote cast by the House yesterday. Why do I say that it was the vote that we ought to have cast? I will put a single case to show that it is impossible that there should not be the power to do, in some way what we attempted yesterday to do touching Georgia, to wit, to exclude the vote for one of the reasons assigned in the objections of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

I have already read the provision of the Constitution that authorizes the State Legislatures to prescribe the manner of choosing electors. Now, the State of Ohio has prescribed, under this provision of the Constitution, that the choosing of the presidential electors shall be by a popular vote. Suppose that there had been sent up to us from Ohio a certificate showing upon its face that the electors were chosen by the Legislature of Ohio, now in session, and that we had been asked to count that vote. Is there a gentleman on either side of the House who will say, that in this matter of counting, we could not, or that somebody could not (whoever may have the power to count) reject such a vote sent from Ohio? Everybody will say it is impossible that we should be required to count such a vote, which on its face is shown to be one that in law has no significance. The power must exist somewhere to reject such a vote. And here, sir, I affirm, once for all, that the thing into which the power that can count this vote is permitted to look in deciding whether a vote shall be counted is the same into which, under similar law, all canvassing officers can look, namely, whether the papers which they inspect, being genuine and legally certified and executed, show that such an election was held or vote given as is authorized by law, and duly show its result.

Now, how was the case we voted on yesterday? I have already shown from Justice Story the reason why the Constitution has wisely required that the vote in each State should be cast "on the same day throughout the Union." By the same authority I show that this is a matter of substance, and not merely directory; that it goes to the very question whether there has been an election of electors. It shows it to be of identically the same substance that these electors should vote on the day prescribed for the holding of their election as it is that the people of the State should vote for these electors on the day the law says they shall cast their votes. This act of the electors is not a ministerial act. Their minds are open and free to make the choice they want to make on the day fixed by law for that choice, and they have a right when they meet in the capitals of our respective States to cast their votes for whom they please as President, if the person voted for has the constitutional qualifications, and if they do not take both the President and the Vice President from the State in which the electors reside. The act of the electors in casting their votes is therefore an election; and if the vote be cast on the wrong day, it is just as mischievous, just as fatal with regard to the validity of their action as if the people had met on the wrong day to exercise their choice. I think we all agree about that. Hence I hold that I and my fellow-Republicans voted rightly yesterday so far as regards the merits of the question; for I maintain that we did not have the privilege of voting—if we had the right to vote at all, if the whole right with regard to counting the vote be not in the President of the joint convention—we did not have the privilege of voting, under the operation of the twenty-second joint rule, in the way we ought to have had that privilege. Hence there can be no question but that our votes in the House were right so far as the merits of the question upon which we cast them are concerned. Whether it would have been better for us to have remained silent I have already alluded to as fully as I care to do. There, sir, I leave that.

Now, what is the application of this whole question, assuming that these rules are invalid? It is (and I commend this to the attention of the gentleman who introduces this resolution) that if the President of the Senate had the power to count the votes then clearly we were invading his rights and privileges in attempting in any way to control that count except to see that it was "fair," to here adopt the word of Chancellor Kent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How are we going to do that?

HO. OF REPS.

Question of Privilege—Mr. Shellabarger.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Well, the gentleman may go for the answer to his question to Justice Story. The gentleman cannot defeat the argument by showing that there may be defects in the Constitution as to how we are to ascertain that, or a casus omissus, as was said yesterday by the Speaker. I answer further that we can prescribe rules by which shall be secured an honest and legal exercise of whatever powers and discretions we possess in making this count by whomsoever that power may be possessed and exercised; and it is because we have this power that I affirm as the next proposition in my argument that the concurrent resolution which we passed on the 6th of February is not unconstitutional, but was binding on the President of the Senate.

It is unlike the concurrent resolution of 1865, because that breaks the convention into two bodies and separates them for the purpose of doing that separately which can only be done in a joint convention. And it does not permit them to review or decide in joint convention what it requires to be voted on and decided in separate votes of the two Houses. This one of 1869 does none of these things. It does not dissolve the convention. It does not require any separate vote of the two Houses. It does not permit the rejection of the vote of any State. It simply provides that if the vote of Georgia does not change the result then that vote shall be set down in a particular way. What does the gentleman find unconstitutional in that, pray? Does the Constitution prescribe how the vote of a State shall be set down (either after it is rejected or counted) upon the official records of that count or on the Journals? Has the Constitution prescribed how we shall make up formally the record of the count? Why, the gentleman with his great learning will still "fail to come to time" on a question like that. The Constitution has left the power in Congress to prescribe the rules under which that count shall be made and how it shall be set down. The resolution that we passed the other day does not really provide for the receiving or rejecting of the vote of Georgia in the substantial sense of the words of the Constitution, "shall be counted." It simply says it shall be entered according to a certain form of statement; and that is what the gentleman says is unconstitutional. It would be clearly unconstitutional if it undertook to count the vote of Georgia in or out. It assumes to do no such thing, but it only says that if it shall be immaterial to the result of the election whether the vote of that State be "counted" or not, then, for a prescribed reason, it need not be decided by the convention whether the vote is a legal one or not a legal one, and that it shall without any decision of that question be entered of record in a prescribed form. This resolution is not therefore amenable to the criticism that it undertakes to count the vote of a State before that vote is opened or known. Now, notice just what that resolution is, what brings it into operation, and what it accomplishes when brought into operation.

Mr. Speaker, it is the failure to be thorough, discriminating, and accurate as to this last thing that produces the confusion of debate and of conclusions and of our conduct in the fearful and sadly painful emergency we have just passed through. Let us carefully consider these. First and all the time it must be kept in mind that this resolution was by its express terms to have no effect whatever, was not to be at all in force, nor to be a law to anybody as to the count of Georgia nor any State except in a certain specified contingency. That contingency must be found to have happened before the concurrent resolution became in any sense a law for the guidance of any one. That contingency was, that the same persons would be elected by the votes of the other States whether the vote of Georgia were valid or invalid, counted or not counted. In other words, the resolution only went into force when and after it had, by the count of the other States, been ascertained and decided that the "count" of the vote of Georgia—decision of the validity or invalidity of her vote—was absolutely immaterial and unnecessary to the ascertainment of the result. When that conclusion was reached that the vote of Georgia was immaterial to the result, and that its validity was not necessary to be decided in order to know with the same certainty who was elected as would be attained after it was decided, then, and only then, the concurrent resolution went into force and play. Thus far there is plainly no possible room for doubt or dispute.

After this point had been reached which brought the resolution into play I implore members to tell me what practical good could come out of deciding whether the vote of Georgia was legal or illegal? If there be no such practical good to come from that decision, then I ask does the Constitution or the law compel us to do a vain thing when the doing of it may result in infinite mischief? Surely not. The law never requires a vain thing as a condition precedent to the attainment of great and substantial ends which the same law provides for and secures. If it did the whole law would be vain, vicious, and absurd.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this immateriality of Georgia's vote had been so ascertained and determined, and our concurrent resolution was thereby brought into force and play, what was its force, what did it do? First, it authorized the President of the Senate to decide and pronounce those to be elected President and Vice President whom the other States had elected and who were elected whether Georgia's vote were valid or invalid, counted or uncounted. Now, sir, suppose this official decision and announcement of who is elected cannot be announced unless and until after it has been officially decided by the convention how Georgia voted, and suppose the returns of Georgia's vote were lost or destroyed so that the convention could neither know nor count her vote—and, sir, this is far from an extreme or impossible supposition—then, sir, would it be unconstitutional or illegal to decide or proclaim who is elected? Must we, then, march into revolution and the Government's overthrow just because that vain and impossible thing, the count of Georgia, has not been done? Who will venture to affirm such a thing. Who will not exclaim that the result of the great people's choice can be legally ascertained and proclaimed though Georgia is not counted? If so, I pray you to tell me whether a concurrent resolution directing that this decision and announcement of the result, without the count of the lost vote of Georgia, would be either unconstitutional or render the ascertainment and announcement of the result illegal? It would not; and therefore that requirement of this resolution, that the President of the Senate should decide and declare who was elected without regard to Georgia's vote, is valid and binding on that President. But this resolution, in the event that brought it into play, required another thing, namely, that the record should state how the vote would stand with Georgia counted and also uncounted. Is that way of making up the record unconstitutional? Why, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, the proposition is so absolutely and self-evidently absurd that I can make the absurdity no plainer by my poor powers of argument, and I will leave that to those having powers adequate to the task.

Sir, the concurrent resolution was valid, and became a law to the convention and its president as to what they should do provided the objection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts was not one which took Georgia's vote out of its operation, and compelled the convention to pass upon it as not being that specific objection to her vote which is named in the resolution's preamble, and the only one which the resolution authorized the convention to omit to decide. This is claimed to be the case, and that because the gentleman assigned other fatal objections to Georgia's vote besides that one in the preamble, as to whether she was such a State as could vote, therefore the resolution did not excuse the convention from deciding this additional objection, and therefore these must be decided as required by the twenty-second joint rule. And we are told that if this be not so then every objection to Georgia's vote, however evidently fatal to its validity, would be by this concurrent resolution shielded from the convention's investigation and the vote be permitted to go unchallenged, though on its very face shown to be absolutely worthless and void. Why, Mr. Speaker, this position may be ingenious, but it is far more vicious than ingenious. Look at it. First it admits that it could legally, and did in fact, order the vote to be set down in a particular way and its validity not to be passed upon, and that the result of the election should be decided by the "counting" body, because one fatal objection to its validity probably existed to Georgia's vote, but it denies that the resolution ought to, did, or could order the same thing to be done, though two fatal objections should be found to the vote! Surely this cannot be. The resolution does not require the convention to admit or count the vote of Georgia if, on its inspection, the convention found it fatally defective. No such thing. But it does require that because there is probably one fatal objection known to exist at the passage of the resolution and before the vote is opened, which objection the convention and Congress cannot well pass upon before or in the convention, therefore the validity of that vote shall for this reason not be passed upon at all, however many other fatal objections to it may be found, unless its validity be found material to the determination of the result of the election.

The known difficulty of deciding the validity of Georgia's vote, which is named in the preamble, brought the resolution into existence, and the difficulty and impropriety of deciding that, if the decision was immaterial to the result, was reason why in express terms the resolution ordered the President to do precisely what he did do, and did in the very words of the resolution; and it, for this reason, required this of him, however many other objections there might be to the vote of Georgia. It made no exceptions. It made no exceptions in its terms by saying that if there were found other objections to Georgia's vote than that named in its preamble, then the President should not obey its orders. On the contrary, it did state one case in which he should not deem it in force or obey it, namely, if it did change the result. Then he was not to regard it, and by its express and unmistakable terms that was the only event in which he was not to regard it. Now, gentlemen say that there were other cases in which he was not to regard it, namely, if somebody should suggest some other objection to it. And for not disregarding this express letter of the rule we ourselves made for him, and for which the gentleman himself voted, he is to be by us the author of the rule denounced as our oppressor and the invader of our rights. He obeyed us not in spirit merely, but to the very letter—word for word, syllable by syllable, and letter by letter, he followed out and obeyed our law—saved the Republic from an appalling danger, and for that we are called upon to brand and blast him with our denunciations!

Mr. Speaker, the power of the President of the Senate to do what he did do was complete. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCODWARD obtained the floor.

Mr. WOODFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have further time.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

the gentleman all of his time, I ask that I may have the same amount of time to reply to him.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object.

Mr. SCOFFIELD. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Ohio was not speaking in the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The floor was assigned to him independently. I ask if he has had his hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio was speaking in his own time; but he had ten minutes last night, which he gave to the Speaker, and has had fifty minutes this morning.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. All I wish is to conclude my remarks by saying that in the election of Mr. Monroe, in 1821, the same concurrent resolution passed by us on the 8th of February was introduced by Mr. Clay, from a joint committee of the two Houses, into the House of Representatives, and was adopted for the guidance of the two Houses. These were its words:

"Resolved, That if any objection be made to the State of Missouri and the counting or omitting to count, which shall not essentially change the result of the election, in that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Missouri to be counted the result would be for A B for President of the United States, — votes; if not counted for A B as President of the United States, — votes; but in either event A B is elected President of the United States; and in the same manner for Vice President."

This was adopted—yeas 90, nays 67. After its adoption the two Houses came together, the President of the Senate passed to the tellers the opened votes of the States. When Missouri's was reached Mr. Livermore, of New Hampshire, objected to its count. A motion by a Senator was made, which prevailed, that the Senate retire to its Chamber, which it did. The House was called to order, and Mr. Floyd moved that Missouri's vote be counted. A long debate arose on that in the House, in which Mr. Clay used these words: "The two Houses ought not to have separated until they had consummated what had been stipulated for." Mr. Floyd's resolution was laid on the table, on Mr. Clay's motion, by a vote of 103 yeas. A message was sent to the Senate that the House is now ready to receive the Senate for the purpose of continuing the enumeration of the votes. The Senate appeared. The President of the Senate, in the presence of both Houses, opened and handed the tellers the vote of Missouri, which was read and registered, and then the tellers made and handed to the President the compared lists of the votes of all the States, and the President, "in pursuance of the resolution" of Mr. Clay, "adopted by the two Houses," proceeded to announce the vote and had got so far as to declare that Monroe, of Virginia, had a majority of the votes for President, and Tompkins, of New York, for Vice President, but had not declared who was elected when Floyd addressed the Chair demanding to know if Missouri had been counted; and thereupon great disorder arose. Randolph also addressed the Chair. The President decided everything out of order; the only business being at that present time that prescribed by the rule of the morning. There was murmur at this decision, but the President proceeded to announce who was elected; and then, on motion of a Senator, the Senate retired while Mr. Randolph was addressing the joint convention.

I refer to it for the purpose of saying that we have the authority of the distinguished names connected with the introduction and passage of that resolution for saying that the concurrent resolution of the 8th of February is constitutional, and the action of the President yesterday is sanctioned by precedent.

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman says that everything that occurred yesterday occurred in 1821. Did such a vote of the House as occurred yesterday occur then?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Not such a vote as that of yesterday, but just such a setting down of the vote of Missouri in a hypothetical way—in the way in which Georgia was to be set down, and in which it was set down yesterday—did occur in the election of Mr. Monroe, and every other step in the case.

Mr. WOODWARD. But the House did not in that instance refuse to count the vote, as they did in this instance.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. There was then no such concurrent resolution as is now contained in the twenty-second rule. The whole thing was conducted under such a concurrent resolution as we passed on the 6th of this month.

National Currency.

SPEECH OF HON. R. P. BUCKLAND,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1869.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864—

Mr. BUCKLAND said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise principally for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency to the fourth section of the pending bill. I am not entirely satisfied with that section as it came from the Senate, but I think it is better and more just than the amendment proposed by the committee.

It is not necessary to consider at this time what were the circumstances leading to the establishment of the national banks. Whatever may have been the inducements to grant these exclusive privileges, the system has been established by law for nearly six years, and these national banks have enjoyed during that time the exclusive privilege of issuing paper money and making profit thereby. The Government of the United States are under no obligations to them at all, for they have been more than compensated in profits for all the aid rendered by them to the Government. Nor have they any claim on the ground of a subsisting contract, because the laws under which they are organized provided that they may at any time be altered, amended or repealed. It is a question only of public policy and of justice to the people of all the States as to how the Government shall distribute these exclusive and profitable privileges.

The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. POMEROY] stated in his remarks that the capitalists of New York and of the eastern States came forward in times of great trouble and uncertainty and loaned to the Government their capital to carry on the war and to sustain its credit. He also told us that these banks were organized for this purpose. Now, Mr. Speaker, is not the simple truth just this, that these capitalists, when the Government was in distress for money, came to it and said that if it would pass a law by which they could make a profit of from ten to fifty per cent. on the use of their money they would organize under that law and take the bonds of the United States? But admit all that is claimed by the chairman of the committee, and all others representing this great interest, what has been the result? Why, sir, the result has been that from the organization of these banks down to the present day they have made from ten to fifty per cent. per annum profit on their investments; and I am told some of them more than fifty per cent. per annum. I say, therefore, that this question is not to be settled upon any consideration that it is a hardship to the States having more than their just proportion of this banking circulation to require them to surrender a small part of the excess. It is not a hardship at all. We are met at the threshold with this objection, but I contend that we are bound to do equal justice to the people of all the States. No set of men who have enjoyed these privileges under the law for four or five years have the right to come here now and say that they must be continued in the enjoyment of more than their proportion of the profits of issuing paper money because they have been permitted to do so heretofore.

The first law authorizing national banks, passed in 1863, required $150,000,000 of the circulation to be "apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and the Territories according to representative population, and the remainder by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to existing banking capital, resource, and business of such State, District, and Territory." But on the 3d of June, 1864, the national banking law was enacted, leaving this provision out. On the 3d of March, 1865, the provision was restored and remains in force; but before it was restored the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York had absorbed more than one half of the entire circulation authorized for all the States, thereby preventing other States from obtaining their due proportion in accordance with that provision. They still retain it, and I presume will not willingly relinquish the profits they are making thereby, however unjust this inequality may be to the people of the other States. I have prepared a table from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, showing the number of national banks in each of the States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories, and the circulation in each in October last. Also, the number of Representatives in Congress from each State, to indicate the representative population which, in my opinion, is the only just basis for the apportionment of the national banking circulation among the States:

By reference to this table it appears that Massachusetts, with only ten of the two hundred and forty-two Representatives, has now $57,084,640, more than one sixth of the entire national bank circulation; and Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York, with only forty-seven Representatives, have $155,873,639, more than one half of the entire amount. These four States have more bank circulation than all the rest of the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia put together. Massachusetts has more circulation than Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri; and yet Massachusetts has only ten Representatives, while the other States named have seventy five. Connecticut, with only six Representatives, has $17,443,793, and Rhode Island, with only two Representatives, has $12,491,480; Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Pennsylvania, and Maryland have an excess over their proportion according to population, but not near so great an excess.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to find fault with Massachusetts or New York, or any other State, or to do them injustice; but I do say that if this banking system is to remain in force the people of the West will demand that they have their share of its benefits, and the people of the South will also make the same demand; and, sir, they have a right to demand it. Because certain fortunate people of these eastern States have already laid up princely fortunes out of this business, is that any reason why they should continue to do so to the exclusion of the people of the other States? I think not. I contend that the privilege of using the credit of the United States for making money should be distributed among the people of all the States as nearly equal as possible, and if the national bank currency is to be limited to $300,000,000 it should be distributed not according to property, but according to population, provided the population of the several States desire this proportion. Because the people in certain portions of the country have more capital than in others is no reason why they should have more of these facilities than the less wealthy people of other States. On the contrary, the fact that the people of some of the States have less wealth than in others is a very good reason why this Government should legislate to better their condition.

But the proposition of the majority of the committee is to cut down all the banks for the purpose of obtaining the desired amount to be distributed in the southern States. It proposes to raze the circulation of all the banks in the same proportion, in the States which now have less than their proper share of the circulation as well as in those which have a large excess, even in those which now have the least.

Mr. Speaker, I claim that the population of the western States require more circulation per capita than that of the eastern States, which are more densely populated. The business of the eastern cities, New York and Boston, is done by checks, handling comparatively little currency. It is simply a transfer of the credit of one man upon the books of the banks to the credit of another man by checks. But in the country, where a large portion of the people reside remote from banks, business is not and cannot be done in that way. There mechanics and farmers must have currency to carry in their pockets wherever they go. But, however that may be, what I claim this Congress ought to do now is to provide whatever circulating medium these destitute States need by taking it from those States which have an excess over their proportion, leaving the banks in those States which have no excess undisturbed. We ought not to take bank circulation from Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois for the purpose of distributing it in other States so long as there is so large a disproportion of this circulation in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New York.

Mr. Speaker, all exclusive privileges sooner or later become odious to the people. I do not believe that this national banking system, upon the present exclusive plan, will exist or can exist many years, for the reason that the people see that a few men in every town and city are building up fortunes out of a privilege which they themselves are denied. Unless Congress enacts a free banking law which shall be open to all who can furnish the necessary securities, or corrects the present unequal distribution of the bank currency, sooner or later this national banking system will go by the board. If, therefore, it is desirable to perpetuate the system, Congress must show a disposition to do justice to all the people, and not confine the greater share of its benefits to four or five States in great disproportion to their population. In my judgment, the time is not far distant when the people will demand a free banking system or the substitution of United States currency for all bank paper. But that is a question which it is not now my purpose to discuss. The country is not now in a condition to warrant the attempt to make any great change in the system or quantity of the currency. The most that we can or ought to do now is to remedy the defects in the present law, and confer the benefits of the present national bank system upon all parts of the country as equally as circumstances will permit.

Mr. Speaker, if the settlement of this question depended upon my judgment I would first determine how much of this circulating medium it is necessary to provide for the present wants of the southern and western States, which have much below their proportional amount; and when I had ascertained that, I would take it from the States which have an excess in proportion to the amount of that excess. But the principle upon which this amendment of the committee proceeds is to keep up the disproportion between the West and the East in the distribution of the circulation hereafter. I do not think it would be good policy to cut down that disproportion all at once; but if you want $20,000,000 this year to supply the just demands of the South and West, take it from the States which have more than they ought to have, and give it to the States which need it; and if you want $20,000,000 next year for the same purpose, take it from the States which then have more than belongs to them and give it to those which have less, and keep doing so until you have fairly distributed the $300,000,000 among all the States according to their population and needs. When you have done that you will have accomplished the next best thing to a free banking law, and the only thing that will satisfy the people of the States and prevent their demanding a free banking law or the abolition of national banks altogether. I think in this respect the bill of the Senate is much better than the amendment proposed by the Committee on Banking and Currency, for this reason: that it takes from the banks which have a larger circulation than their proportional amount, according to the law of 1865, and gives it to those States which have now less than five dollars per inhabitant. There would be, I think, two hundred and forty-two Representatives in Congress were all the States represented, who represent the population of the several States as it was in 1860. The growing western States at this time have a much larger population than in 1860; but if we take the representative population of 1860 as a basis for apportioning the banking circulation of $300,000,000 we will find it to give a little less than $1,250,000 to each Representative in Congress from the several States.

I think it would be fair to take ten, fifteen, or twenty millions, or whatever is necessary at this time to distribute to States which are in want of circulation from the States having a larger amount of circulation than $1,250,000 for each Representative in Congress. Certainly the eastern States cannot in justice object to that, because the population of all the western States has much more largely increased than that of the eastern States since the census of 1860. If we take that as the basis it will indicate that Congress intends in the future to distribute these privileges among the people of the several States according to their numbers, and not according to their wealth. I object to all legislation which has a tendency to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. I think the people of these States will demand a more equal distribution of the national bank currency, because $300,000,000 is not sufficient to supply all who desire to go into the banking business. Therefore if you would continue that limit you must distribute that amount not according to capital, but according to population, in order to satisfy the people that the national banking system is not being maintained mainly for the benefit of the large capitalists.

Mr. Speaker, I propose an amendment to the Senate bill which if adopted will require the $20,000,000 for distribution to States having a less national banking circulation than five dollars per inhabitant to be withdrawn pro rata from banks in States having an excess of national bank circulating notes over one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to each Representative in Congress. This is better than the Senate plan, for the reason that the law of 1865 is very indefinite and uncertain as to the apportionment of $150,000,000 of the circulation. My amendment will make the law so plain that it can be understood by everybody, and will leave nothing to the discretion or favoritism of the Secretary of the Treasury. The experience of the past warns us to make suitable precautionary provisions for the future.

Mr. Speaker, there is one provision in the amendment proposed by the committee which I approve, and hope it will be adopted. I allude to the proviso that no association shall have an amount of circulating notes exceeding $1,000,000; and every association having a larger amount shall, as soon as practicable, withdraw from circulation and return to the Comptroller of the Currency to be canceled all its circulating notes in excess of that amount. One million is as much as any one association ought to be allowed to have. In the city of New York there are five banks which have over $14,000,000. One of these, the National Bank of Commerce, has $6,000,000. In the city of Boston two banks have about $3,000,000. Reducing these banks to $1,000,000 each will withdraw about $10,000,000, one half of the amount required by the Senate bill. I think it would be good policy and just to take the balance of the $20,000,000 from the banks which have over $5,000,000 of circulating notes in the States having an excess in proportion to their representative population. By this means the circulation in these States will be left more equitably distributed. The excess of circulation in these States is mostly absorbed by mammoth banks in the cities, whereas the business of the cities requires less proportional circulation than the country. New York city has about $30,000,000, and all the rest of the State $38,000,000. The city of Boston has about $26,000,000, and all the rest of the State of Massachusetts about $31,000,000. Before the war, under the State bank system, New York city had less than $7,000,000 of bank circulation, which proves conclusively that the New York city banks can surrender a large amount of their present circulation without at all affecting the business interests of the city. The city banks do not need much circulation to enable them to do a profitable business. Their deposits are large; whereas the deposits of the country banks are comparatively small, and they rely more upon the profits of their circulating notes. The concentrated money influence of New York city has become too great for the good of the country, and the disproportionate amount of the national bank currency which the banks of that city have has done much to produce that evil. The proper distribution of the national bank currency among the several States and Territories will have a tendency to correct the evil. The bill of the Senate will not give Ohio any additional bank circulation, but the amendment of the committee will take from that State between two and three million dollars without returning any, whereas Ohio has now at least $5,000,000 less than her ratable proportion. I cannot therefore consent to any decrease.

I desire to say a few words in reply to some remarks made by gentlemen here in regard to requiring banks that propose to go into liquidation to substitute greenbacks for their circulation. It has been claimed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] and others that it would enable the banks to tie up hundreds of millions of dollars of currency. For the life of me I cannot see how the gentleman could have got such an idea into his head.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I can tell the gentleman very easily; because it is correct.

Mr. BUCKLAND. When the banks substitute greenbacks for their circulation the greenbacks become so much money in the Treasury. It is not destroyed, but may be paid out the same as any other money in the Treasury. And the effect is contrary to what the gentleman supposes; it is to give the Government the benefit of the circulation of the national banks, substituting greenbacks until it is redeemed, without interest, and the use of the greenbacks paid into the Treasury for the redemption of the national banking circulation until that circulation is presented for redemption. And if it is not presented for five or ten years so much the better for the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is no provision in the bill which authorizes the Treasurer of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury or the Government to use the greenbacks thus deposited as a fund from which to redeem the national banking currency.

Mr. BUCKLAND. No new law is required for that purpose. If it is paid into the Treasury, it is money to be used like any other money in the Treasury. The gentleman is mistaken as to the law as it now stands, and as to the provisions of the bill upon that subject. The law as it now stands and the bill require the banks to pay into the Treasury an amount of lawful money of the United States equal to the amount of their outstanding circulating notes and requires the Treasurer to redeem these outstanding notes when presented, but does not require him to keep the identical money paid in by the banks for the purpose of the redemption. He may redeem them with any money in the Treasury at the time they are presented. Therefore, the statement that the banks can, under the provisions of the law or the bill, tie up millions or any amount of the United States currency is not well founded. The Treasurer can pay it out as fast as received; and as fast as the bank currency is redeemed an equal amount may be issued to other banks.

Reduction of the Army.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. GARFIELD,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 9, 1869.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 893) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870—

Mr. GARFIELD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to state to the committee as briefly as I can the substance of the amendment offered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and to call the attention of the House to the questions involved in the proposed reduction of the Army; and as the amendment is likely to meet with some opposition, I shall be greatly obliged if I can have the attention of the committee while I state the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the grounds of their action.

I wish, in the outset, to say that the committee share, to the fullest extent, in the general desire and determination of this House to reduce expenditures in every department of the Government, and they believe that the extent to which retrenchment ought to be carried should be limited only by the necessities of the public service and the efficiency of the several Departments of our Government. Retrenchment unwisely made is wastefulness. It is not economy alone that should be considered in reorganizing the Army. The committee have proceeded, and I shall proceed upon the supposition that the question has been settled by Congress that we are to maintain an Army of such size and organization as Congress and the people are willing to support with their means, and will be proud of as a worthy and valuable department of the Government. When the Army is properly organized, when it is not too large, when it is well officered and well disciplined, it ought to be the pride of every American citizen; it ought to be an institution that we desire to protect. And it is the duty of this House so to adjust, regulate, and limit its organization, that we shall not need to make it the object of every-day attack, but that we may defend it here while it defends the country and maintains the national honor. It appears to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the preliminary and primary inquiry is; how large an Army do we need? When we have settled that, we should next apply all the reduction and retrenchment consistent with the national honor and with the efficiency of the Army we determine to maintain. To these considerations I invite the attention of the committee.

In order to understand the situation, I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the size of our Army as now authorized by law, and then what it is in fact. The Army, as it stood before the war, was admitted on all hands to be the smallest organization consistent with the public safety in time of peace as affairs then stood. We had in 1860 an Army of 11,848 enlisted men and 1,083 commissioned officers. In July, 1866, not quite three years ago, Congress discussed very fully what should be its future Army, and after along debate in both Houses, passed the law of July 28, 1866, fixing the military peace establishment. That law authorized five regiments of artillery, ten of cavalry, and forty-five of infantry, and fixed the staff departments as they are now organized. The minimum strength and the maximum strength of a regiment of each arm of the service was fixed so that the Army might contain 80,370 enlisted men as the maximum, while the minimum strength was 47,270 enlisted men. Whether it should be in fact the larger or the smaller number or any intermediate number was left to the wisdom and discretion of the President of the United States. This law of July, 1866, was the last legislative utterance of the people of the United States through their Congress in regard to their peace establishment, and by that utterance it was determined that we would have an Army of about 3,200 commissioned officers, and from 47,000 to 80,000 enlisted men. The President used the discretion given him by this law, and I will show how he has used it. The law was passed in July, 1866. The new Army organized in accordance with this law, amounted in 1867 to 54,641 men, not quite half way up to the maximum, but nearly 10,000 above the minimum. One year later, as shown by the Army Register of 1868, the Army had been allowed to run down to 52,948 men. That was the force in August, 1868. I ought to mention, in passing, that while General Grant was Secretary of War ad interim he cut off from the Army and the War Department nearly eighteen thousand civil employés, persons who were employed by the Government but not mustered into the military service. As the necessity of a military police in the late rebel States diminished, the rank and file of the Army has been allowed to decrease by not filling it by enlistments, until on the 1st day of January, 1869, a little more than five weeks ago, the full strength of the Army was 38,575 enlisted men, and a few less than 3,000 commissioned officers.

The Army is now below the minimum. The law has not been construed as requiring it to be kept up to the minimum, though, perhaps, strict construction would require the President to recruit it up to 47,270; and he can to-day order it increased to 80,000 men. Such being the law now, the question is how much lower shall we fix the legislative limit to the size of our Army? In the first place, the Committee on Military Affairs have not thought it wise to depart from the policy of the Government, which has not been changed during almost half a century that while we do not need to keep in time of peace an Army sufficient for a time of war, yet we ought, in time of peace, to keep alive and in vigorous growth a knowledge of military science and habits of military discipline, and maintain such an organization as can be readily expanded and placed upon a war footing whenever the necessity for it shall arise.

In looking over the debates and historical reviews that followed the war of 1812 I have noticed it was conceded on all hands that the Army had been allowed to run down to so low a point in its organization that when the war came on the country found itself with an organization insufficient to be expanded into an Army on a war footing; and the Secretary of War, a few years after that war ended, said in an official report to Congress that the losses and expenses resulting from this insufficient organization during the first year or two of the war were vastly greater than the expense that would have been incurred in maintaining an army large enough to be readily expanded to a war basis. For this purpose how much larger is our Army now than it ought to be.

Aside from this question we must consider our present situation in regard to Indian hostilities. Last session the Committee on Military Affairs recommended a small reduction in the cavalry arm of the service. At this time they do not report any reduction of the cavalry, for the reason that in the Indian war now in progress and in Indian wars generally cavalry is the main reliance.

Our officers in command say that infantry can be of but little value in actual Indian fighting, especially in the winter time. And in order to meet the necessities of the case, the Secretary of War has raised in Kansas, and has been employing for the last five or six months, a volunteer regiment of cavalry to serve against the Indians; the cavalry of the Army being insufficient for that purpose. So long, therefore, as we find it necessary to employ volunteer cavalry to assist in this Indian war, the committee did not feel themselves justified in reporting a reduction of that arm of the service.

We have now nearly the same artillery organization that we had before the war. In 1860 we had then four regiments of artillery. There was an increase of one regiment made by the act of 1866. And it must be remembered that since the passage of that law we have greatly extended our coast, that we have added an empire to the Republic. At the present time, as the records of the War Department show, we have a chain of fortified posts along our coast extending from Eastport to Sitka mounting three thousand two hundred and fifty coast guns, and at the present day we have not enough enlisted men in the artillery to enable us to put two men to each gun. These fortifications are a part of the defensive policy of the United States. If they must not be manned, they must at least be taken care of, and the force that takes care of them should form the military police of our coasts to enforce the collection of revenue, and, if need be, to enforce the respect of all who approach our shores.

The committee considered the number of posts now occupied by the Army, the number of our fortified works, the number of our coast guns now in place, and have not thought themselves justified in reducing the present force of artillery.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Did it not appear before the committee that with the exception of Fortress Monroe there is not an artilleryman at a single fort?

Mr. GARFIELD. It did not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I mean light artillery.

Mr. GARFIELD. When the gentleman puts a question about artillery, and after I have answered it, throws in the word "light," it throws a new light on the question, and it is quite a different thing. The light artillery is organized for field service, and not for permanent fortifications.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information, inasmuch as I have not given the subject much consideration. I would like the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. GARFIELD] to inform the House whether in time of peace there is any necessity for having at each of our forts enough men to man each gun, as if we were in a state of war? In other words, is there any necessity for any more men than may be required to keep the guns and carriages and necessary implements in order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that we do not need in time of peace a sufficient force to man all our guns, as would be required in time of war; nor do I hold that it is necessary even to man all guns that we have. But I regard it a proper policy for the Government to occupy and keep in good order such of our coast defenses as are necessary for the protection of the coast and which may be vitally important to us in case of foreign war.

Passing over several points which may properly be considered when we discuss the details of the bill, I pass now to the infantry. In making their recommendations on this subject the Committee on Military Affairs do not forget that the Secretary of War and the General-in-Chief of the Army at the opening of this session were very decided in their recommendations that there be no legislation at present requiring the reduction of the Army, and that the condition of our affairs would not allow a more rapid reduction than was going on by the expiration of terms of enlistment. Still the committee, anxious to do everything consistent with safety in the way of the reduction of expenditures, have proposed in this bill the cutting down of fifteen infantry regiments by consolidation, so that instead of forty-five regiments, as now authorized by law, there shall hereafter be but thirty. We believe that the work of restoration of the late rebel States has so far progressed and the more pacific prospects of the South under the incoming Administration will warrant us in making this measure of reduction in the line of the Army. The consolidation and ultimate reduction of the number of officers and enlisted men of fifteen regiments will result in a reduction of expenses of about ten million dollars per annum.

But the Committee on Military Affairs have raised a question which, in their judgment, is even more important to the country and the Army than a specific reduction of numbers; and that question is whether we cannot in some departments of the Army make an organic reduction so that the work of the Army may be performed by a smaller number of officers than we now employ? Entertaining views on this subject which we desired to test by the experience of men who had been long in the service, the committee have called before them during the last three weeks a number of distinguished officers and examined them, and have preserved a phonographic report of their testimony. We called officers of the highest rank accessible to us, except the General-in-Chief of the Army; and officers representing the various staff departments of the Army. The results of our investigation will be shortly laid before the House for its information; and I desire to say here that I know of no documents relating to the Army and the various parts of its organization so valuable as this testimony. By these examinations the committee have reached some conclusions which I desire to state.

We have found that during the late war, and indeed for many years, there has been a tendency in the Army—a natural one, perhaps—to aggregate force here in Washington. There has been a tendency to build up separate staff departments distinct from the rest of the Army, and to increase the number and rank of the officers in each department; and we observe generally that the increase in numbers has been toward the head rather than toward the foot of the organization. The development of the Army during the last forty years has been in the direction of multiplying bureaus, and increasing the number and rank of officers in each.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What new military bureaus have been created?

Mr. GARFIELD. Several of the staff departments were created in 1818. The Bureau of Military Justice was created since the war began, and the inspectors have been separated from the Adjutant General's department more than they were before.

We found on examination that our staff corps differed widely from that of the leading armies of the world. In the French army, for instance—probably the most perfectly organized in the world—there is one great staff organization that supplies the army with adjutant generals, inspectors, aides-de-camp, and other like officers; and another charged with the supply of the army. Thus the duties of one staff corps related to the personnel, the other to the material of the army. Yet we have now in our army not less than ten distinct staff organizations, with a constant tendency to increase in numbers and rank. Before the war only one officer in all the staff corps held the rank of brigadier general; now there are at the head of these corps nine brigadier generals, besides a chief of staff of the Army of the same rank. The chief surgeon of the Army has become a brigadier general; the chief paymaster, the Adjutant General, the Judge Advocate, the chief commissary, the chief of ordnance and of engineers have all become brigadier generals. We have now nineteen brigadier generals in the Army, as authorized by law. The committee inquired how far we might go in consolidating and reducing these staff organizations without diminishing the efficiency of the service.

Our attention was particularly directed to the departments which furnish supplies; particularly the quartermaster, commissary, and pay departments. There appears to be no natural division between the duties of these departments, and we saw no reason in the nature of the case why one man should buy oats and another man belonging to another department should buy flour. We saw no particular reason why there should be one department for clothing the Army and another for feeding the Army.

We found, what was of more consequence, that these departments conflict in many practical points in such a way as to increase the expenditure unnecessarily. In the first place, the commissary department purchases all the supplies that make up the rations of the Army. An officer is stationed in New York, for example, as purchasing Commissary. He buys the rations, but the moment he has purchased them, they pass out of his hands, and the quartermaster's department becomes responsible for their transportation to the distant points where the Army may be stationed, when they are taken by an officer detailed from the line and distributed to the troops. This officer performs at the same time the duties of commissary and quartermaster. The work begins with the commissary department, is transferred to the quartermaster's department, and finally ends with the commissary department, where the rations are issued. When they reach the troops we find the two departments united in one, yet the accounts are kept distinct. The same officer issues rations and clothing and other supplies, keeps one clerk to make out quartermaster's papers to go up to Washington to the head of that department, and usually at the same time keeps another clerk and another set of books and sends another set of papers through another channel to the head of the commissary department in Washington.

Now, it is the natural and laudable desire of an honest commissary to cut down the expenses and disbursements of money in his department to the lowest point possible. He will therefore incline to buy where he can buy cheapest; but when the quartermaster transports these supplies to the troops the total cost may be far more than if they had been bought nearer the place of consumption, where they would cost a little more but would require less transportation. Now, if these two departments were united, purchasing officers, being responsible also for the transportation, would make purchases with a view to economy not only in the purchase but in the transportation also.

Again, I call attention to the pay department. As now organized I have no doubt that our funds are disbursed with as much safety and honesty as those of any country in the world. But consider how the work is done. The country is divided into pay districts, with headquarters in each, at which a force of paymasters is stationed. When troops are to be paid at a distant post, a paymaster starts from his headquarters with a box of money. The quartermaster's department furnishes him transportation, and the commander of the troops gives him a military escort to the place where the payment is to be made. He must be thus escorted from post to post, and finally be escorted and transported back to his headquarters with his surplus funds, if he have any. As the practice is to pay the troops once in two months, this operation must be repeated six times a year with all its cost of mileage and escort, while at the same time, in all these pay districts, there is a complete organization of commissaries and another complete and separate organization of quartermasters, charged with the disbursement of public money and the custody of public property.

If the duty of paying the troops were placed in the hands of these officers, the cost of transport and export would be avoided, and the officers, being always on duty with the troops, could make the payment much more promptly and regularly than it is now done.

It is in evidence before the committee that many of the troops at distant posts are paid but once in six months, and in some instances not so often. It also appears that at all these posts an officer detailed from the line performs both the duty of commissary and quartermaster; and if, as we propose in the pending amendment, this officer should be required to give bonds, as now required of disbursing officers in the quartermaster's department, they can pay the troops in addition to their duties without any additional cost to the Government. Considering, therefore, the nature of the duties of these three departments, that they are in many respects duplicates of each other, and considering also the fact that in some other countries all these functions are performed by one department, the Committee on Military Affairs were of the opinion that the consolidation of the three might safely be made. But they were not willing to recommend so radical a change in the organization of the Army on their own judgment alone; they called to their aid officers whose professional duties enabled them to speak from practical knowledge.

It is due to the distinguished officers at the head of the several staff departments to state that most of them were opposed to the proposed consolidation. And I ought to say that during the late war these departments performed the duties severally devolved upon them with great efficiency. I do not doubt that our Army was better fed and clothed and more bountifully supplied than any army in modern times; and it was paid as promptly as the state of the Treasury would permit. Great praise is due to the men who organized and managed the vast machinery by which the supplies were furnished. But I have no doubt that a staff organization less divided and less independent in its subdivision might have supplied the Army equally well and much more economically. I hope soon to lay all the testimony before the House, but in the short time now at my command I can do little more than refer to it. I will, however, place on record a few passages which exhibit the opinion of some officers who testified on the point I am now discussing.

The following, from the Secretary of War, exhibits his opinion on the subject:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1869.

"General John M. Schofield, Secretary of War, examined by Mr. GARFIELD:

Question. State whether in your judgment the interests of the public service would be promoted or otherwise by the consolidation of the quartermaster's, commissary's and paymaster's departments; whether in your opinion such consolidation would be practical or economical?

Answer. I have no doubt of the practicability of consolidating these three departments, and I think it would promote efficiency of administration. How much it would conduce to economy is a matter which could hardly be decided except by actual experiment. Efficiency of administration will necessarily be promoted by unity of action. The various duties of the three supply departments of the Army are very intimately connected in their administration, and no inconvenience, I think, would result from uniting them in one administrative department. Economy of administration will result at least to this extent, that at points where the division now exists it necessarily happens that an officer has sometimes less labor to perform in his own department than he is able to do, and yet for the management of the three branches of supply an officer for each must be stationed there. If consolidated the labor of two or more of these departments might very well be performed by the same officer."

In General McDowell's testimony he gives the origin and history of the several staff departments of the Army, and sketches the process by which the work of division has gone steadily on for half a century. From the organization of the Government under the Constitution down to 1812, the supplies of the Army were not furnished by the War Department at all, but by the Secretary of the Treasury. The pay department was not a distinct organization as it now is until 1819. After further exhibiting the history of these departments, General McDowell said:

"The committee will now see to what extent these supply departments have hitherto been consolidated. As to their being now formally united, I am of the opinion that the quartermaster's and subsistence departments should not be distinct, but that they should be merged into a single department. I think for several reasons the service would be benefited by having a single instead of two such departments."

Question. State your reasons for that opinion.
Answer. When the rations of subsistence are purchased by the subsistence department, and are to be sent to the military posts, or to troops, for issue in the field, they pass out of the hands of that department into those of the quartermaster's department, which then becomes responsible for them till they reach their destination, where they are received by an officer of some regiment not an officer of either department, but doing duty in both. As an acting assistant quartermaster he receives the stores from the contractors or the Government trains, as the case may be, and then, as an acting assistant commissary of subsistence, he cares for and issues them to the troops, and accounts for their issue or expenditure. He has two sets of employes, one for each department; two sets of extra duty men and two sets of clerks; makes out two sets of reports and accounts, and has two lines of accountability and is under two superiors; all of which is unnecessarily cumbersome, complicated, and expensive.

"Then the officers of the commissary department, as such, are naturally anxious the expenditures from the appropriations made by Congress for this department should be kept down, as far as possible, to the minimum. Their tendency is therefore to make these purchases at the lowest rates. But the cost to the United States of the subsistence is not only the prime cost, but in addition thereto the cost of transport to the place of consumption. This latter item is paid by the quartermaster's department, and is not unfrequently greater than the first cost paid by the subsistence department. The quartermaster is just as anxious to keep down his expenditures as the commissary, and hence the two are, or there is a tendency for them to be, at variance, which would not be the case if they were in one and the same department. The tendency now is for each department to look after itself, and it requires some common head to see that the service does not suffer.

Question. Does not the department commander have some supervision?

Answer. If the department commander looks very closely into the subject, the service will not suffer. If he should overlook it it would. It is, however, a needless strain on him to have to reconcile these corps differences. Then the double orders and instructions of the two chiefs to the single officer doing the double duty frequently results in his making at the same post two contracts for the same article under different instructions from two persons. For instance, under one to contract for hay in the quartermaster's department for the mules, and in the other for hay for the beef cattle of the commissary department, and has to keep his hay stocks apart and account for them separately.

Question. State at what point the practicable operations of the two departments divide?

Answer. Beginning at the post one man does the two duties under the direction of two different officers, or of the same officer in two capacities at department headquarters.

"I have had the double duty done by the same officer for the department of the Pacific, then extending from the forty-ninth parallel to Sonora and including with Utah the whole country west of the Rocky mountains, and it went more smoothly than with two. The officer said he would rather do the two duties than have the trouble of having it done by another in conjunction with himself; that with an additional clerk the duty could be done under one officer at department and division headquarters better than under two acting independently of and not always in harmony with each other.

Question. Do you speak of geographical departments?

Answer. Yes. Papers would come to me as department commander concerning some loss or damage of stores which would have to pass back and forward between the two departments, when it should be disposed of by one. There is nothing in the nature of things why the officer who buys the oats for the horses should not buy the beans for the men. It is, as you see, only lately, and it seems to me from originally personal reasons, not now existing, that we had an entire department for the sole purpose of purchasing food. It is not the case in either of the large military establishments of England or France.

Question. (by Mr. DODGE.) Have you not frequently seen trouble arise between the commissary and the quartermaster in relation to the storage of supplies, one furnishing the storage and the other the supplies?

Answer. I have known them disagree about it. The commissary who uses the warehouse is not concerned for its rent, and is not held back as the quartermaster is, who pays it. If there were but the one service no such questions could arise. But now the subsistence department is responsible for what is inside the house and the quartermaster for the house itself and for the persons to take care of it."

It will be seen by this testimony that this officer has successfully consolidated the two departments in his late command on the Pacific coast, and thus proved its practicability. The gentleman from Illinois near me [Mr. LOGAN] suggests that he would like some evidence from an officer who had himself performed both duties. I am glad to be able to furnish just such evidence as he asks for. It is the testimony of General Rufus Ingalls, one of the most distinguished officers in the quartermaster's department, whose services as chief quartermaster of the Army of the Potomac during the war has become an illustrious part of our history. I quote from his testimony:

"By the Chairman:

Question. The committee desires to know your opinion as to the propriety of merging the commissary, the quartermaster's, and the pay department into one department; and in case whether in your judgment you believe it can be safely done what would be the appropriate means of reaching such a result?

Answer. I have never digested any particular plan; but I have always been of the opinion that the quartermaster's and subsistence departments at least could be merged, with a less number of officers than are now in the two departments; and I have been of the opinion that the pay department could be merged also into the other two, calling it, for instance, a bureau of disbursements and supplies; and that the troops could be paid offener; or if the law be so changed on that subject, could be paid with infinitely more regularity under that system than they are now. The quartermaster's department is charged with the purchase and transportation of all supplies not particularly designated as subsistence supplies. Nineteen twentieths, and probably more, of all the supplies (so far as the number of articles is concerned) that are purchased are purchased by the quartermaster's department. There are comparatively very few articles of supplies that are purchased by the commissary department; but when these articles are purchased in large quantities at the principal markets they are there turned over generally in bulk to the quartermaster's department. We have to perform all the transportation; we have to take up these commissary supplies and transport them to the different points and keep transporting them until they finally disappear in the stomach of the soldier. The commissary department has little else to do except to purchase them, and that can be done on sample. What I mean to say is this: that if a thousand barrels of pork are to be sent to the Army in Texas from New York city, and if I have to transport them, I can select a time for doing so. If one officer had charge of the purchase and of the transportation the thing could be done with much more economy in transportation than now. The subsistence department, for instance, might state that this thousand barrels of pork were needed in great haste, so that I would have to send them by steamship instead of sending them by sailing vessels. I have been put, in the course of my service, to a good deal of inconvenience and extra expense on that account, from being compelled to transport subsistence in a way and at a time when it could have been done a great deal more conveniently and less expensively if I had had my own way about it, and if I had had the purchasing as well as the sending. If a requisition is made on me for the transportation of supplies of that kind, not of my own department, it is not generally left optional with me as to the manner and time of sending. The requisition is generally of a peremptory character, and I am called on to execute it because the department making it is presumed to know its wants better than myself.

Question. As a matter of fact are there not now a large number of officers who perform both functions?

Answer. When it comes to the troops that is the case. The great mass of the duties are performed by officers generally who are acting as commissaries and quartermasters, and that person is, ten to one, a young lieutenant who is performing both duties in connection with the troops.

Question. In performing both duties does he keep separate accounts?

Answer. Of course.

Question. And has separate clerks?

Answer. He ought to have. The papers in both are sufficiently voluminous to make it necessary, and the accounts are kept just as separately as though two officers were performing the duties, because they go to different heads here in Washington.

Question. Would it simplify the mode of keeping accounts if one officer had to do the whole and send the accounts through to one head?

Answer. It would, undoubtedly; but the present mode of rendering accounts would have to be modified to suit that. For instance, in the quartermaster's department we have our own forms which are prescribed by regulations having the force of law, and which we have to follow. If the subsistence department were merged in that of the quartermaster's all that would have to be done would be to place their articles on the quartermaster's papers and account for them in the same manner that we do now for oats and hay and paints, and infinite variety of materials. It probably would not add more than ten or twelve additional columns to the property returns.

Question. Did I understand you to say that of all the purchases made for supplying the Army nineteen twentieths of the number of articles are made by the quartermaster's department?

Answer. It would be better to say that a very great proportion of them is made by the quartermaster's department. In my opinion it amounts to ninety-nine per cent.; but that may be an over estimate. The articles bought in the subsistence department are specified, and are very few.

Question. Suppose Congress were to declare that hereafter all the duties now discharged by the commissary department should be discharged by the quartermaster's department, do you know any practical difficulty in the way of transferring all the accounts and purchases over to the quartermaster's department?

Answer. I do not. On the other hand, the subsistence department might make the same remark.

Question. You know of no practical objection?

Answer. No, sir. In my own experience of more than twenty years, whenever I have had the privilege of doing it, I have assumed the duties of the subsistence department at the large depots. I did it in Oregon for years. I was the commissary there of the whole coast north of San Francisco, which is now the department of the Columbia. I was commissary and quartermaster there at a very large depot.

Question. Suppose the two departments were consolidated, what per cent. of reduction of official force, clerical force, and civil employes could be made?

Answer. One third, I should say. I mean, add the number of officers of the two departments together, and then one third might be struck off—one third of the whole number. On Colonel Steptoe's overland march across the continent in 1854 and 1855, which was about as good a test as could be brought, I was quartermaster, commissary, and paymaster for the whole year and a half. We started from Leavenworth, where the command was organized, and marched to Benicia and to Oregon. We were a year and a half in making the march. We wintered in Salt Lake City. I had the authority of the Secretary of War to draw on the Paymaster General for moneys to pay the troops, and I had also his authority to act in the subsistence department and to draw drafts for the necessary purchases, so that with that command I acted in the three capacities for that length of time. It was no extra trouble. I hardly had an extra clerk. I certainly had no additional officers. The command was not large, but it gave me an opportunity of seeing how easily the duties of the three departments can be performed by the same person.

Question. Suppose the three departments had been consolidated into one, and that you had only one set of returns to make, would not that have simplified the matter still more?

Answer. Oh, certainly. The commissary accounts are very simple any way, and the addition of ten or twelve articles more to my general property return would have given very little additional labor or responsibility. In the paymaster's department at that time there were only some three sets of vouchers: the payment to the officers, the payment to the troops, and the payment to the discharged soldiers. That would have been a matter that would have required very little time. If the law should prescribe that the troops shall be paid at the end of every two months the muster-roll would be handed to me and I could pay the troops in a couple of hours.

Question. Would this plan which you suggest require the existence of a military chest at headquarters?

Answer. No, sir. Under the present system all public moneys are deposited with the Treasurer, Assistant Treasurer, or public depositories. In that day it was not so, and we were permitted to deposit with substantial banks or to keep the money in safes. In Salt Lake City when I would want to pay the troops I would draw a draft on the pay department for the exact amount of the muster-roll, and any of the merchants there was only too glad to cash it. Sometimes I would get a premium, which I would take up on my papers belonging to the Government; never a discount, because that is not permissible in any event. I had no difficulty at all.

By Mr. WASHBURN:

Question. And the further from headquarters the greater the premium, is it not?

Answer. Yes. In New Mexico, Salt Lake City, and those places, a Government check was precisely what the merchants wanted, and they would be always glad to give a premium for it. When I got through to San Francisco I had some checks cashed at a very considerable premium by General Sherman, who was at that time a banker in San Francisco. There is no difficulty about this thing. When you are authorized by the Treasury to draw there is no difficulty about raising money. You can do that in Texas or anywhere in the country.

Question. Do I understand you that at nearly all the posts you can get checks cashed?

Answer. There may be some posts where it would be troublesome—in Arizona, for instance; but I have been there and have found no trouble about it. Traders and settlers and that sort of people get around military establishments, and it is always very easy for a disbursing officer to raise any amount of money he may need. I have never found any difficulty of that sort, and I have served probably at more remote stations than any other officer of the staff.

It will be seen from this that General Ingalls actually performed, for a long period, the duties of these three departments, and declares that there is no practical difficulty in the way of consolidating them into one. I should quote from the testimony of General Hancock were it before me, but I will only say that he fully concurs with those I have quoted, and another officer, (General Ihrie,) who has long been in the pay department, not only confirms these views, but long ago presented the draft of a bill for the consolidation of the three departments.

For these reasons, therefore, the committee believe that those three departments can be consolidated into one, and we have proposed a section for that purpose which will reduce the number of officers very considerably. There are at present in those three departments one hundred and eighty-seven commissioned officers.

We have proposed a supply department of one hundred and fifteen officers, making a reduction of sixty-eight; and we believe that all the duties now performed by the three departments can ultimately be performed as well as by the present organizations. Indeed, we think it can be better done.

The committee, however, do not believe it possible to determine beforehand the precise extent to which the reduction in the number of officers can safely go, and they have placed the execution of this law in the hands of the President, giving him such discretion that the service may not suffer by a sudden and violent breaking up of the present organization.

Before the reduction is completed he will have time and opportunity to communicate with Congress on the subject, and to recommend any change that he may deem necessary. But we have proposed this measure of reduction as the mark to be aimed at.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As the gentleman has reached a period, I desire to put a question to him. He says this cuts off sixty-eight officers. What does he do with them?

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve all I have to say on that subject to a later point, for I have not finished what I desire to say with regard to the consolidation.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say a word at this point, because I agree with the gentleman in reference to consolidation, and I expect he is more conversant with the matter than I am. I do not suppose the House will take my testimony, for the reason that gentlemen who are called before the Military Committee are generally men of high distinction as military officers; but I will say to the chairman that when I was a boy I was commissary and quartermaster of a regiment, and performed all the duties with one clerk, and my accounts here show that I did not owe the Government a cent. I performed all the duties for two years. That was in 1848.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad my friend has alluded to that, for he has called my attention to a point I was about to omit, and I think it will have great weight with members of the House. At each of the posts, of which there are many hundreds, there must be an officer to issue rations and supplies to the troops. That officer, in ninety-nine cases in one hundred, performs the duties of quartermaster and commissary, so that the duty of issuing the supplies of these two departments to the troops is now actually performed by one officer, and what the committee recommend is that we continue the union all the way up to Washington.

I desire to call attention for a moment—for I see that my time is rapidly passing—to the next recommendation for consolidation made in this amendment. We have an ordnance department, separate and distinct, which has been steadily growing until at last it really has an independent army under its control. There are now one thousand enlisted men in the military service who receive their orders only from the ordnance department. They are not a part of the Army under the command of its generals, but under the command of a staff corps at Washington. No department commander commands them. General Grant does not command them. They receive their orders from the ordnance department alone, unless the President empowers some other officer to give them orders.

Now, what is the business of this ordnance department? It is to select the models, and to manufacture and distribute arms and ammunition for the use of the Army. The men who use the artillery have nothing to say in regard to the guns or ammunition they shall use. It would appear to be only just that the scientific men who understand all that belongs to the specialty of artillery should have something to say about the weapons they are to use.

The testimony of General McDowell on this point is so full and satisfactory that I quote a passage from it in place of any further discussion:

Question. What is your opinion as to the propriety of consolidating the artillery and the ordnance department?

Answer. If you had asked the question as to whether a corps could not have been constituted that would do these two services better than the present two organizations, I should say yes.

Question. Give your reason for this?

Answer. We have now a body of officers (artillerists) who have no lot or part in the devise or manufacture of the artillery and munitions they use, and a body of officers (ordnance corps) who do not use, or whose duty it is not to use the guns and projectiles and munitions they make. This, it is true, applies but in a far less degree to the other arms of the service; but in the artillery good should come of there being a closer connection between the theory and practice of the art than exists. In both the English and the French service the ordnance and artillery, such as is the latter with us, form one corps.

Question. Were they ever so in our service?

Answer. In the Mexican war General Scott used the ordnance officers in the service of his siege artillery. They also served in the light battery, and I find we have had an ordnance department in which officers of artillery were on duty at arsenals. We had no light artillery at that time, nothing but heavy guns on the sea-board fortifications. We did not have light artillery until 1838. There are many inconveniences in having the ordnance and artillery distinct, but it has also its good side. There is a good deal to be said in favor of it.

Question. Has this question been debated in the Army?

Answer. Yes, to a considerable extent. The artillery mostly desire it, but the ordnance oppose the consolidation. They command their own arsenals and report only to their chief in Washington; they have their appropriations, and construct all their own buildings, and the consequence is you see the ordnance establishments very much better than any other part of the service. They have a very strong esprit de corps, and would dislike very much to see themselves merged into any other branch. The difficulties I see in the way are more of a personal nature than anything else. You get considerable advantage in keeping a man on some special subject.

The committee, therefore, recommend that the ordnance corps be abolished, and that the officers and troops connected with it be transferred to the artillery, and that a reduction be made to the extent of sixteen officers.

I intend also to move an amendment that the signal corps be consolidated with the engineer department. We should keep alive the knowledge of signaling in the Army, and make it a part of the instruction at the Military Academy; but we need no more force than is necessary for this purpose. I ought to say, before leaving this subject, that the committee were impressed with the necessity of a reform in the staff department beyond what legislation can accomplish. There is, in nearly all of them, a tendency to independence, which goes far toward destroying that unity of command and authority which should always be possessed by commanders. The adjutant general's department, for example, whose duties should be strictly confined to records, orders, and correspondence, has charge of the recruiting service and commands thousands of troops. A general commanding a geographical department has no control over recruits or recruiting stations; no control or supervision of arsenals or depots of provisions, nor of the officers in charge of them; nor has he any right to command an officer of engineers to perform any duty whatever without special authority from the President. It appeared in the evidence before the committee that in one instance during the war a captain of engineers protested against the right of the major general commanding the department in which he was stationed to order him to inspect a fortification with a view to putting it in a better state of defense; and the protest was sustained at Washington. In that case, however, the captain was justified by one of the Articles of War. But most of these evils have grown up by almost imperceptible degrees as matters of custom, and need only executive action to correct them.

There are several other points in the bill of the committee which I will notice briefly in passing. We propose not to abolish brevets altogether, but to regulate them in the future, so that they shall be conferred only in time of war for actual service in the face of the enemy; and that the precedence in rank and command conferred by brevet by the Articles of War shall be taken away. I will not stop to discuss this now, because it has already passed the House and has gone to the Senate.

We propose also to extend the term of enlistment in the future from three to five years. This will give us more efficient soldiers, and at less expense. We also propose to reduce the number of non-commissioned officers, and to muster out fourteen of the bands now authorized by law. I now call attention to the mode of reduction proposed in this bill. The Committee on Military Affairs believed that the House desired the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. They therefore put a provision in this bill for that purpose, in hopes that it might be allowed to remain. If that had been done, nearly six hundred civil officers, Indian agents, and employés of the Government in the Indian service, whose total salaries amount to nearly half a million dollars a year, could have been dispensed with and their places supplied by officers of the Army. That provision has been stricken out of the bill on a point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] Therefore one of the features of the bill as reported from the committee, which would have provided for the employment of officers which might be rendered supernumerary by the operation of this bill, has been changed by the action of the House, and it rests with the House to say what further change shall now be made in consequence of this change.

But the Committee on Military Affairs have so prepared the bill that the mode of disposing of officers rendered supernumerary by this act is in one section; and if the House choose to make a different disposition of them, it can be done by changing that one section. The settlement of the question involved in that section will require no change in the other sections of the bill. Let it be remembered that the reduction proposed is prospective, not necessarily immediate, for it is placed in the hands of the President to make the reduction as rapidly as the necessities of the public service will permit. It is not certain, therefore, that any officer now in the service will be rendered supernumerary by the President's administration of this law, though they may be; but it is certain that this law will before very long bring the Army down to a much smaller organization than the present one. The committee have proposed that the reduction shall be made in two ways. First, that no further promotions shall be made in any grade until the aggregate of all the officers of that grade shall fall below the number provided for by this bill; and, second, that no further new appointments of officers from without and no further enlistments of private soldiers shall be made until the Army has been reduced below the limit required by this bill.

I will discuss the merits of this proposition briefly, and appeal to the House to decide upon its justice and propriety. And first, what is the principle on which the Government has hitherto acted? I believe I am entirely justified by history when I say that the principle of this section is the settled rule of the Government in regard to the Army, the Navy, and the Marine corps, and has been the rule for nearly half a century. I do not say that the rule has never been otherwise, but I say there have been but few if any exceptions to it in our recent history; but the military, naval, and marine peace establishments are not reduced by musters out, except for personal cause.

I do not take the ground that merely because a man is in the military service we are to make him forever an officer, nor that he is better than other people; but I do maintain that this section is based on a rule long maintained by the Government, and it has at least this ground of defense, that when men go into the military peace establishment they do so in view of all the conditions of that service. They agree to take a salary far less, in many instances, than the salaries they might obtain in civil life because of the compensating considerations connected with the service; these for example: that if they become disabled in the line of duty they are under the protection of the pension laws; that if they grow old in faithful service they are entitled to be retired with a small fixed salary for life, and if they die in the line of their duty their families will enjoy the benefit of the pension laws. On those conditions, with those prospects before them, men have for many years been entering the military peace establishment and accepting banishment in the western wilderness. It may be that the principle is not a sound one; it may be that our fathers settled it unwisely; it may be that our policy in regard to both the Army and the Navy has been wrong; but I appeal to the fact that this is the settled principle; and with this understanding of the case, men have accepted and are holding commissions in the peace establishment. The Committee on Military Affairs have thought it wise to follow the old rule, to stand by the established precedents, and they have reported accordingly.

Let me state another view of the case. Suppose we should at once muster out these officers; what would follow? In six months there would occur in the new army fifty or sixty vacancies, and in the course of a year at least one hundred. How will you fill these vacancies? You must either reappoint these men with less rank than they held before, or you must appoint new and untried men to fill their places, when, if you had waited a short time, the reduction would be accomplished, the necessity of new appointments obviated, experienced officers retained in the Army, and no express or implied obligations broken. I will not place this proposition on so low a ground as that we propose to keep them in the Army merely for the purpose of feeding them. I will not insult them by putting them in the attitude of beggars. They can afford to suffer wrong from us much better than we can afford to inflict on them. But, sir, they are at this very time employed in important, perilous duties. We are in the midst of an Indian war; and a large portion of our Army is still required in the South to maintain the public peace. When faithful officers in the unreconstructed States are bearing the reproaches and scorn of unrepentant rebels, and suffering in the name of the Republic the indignity of those who hate it, their position will be a most wretched one, if to the contempt of their enemies should now be added the neglect and injustice of their friends. For one, I am not willing, either by speech or by silence, to give any countenance to such treatment of the officers of the Army as they received in this House a few days since, when the member from New York city [Mr. WOOD] used this language concerning the officers of the Army:

"Our avenues and streets are filled with generals and major generals and captains and colonels drawing full pay, while the poor tax-payer is overburdened with unnecessary taxation, wrung from him for the purpose of supporting these idle vagabonds who are so well paid and do nothing."

It may become him, who never had any sympathy with the Army when it was engaged in putting down the rebellion waged by his friends, to call them "vagabonds," but it does not become this House to indorse by its action so unworthy a sentiment. I beg gentlemen not to forget that both the Secretary of War and the General-in-Chief of the Army declare that we ought not to make any immediate reduction of the Army. But the Military Committee think we ought to provide for a prospective reduction, and they have framed their bill with the view of making that prospective reduction as rapid as the necessities of the service will permit; but even if it keep a few officers more than are absolutely necessary the committee believe it just to stand by the old rule which has been followed for so many years.

And now let me sum up in brief the results of this bill. It does not command an instant reduction and mustering out of officers and enlisted men; but it does command the President to proceed with the reduction as rapidly as in his judgment the necessities of the service will permit, and to proceed with that reduction until it reaches the limit fixed by Congress. What is that limit? We propose to provide that there shall be a reduction of fifteen regiments of infantry, and that hereafter no enlistments shall be made until all the regiments shall have fallen below the minimum now authorized by law. According to this reduction the President will not be allowed to keep in the Army at any time more than about thirty thousand men. It may be less; it cannot be more. By the consolidation of the staff departments as reported in this bill we provide for a reduction of six hundred and thirty-eight commissioned officers. There are now not quite three thousand. It will be a reduction of nearly one fourth of the total number of commissioned officers. It proposes to abolish the offices of General and Lieutenant General on the occurrence of the first vacancy in each, and to reduce the number of major generals to four, and of brigadier generals to six. I am aware that many personal considerations enter into this feature of the bill. I need not say how willing the committee would be to confer the honor of promotion to the higher positions of General and lieutenant generals upon some of the distinguished and deserving officers now holding the commission of major general. We yield to none in admiration and gratitude for their distinguished services; but we believe the two positions referred to were created as special marks of personal favor, and were not intended by Congress as permanent grades in the Army, though the language of the statutes appears to make them such.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes left me I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to the history of the relation which Congress has sustained to the Army. The past is specially instructive on this subject. What writer of history does not know and regret the fact that our revolutionary fathers stained the noble record of their early legislation by the manner in which they treated the Army of the Revolution after the war of independence had closed. No man can read the history of that transaction without the most painful regret. But, sir, though there may have been no justification, yet there was an excuse for their conduct which we cannot plead to day. They lived not far removed from the days of military usurpation. They remembered Cromwell. They remembered the times when a standing army was dangerous to liberty; and so great was their love of liberty that in that sacred name they neglected, cruelly neglected, the noble army which made liberty possible on this continent. A volume of history, which I hold in my hand, portrays the dismissal of that heroic army after the battle for liberty had been fought and won. It is Greene's Historical View of the American Revolution, and I take the liberty of quoting a passage from page 233:

"To the officers Congress, after much discussion and delays that savored equally of impolicy and ingratitude, had voted half pay for life. It is painful to think of the long opposition to the claims of men who, besides risking their lives in battle and their health in the hardships of camp, were necessarily cut off during their most vigorous years from every other method of providing for themselves or their families. To some minds the Army seems always to have presented itself as an object of apprehension. Instrengthening it against the enemy they were still disturbed by the fear of strengthening it against the people; forgetting that the men who composed it came directly from the body of citizens, and must sooner or later return to it, they feared that the ties by which long service would bind them to their officers might prove stronger than the ties by which they were bound to their families. History troubled them with visions of Cæsar and Cromwells, and like too many who misapply her lessons they failed to see how utterly unlike were the 'thirteen colonies' to the dregs of Romulus or the England of Charles the First. They erred where sensible men daily err, by applying to one class of circumstances the principles which they have deduced from a class radically different."

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

"It was in a great measure this feeling, combined with a morbid attachment to State rights, or rather an imperfect conception of the vital importance of a real Union, that delayed the formation of an army for the war till the moment for forming it cheaply and readily was passed. It was this feeling which, under the plausible show of strengthening the dependence of the Army upon Congress, kept the officers in much feverish anxiety about the rules of promotion. It was this feeling which led John Adams to talk seriously about an annual appointment of generals, and both the Adamses to draw nigh to Gates as a man who, in some impossible contingency, was to be set up against Washington.

"It is not surprising, therefore, that to minds tinged with these suspicions the idea of half pay for life should seem fraught with serious danger, or that the men who entertained them should have opposed, as an invasion of popular rights, what in the light of impartial history seems a mere act of justice. It was not till the terrible winter of Valley Forge had been passed through, and when Washington saw himself upon the point of losing many of his best and most experienced officers, that a promise of half pay for seven years to all who should serve through the war was wrung from a reluctant Congress. It took two years more of urgent exhortation and stern experience to overcome the last scruples and secure a vote of half pay for life."

"On the 3d November, 1783, the army was disbanded. There was no formal leave-taking. Each regiment, each company, went as it chose. Men who had stood side by side in battle, who had shared the same tent in summer and same hut in winter, parted, never to meet again. Some still had homes, and therefore definite hopes. But hundreds knew not whither to go. Their four months' pay, the only part of their country's indebtedness which they had received, was not sufficient to buy them food and shelter long, even when it had not been necessarily pledged before it came into their hands. They had lost the habits of domestic life, as they had long foregone its comforts. Strong men were seen weeping like children; men who had borne cold and hunger in winter camps and faced death on the battle-field shrunk from this new form of trial. For a few days the streets and taverns were crowded. For weeks soldiers were to be seen on every road or lingering bewildered about public places like men who were at a loss what to do with themselves. There were no ovals for them as they came back toll-worn before their time to the places which had once known them; no ringing of bells, no eager opening of hospitable doors. The country was tired of the war, tired of the sound of fife and drum, anxious to get back to sowing and reaping, to buying and selling, to town meetings and general elections."

"Political ambition looked for advancement nearer home." "It was long before the country awoke to a consciousness of its ingratitude to these brave men."

Many years later one of the noblest speeches that Daniel Webster ever pronounced was in advocating the passage of a law to do tardy justice by granting pensions to the survivors of the Revolution. After the war of 1812, the size of the Army, the tenure of office in it, and the mode of reduction were again the subject of discussion. The same points which are now made in debate were urged then; and after an able and protracted debate the peace establishment was so adjusted as to avoid almost wholly the muster-out of deserving officers. In 1820, during this debate, the Secretary of War made a report to Congress, in which he set forth the principles which have finally become the settled policy of the Government. The subject was so ably handled that I cannot do better than quote a few sentences setting forth the principles on which the Army should be organized in time of peace. The Secretary says:

"To give such an organization [a peace establishment] the leading principles in its formation ought to be, that at the commencement of hostilities there should be nothing either to new model or create. The only difference, consequently, between the peace and the war formation of the Army ought to be in the increased magnitude of the latter, and the only change in passing from the former to the latter should consist in giving to the augmentation which will then be necessary."

"The next principle to be observed is, that the organization ought to be such as to induce in time of peace citizens of adequate talents and respectability of character to enter and remain in the military service of the country, so that the Government may have officers at its command who to the requisite experience would add the public confidence. The correctness of this principle can scarcely be doubted, for surely if it is worth having an Army at all it is worth having it well commanded."

"Every prudent individual, in selecting his course of life, must be governed, making some allowance for natural disposition, essentially by the reward which attends the various pursuits open to him. Under our free institutions every one is left free to make his selection, and most of the pursuits of life, followed with industry and skill, lead to opulence and respectability. The profession of arms, in the well-established state of things which exists among us, has no reward but what is attached to it by law, and if that should be inferior to other professions it would be idle to suppose individuals possessed of the necessary talents and character would be induced to enter it. A mere sense of duty ought not and cannot be safely relied on. It supposes that individuals would be actuated by a stronger sense of duty toward the Government than the latter toward them."

"No position connected with the organization of the peace establishment is susceptible of being more rigidly proved than that the proportion of its officers to the rank and file ought to be greater than in a war establishment. It results immediately from a position the truth of which cannot be fairly doubted, and which I have attempted to illustrate in the preliminary remarks, that the leading object of a regular army in time of peace ought to be to enable the country to meet with honor and safety, particularly at the commencement of the war, the dangers incident to that state; to effect this object, as far as practicable, the peace organization ought, as has been shown, to be such that in passing to a state of war there should be nothing either to new model or to create, and that the difference between that and the war organization ought to be simply in the greater magnitude of the latter."

"Economy is certainly a very high political virtue, intimately connected with the power and the public virtue of the community. In military operations, which, under the best management, are so expensive, it is of the utmost importance; but by no propriety of language can that arrangement be called economical which, in order that our military establishment in peace should be rather less expensive, would, regardless of the purposes for which it ought to be maintained, render it unfit to meet the dangers incident to a state of war."

I am content to stand by this doctrine; and guided by it, the Committee on Military Affairs have tried to accomplish two things: to provide for a very large reduction of the expense of the Army, and at the same time to preserve the efficiency and spirit of its organization.

Reduction of the Army.

SPEECH OF HON. B. F. BUTLER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 17, 1869.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870—

cers of the staff departments or corps of the Army shall have the rank, pay, and grade of infantry officers next below that fixed for such officers by the act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 23, 1866, except when actually serving in the field in war, when the pay shall be that of a mounted officer. That the whole number of officers serving in the above-named staff departments and corps shall be reduced one half, in each grade, the officers retained to be selected by the President as hereinafter provided; and those not selected to be retained shall be mustered out on the 1st day of July next.

Officers retired from active service not on account of disability from wounds received in battle shall receive forty per cent. of the pay given by this act to the highest regimental or staff rank held by such officer at the time of retirement. Officers retired from active service from disability from wounds received in battle shall receive seventy-five per cent. of the pay given by this act to the highest regimental or staff rank held by such officer at the time such wounds were received. Retired officers assigned to duty by the President according to their rank shall receive while so assigned and employed full pay of the grade upon which they have been retired; but no retired officer shall be assigned to any duty other than court-martial while any officer not so retired is unassigned to duty according to his rank.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That hereafter the line of the Army shall consist of twenty-four regiments of infantry, three regiments of which shall be of the Veteran Reserve corps and four of colored troops; six regiments of cavalry, two of which shall be colored troops; and three regiments of artillery; said regiments to have the same organization as now provided by law.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall forthwith proceed to consolidate the regiments now in service in accordance with the provisions of this act. He shall prepare lists of all regimental and staff officers of each grade now in service, keeping the three arms of the service distinct as well as the several staff corps; and the President shall select therefrom, in proportion to the numbers in the several grades, the number required to fill said regiments from each arm, selecting for the command of colored troops only officers who served in the war in command of such troops, in the manner following, that is to say: he shall cause to assemble at a council of officers composed of three general officers, one of whom shall be a major general and one of whom shall have entered the Army during the late war from civil life; three officers of infantry, two of whom shall have entered the Army during the war from civil life and one of whom shall have been an officer of colored troops; two officers of cavalry, one of whom shall have entered the Army during the war from civil life; two officers of the medical department; one officer of the Adjutant General's department; one officer of the engineer department; one officer of the ordnance department; one officer of the quartermaster's department; one officer of the subsistence department, and one officer of the pay department, who shall have entered the Army during the war from civil life; all of whom shall be selected for high character, intelligence, discretion, justice, patriotism, professional ability, and services during the war, and who being thus selected shall be retained in the service; and it shall be the duty of the council to inquire into and consider the capacity, character, record of services, and fitness to be continued in the military service of every officer below the grade of general who may be in the Army at the time of the passage of this act. And the council shall for this purpose be furnished with all information, papers, documents, records, and evidence they may require from the War Department; and the council shall furnish a report of their conclusions to the Secretary of War, with their reasons therefor, and shall keep a record of their votes in the case of each officer, except that the name of the officer voting need not be recorded. When the report of a majority of two thirds of the council is in favor of any officer he shall thereupon be reported and be placed upon the list from which selections are to be made by the President of officers to be retained in the service; but in case of any officer not so reported by the council, then he shall be summoned before the council, by order, for examination into his moral, mental, and physical qualifications, and shall be allowed full and reasonable opportunity for explanation and defense, and may produce testimony to meet any objection or charges, if any there be, of which he shall be informed, all of which shall be submitted in writing, and the testimony taken under oath; and the board, at its discretion, may summon any witness who shall have given such testimony for further examination, and the case shall then be again examined and reported upon by the board; but when it shall appear to the council on examination of any officer that he has not been employed on active duty in the field during any part of the late war, it shall be the duty of the council to inquire specially into the reason for such officer not being so employed; and any officer whose absence from active field service during the war shall be found by a majority of the council to have been on account of the wish or application of such officer to be assigned to duty elsewhere than at the front, from any cause whatever, he shall not be reported to be put upon the list from which officers to serve in the Army shall be selected. And from the list so reported the President shall select the regimental and company officers in the regiments hereby authorized, giving to those officers who entered the Army from civil life during the war and were promoted or appointed for gallantry and good conduct an equal number with those who had served in the Army before the war, so that said officers may be selected from those who have performed active and meritorious services in the field in the war of the rebellion in preference to others; and the officers of the staff corps or department shall be likewise selected from said list, but without regard to service in the field.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all the bands now in the service organized under the provisions of section seven of an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866, except the band at the Military Academy, shall be honorably discharged without delay, and shall receive full pay and allowance to the date of such discharge.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized and directed, so soon as the necessities of the service will allow, to order the muster-out of enlisted men until the total number, the proper proportions of the different arms of the service being preserved, shall be reduced to twenty-five thousand; and until such reduction is reached no further enlistments shall be made; and thereafter there shall be no more than twenty-five thousand enlisted men at any one time without special authority of Congress: Provided, That all men enlisted for any special corps other than above mentioned, such as ordnance or engineer soldiers, shall be disbanded, and, at the election of enlisted men, be recruited into the line of the Army.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the organization of the Bureau of Military Justice shall hereafter consist of one Judge Advocate General, with the rank and pay of a colonel; one assistant judge advocate general, with the rank and pay of a lieutenant colonel; four assistant judge advocates general, with the rank and pay of a major; and all promotions and appointments hereafter made in said bureau shall be in accordance with the provisions of this section.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the office of military storekeeper is hereby abolished. The place may be filled by a retired officer of the Army.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the medical staff of the Army shall not be increased by surgeons hired by contract or otherwise, so that the whole number of medical officers shall not be beyond one for every one hundred and fifty men.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect on the 4th day of March, 1869; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act in any manner whatever are hereby repealed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This House, Mr. Chairman, has been engaged for days in considering the question whether a few thousand dollars may be saved to the tax-payers of the country. The propositions to which I now call your attention are to save many million dollars, if I mistake not, and this subject has received very considerable and careful attention from me and from those who have aided me in examining it. These propositions, if carried out, will reduce our Army to twenty-five thousand men—twenty-four regiments of infantry, three of artillery, and four of cavalry, fully equipped and fully officered, and so far as the staff departments are concerned, with a staff larger than that of the army of Great Britain, and yet save more than thirty million dollars in the current expenses of the Army.

When I addressed the House a few days ago upon this subject I stated that I thought we might save from thirteen million to fifteen million dollars. My statistics had not then been completed; and I own that I was astonished at the amount of expenditures which I found upon further comparison were called for by the Army. At the same time it is very clear that we do not want more than twenty-five thousand men. We will want no army in the South after the 4th day of March next. An event will then happen which will be more potent for peace than soldiers in every village and hamlet. It will then be understood that all disorder and riot and murder must cease. And it cannot be that to meet the few thousand Indians in the field—perhaps I ought to say hundreds of Indians—we will need more than twenty-five thousand effective men. We had, at the time my statistics were prepared, about forty-two thousand men and officers; not, it is true, in the field, but on the rolls. The current expenses of the Army last year—current expenses, mark you, leaving out everything in the way of back pay, bounty, pension, &c.—the current expenses were $68,000,000. We have staff officers in greater number and in greater rank than the staff of any army in the world.

That you may get precisely the number of staff officers allow me to present the following table which shows the number of staff officers in the Army in 1867–68:

or one staff or general officer to each thirty-eight men in an Army of twenty-five thousand men.

So that we have a total of 615 officers, or one general officer to every 38 men in an army of 25,000 men. That is independent of the line officers—colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants, which amount to about 2,500 more. Beside these are in addition 321 contract surgeons, hired for the Army, and 459 hospital stewards, at a salary of thirty dollars per month, at a cost of $165,240, and thirty chaplains.

These figures may be summed up in these words: we have now 60 regiments amounting in the aggregate to 39,000 men, making about 650 men to a regiment, giving 38 line officers to a regiment; one general officer for every 20 men. Adding staff officers to the general officers, we have an officer to every 15 men; adding the 331 contract surgeons, we have an officer to every 12 men. And we have the singular spectacle of an officer of the medical staff to every 76 men. As there should not be more than about one or two sick men to every 76, we have about one medical officer to every sick man. If we suppose the Army reduced, as proposed, to 25,000 men, we have a medical officer, either active or retired, to every 48 men; and a staff or general officer, active or retired, to every 38 men. Adding the regimental officers, we have of officers, either active or retired, 2,968, or one to every 28 men, not including 30 chaplains and 459 hospital stewards at $80 a month beside rations, at an aggregate expense of more than $165,204 for pay only. Thus we have a medical department costing for pay alone $936,573 84. In other words, for an Army of 39,000 it costs $25 a man to pay the doctor's bill, saying nothing of the medicine and the hospital stores, rations, and accommodations. And these figures cannot be successfully disputed.

Alarmed at their numbers I looked to see what was the cost of paying these officers, and I found it to be most enormous. I desire every gentleman to follow me with care, because I hope to do no injustice to the officers or men of the Army. I hold in my hand a table showing the cost for pay alone of the officers of the Army and clerks of the War Department and their contingent expenses for the fiscal year 1867-68:

Pay of officers and clerks of the Army.

A statement showing the total amount of expenditures of the War Department for salaries of the officers and clerks of its various branches and officers of the Army, including commutation of quarters, fuel, forage, servants' wages and clothing, longevity ratings, and all allowances; and also the expense of printing for the Army for the year 1867-68:

Secretary's office.....	$59,410 00

Inspector General's office.....	37,560 00

Cavalry officers.....	1,187,700 00
Artillery officers.....	866,362 50
Infantry officers.....	3,638,814 00
Total.....	$12,386,527 90

But of this vast expense of more than twelve million dollars it will be seen that the Freedmen's Bureau costs only for pay $840,000. It will be observed that the grand total is the almost incredible sum for pay only of $12,386,527 90.

Now, Mr. Chairman, finding this to be the condition of expenditure, I was led to examine of what items this pay consists. I asked my friends on the Military Committee what was the pay of officers of the Army, and not one of them could tell me. I asked in the Secretary's office what it was, and no one could tell me. I asked in the Paymaster General's office, and no one could tell me. I asked in the Quartermaster General's office, and no one could tell me. I asked everywhere, and no one could tell me until I got to the Treasury, and there my question is at last answered by putting together many items in different bureaus. Why was this? Because the pay of an officer of the Army is made up of so many different allowances and perquisites paid him by so many different persons that no one officer can tell what the pay of another may be. I sometimes doubt whether any officer can rightly tell what his own pay is. In the Treasury at last I learned what was the pay of some of the officers of the Army. I did not examine into the pay of the General of the Army, because my bill, the bill of the committee, and the bill ordered by the House to be reported last year, agree that this office should cease when it becomes vacant on the 4th of March next. I did not look into the pay of the Lieutenant General, item by item, because there is only one, and it cannot be a great matter in so large a sum total. But I will say that, depending on the duty and the place to which he is assigned, the pay of a Lieutenant General ranges from eighteen to twenty-two thousand dollars a year.

I hold in my hand an accurate list of the receipts of a major general of the Army during the last year, and I take one stationed at an average costly place, and one of the younger ones, because if stationed here, and if he were an older one, he would get one or two thousand dollars more per annum, as you will see when I read this list, composed of so many items and so many allowances, and so involved that I doubt, indeed, whether the major general himself, if asked, could not tell what was his pay. His pay proper is $220 only a month; the rest is made up of allowances, as seen in the subjoined table, showing the pay and emoluments of a major general United States Army, headquarters at New York city, in 1868:

Payments made by the Paymaster's department.

Pay proper.....	$220 00
For self for subsistence: thirty rations per day; commutation, thirty cents per ration, month of thirty days.....	270 00

It will be observed that he has five longevity ratings. Now, what do you suppose a longevity rating is? It is the theory of the Army that the older a man grows the more he eats. [Laughter.] If he has been in for five years he gets one longevity rating; that is a right to thirty cents per day as long as he lives; if for ten years, two; and if for fifteen, three longevity ratings. When does the time of this longevity rating commence? The hour he enters West Point. One who has been in West Point for four years, then graduates and is in the Army one year, gets one longevity rating at thirty cents a day, and it goes on as long as he lives.

Now, this major general gets five longevity ratings only; some officers have enough, as I will call attention to in a moment, to amount to nineteen hundred and eighty-five or two thousand dollars in one year. Besides he has an amount of fuel for one year of one hundred and two cords, which in the case of this officer was commuted at twelve dollars a cord, making $1,224 for fuel. The aggregate of fuel, quarters, and forage received from the quartermaster's department is $2,044. Add the amount received from the pay department $7,840 50, and we have $10,734 50. Aggregate not including forage for five horses and mileage, $480; that makes $11,214 50. And then he has ten cents a mile and his own and his servant's baggage carried for him besides whenever he moves. This is the pay and a portion of the allowances of a major general.

Now, I have a table, which I will not read, made up in the same way carefully, taking everything, and I find that a brigadier general, chief of the department, has $7,606 50 if he is stationed at Washington; a colonel has $4,392; a lieutenant colonel, $3,826; a major, $3,537; a mounted captain, $2,725; a captain not mounted, $2,605; a first lieutenant mounted, $2,177; a first lieutenant not mounted, $2,137; a second lieutenant mounted, $2,177; a second lieutenant not mounted, $2,077. So that a second lieutenant, just out of school, gets $2,000 a year, and this is outside of his commutation for his forage, and outside of his allowance for travel.

Statement exhibiting the pay and emoluments of Army officers on duty in the different bureaus of the War Department at Washington, not including "longevity ratings"—thirty cents per day for every five years' continuous service—nor forage for horses—eight dollars per month for each owned by them and kept in service not exceeding the number allowed—nor other emoluments for mileage when traveling on duty.

HO. OF REPS.

Reduction of the Army—Mr. Butler.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Mr. O'NEILL. During the war the Marine corps, owing to the wants and necessities of the service, was increased to three thousand men and a sufficient number of officers to command them. The corps still exists as it was organized then, and hence there is a brigadier general.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In my judgment the proposition should be to cut down that corps—although I have a high respect for the marines—to about eight hundred, or at the most twelve hundred men, which is a fair colonel's command.

Passing from this, however, I am only speaking of the number of brigadier generals that we should have in the Army. We have dwelt upon this part of the subject too long. The proposition is to reduce the number of brigadier generals to six, and to cut the chiefs of staff departments down to colonels. Now, there is this objection raised, and it is fair for the Army and for everybody else to say that in this country from the beginning there has always been a general at the head of the quartermaster's department. Sometimes that general was a major general; and that officer was the only brigadier general of the staff department before the war. All the rest of the chiefs of staff departments were colonels; some of them only colonels by brevet. But from October 1, 1776, there has always been either a major general or a brigadier general at the head of the quartermaster's department; and if gentlemen, out of respect to the traditions of the Army, still desire to retain a brigadier general at the head of that department I shall not have much difficulty in regard to it.

But passing from that, the next proposition—and here comes the struggle—is to cut down the staff of the Army one half. This staff is now as large as it was when we had all our armies in the field during the rebellion; I mean, of course, the Army staff proper, not the medical staff or the assistant adjutant general's or the paymaster's. Under the present circumstances, I think if we have a staff which is acknowledged to be sufficient for an army of fifty thousand men, it may be cut down one half when we reduce the Army to twenty-five thousand men. It is proposed, therefore, that the staff department shall be cut down one half in each grade, to be selected by the President in the manner hereafter to be stated. At this point will come the contest over this bill, and here is the first great departure I make from the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill of the Military Committee does not provide for the mustering out a single man or a single officer—not one. And if you pass it you will not thereby get rid of a man or an officer or save a dollar of expense.

My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. GARFIELD,] says that by the bill of the committee the Army will be gradually reduced. I beg his pardon, not so. Under his bill it will be reduced only by the act of Almighty God and the vices of the officers, and in no other way. Every man or officer is left by it to remain in the Army until he dies or resigns.

That leads me to remark just here upon what is termed the consolidation of the supply departments. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says that he has consolidated sixty-five officers out of the supply departments by consolidating the commissary and quartermaster's and pay departments into one. I agree that there is a consolidation provided for, but it is simply a consolidation of departments, leaving the officers now in them doing nothing and drawing full pay. Do I misstate the bill of the committee? If so, I am willing to be corrected.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman does misstate it most decidedly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; how?

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill to which the gentleman refers provides that the President of the United States shall, as rapidly as the public service will permit, proceed to consolidate the officers of those departments. It is presumed that so important and radical a change as that cannot be made in a day or even in a month, but it must be done gradually and carefully; and by the time it is fully accomplished we believe the gradual process of absorption will have reduced the number of officers.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have heard the gentleman's explanation, and repeat what I said, I have not misstated his bill. Not one officer is cut off by his bill. That is to be done only by "absorption." And if the bill of the committee is to be passed I want to have the title of the bill changed so that it will read "A bill to reduce the Army by absorption." That is to say, not one of these officers is to be required to go out of the Army until he goes by death or resignation.

I propose to strike out of the six hundred and fifty-one officers of these staff departments one half of them. Out of the two departments proposed by the committee's bill to be consolidated I propose to take out ninety-one officers, while the bill of the committee proposes to take out sixty-five officers, when they are ready to go. Therefore I ask if I am not right when I say that all the bill of the committee proposes to do is to let the President consolidate these departments, turn these officers out of the departments, but not out of the Army, leaving them nothing to do and drawing full pay.

The whole question resolves itself into this: shall we muster out the supernumerary officers of the Army? And, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I look upon this as the most vital question which has ever come before this House; for if we cannot muster out the supernumerary officers of our Army, then, indeed, are our liberties placed at the footstool of the armed forces of the Republic.

What is the argument against mustering out these supernumerary officers? Why, sir, we are told that we must not muster out officers of the Army because they have made the Army a profession, because they have received a military education at the public expense, because they have pursued that profession almost from their boyhood, and it is not right to muster them out in their old age. Now, I want the attention of this House to a table showing some facts with reference to this argument, which I think members will be surprised to learn; and I refer for the verification of these facts to the official Register.

Table of the proportion of West Point officers in the Army.

Cavalry.....	440	63	377	15	85	-

Field officers*.....	349	135	214	39	61	-
General officers.....	25	21	4	84	16	-
Army staff.....	681	207	474	30	70	-

Total.....	3219	832	2387	-	-	26
* Field officers as follows:
Cavalry.....	74	24	50	32	68	-
Artillery.....	49	24	25	50	50	-
Infantry.....	226	87	139	38	62	-
Total officers in cavalry, artillery, and infantry, field and staff.....	2264	375	1889	16½	83½	-

Thus it will be seen that in the cavalry the total number of officers is 440, of whom 63 are from West Point, 377 from civil life, only fifteen per cent. being from West Point. Now, sir, if these cavalry officers from West Point must not be turned out to be dependent upon their own resources, we had better pension them for life, and turn out the volunteer officers, the men who, like the rest of us, went into the Army, making it their profession only as we made it a profession, and who ought to be ready to go out as we went out. We shall thus save a great expense to the country. Of the artillery officers 194 are from civil life, and 141 from West Point, or about forty-two and a half per cent. of the whole number. The total number of infantry officers is 1,489, of whom 171, or eleven and a half per cent. only, are from West Point. Now, if we can get on in no other way, I, for one, am in favor of pensioning these 171 West Point officers, if that be necessary in order to get at the officers who have not made the Army a profession. Did these volunteer officers make the Army a profession any more than the volunteer soldiers? Many of these men went into the Army side by side with us; and they are no more entitled to continue therein for life than the rest of us. And it was the glory of this country that the volunteer army, without a murmur, suffered themselves to be mustered out; and many of them returning to civil life found their homes desolated, their old associations broken up, their business ruined, so that they were obliged, as it were, to start life anew. But we heard from them no murmur. And shall these, our comrades, who fought as well as we but no better; who suffered with us as much, and no more; who left their homes and their business as well as we did, and no more; and who are no better than we are, insist that they have made arms a profession, and are better than we are; and that, therefore, they who by grace and favor or by political influence or otherwise have been put into the Army shall remain a burden upon the country forever, when their services are no longer wanted?

Again, among the field officers, I find that of the whole number, 349, 135 are from West Point—thirty-nine per cent. Of the general officers, 25 in all, 21 are from West Point, and 4 only from civil life. Of the Army staff, numbering 681, 207 are from West Point and 474 from civil life, those from West Point being thirty and a half per cent. of the whole number. Of the staff department proper, however, embracing the Adjutant General's office, the engineer corps, &c., 249 officers in all, 229 are from West Point, and only 20 from civil life. Thus all the soft places in the Army are in possession of West Point, and they are naturally averse to giving them up.

It will be found that while of the cavalry officers fifteen per cent. are from West Point, while of the field officers thirty-two and a half per cent. are from West Point, in the artillery there is only forty-two per cent. You will find among the higher officers fifty and a half per cent., while in the infantry there is only eleven per cent. of West Point officers. Let the country mark these facts, and see if we need to expend $30,000,000 needlessly upon these men.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Reduction of the Army—Mr. Butler.

HO. OF REPS.

Therefore I say that the argument fails and comes to naught which says that we cannot reduce this force because these men have been bred to the profession of arms and have been brought up to it from boyhood.

How do I propose to reduce it? I have proposed to reduce the whole force in this way: there shall be a board of fifteen officers selected by the President in the way proposed in this bill. There shall be three generals, one from civil life; three infantry officers, one from civil life, and one commanding colored troops, and so on. There shall be a board of officers, which, when you reckon it up, of eight West Point officers and seven volunteer officers, detailed by the President for good conduct, soldierly qualities, and professional ability. Those men are to select the list of men out of which selections shall be made of those to be retained in the Army. The board selects who of all the men in the Army are worthy to be retained at all, and from that list the President shall select as many as are necessary to officer twenty-five thousand men with the proper staffs. There is one class of exception, and that is the men who are holding office in the Army and who occupied "soft places" during the war at their own request, or who refused to go into the field because they would not fight against their States and were put on mustering and commissary duty in the North, the men who took good care to keep in "soft places" all during the war at their own request. I have provided when that appears they shall be left out, and meritorious officers shall be selected in preference.

The next proposition in which I differ from the committee is in regard to the pay of the Army. I have fixed the pay of each grade of officers in this form, subject of course to the better judgment of the House: Lieutenant General to have $12,900 a year, $4,000 more than the Speaker of this House and $4,000 more than the Vice President; major general, $7,500; brigadier general, $5,000; colonel, $3,500; lieutenant colonel, $2,750; major, $2,500; captain, mounted, $2,000; captain, not mounted, $1,800; adjutant, $1,800; regimental quartermaster, $1,800; first lieutenant, mounted, $1,600; first lieutenant, not mounted, $1,500; second lieutenant, mounted, $1,500; second lieutenant, not mounted, $1,400; chaplain, $1,200; aid-de-camp to major general, $200 in addition to pay of his rank; aid-de-camp to brigadier general, $150 in addition to pay of his rank; acting assistant commissary, $100 in addition to pay of his rank; and that these sums shall be in full of everything.

Then I provide that commutation for fuel, quarters, forage, rations, longevity rations, servants' clothing, pay, and rations, and everything of that sort in the way of allowances shall be done, ended, cease, be got rid of, cut off, and put a stop to. [Laughter.] I provide that that great abuse shall be finally brought to an end, if it is possible to be done by legislative act.

I have provided, however, when officers travel they shall have ten cents per mile, and that according to post routes. And there is a special provision that the paymaster shall alone pay the officers all they shall receive. Now he only pays the pay proper and rations and servants' allowances, while the quartermaster general's department pays commutation for quarters and fuel and forage. In some cases the commissary department pays him for his rations. As it is now it is next to impossible to tell how much an officer gets. I want to put a stop to all that.

If the pay and allowances provided in this bill can become law, and the supernumerary officers cut off, then we can make the saving shown in the following table:

they buy their food now at the wholesale price of the Government. When that privilege was proposed to be interfered with in the appropriation bill it was of so much consequence that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs raised a point of order upon it to strike out the provision. He wanted to save the right of buying rations to the officers. Now, what does it mean?

Mr. GARFIELD. The letter I had read from the Commissary General explained precisely that; as we had abolished the office of sutler and allowed officers of the Army in the commissary department to furnish sutlers' supplies, the gentleman's bill would cut off the allowance of any such supplies.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am going to that. I understand it all thoroughly. The commissary department buys an ox at eight cents per pound, and it is slaughtered and cut up and the best pieces are sold to the officers at eight cents per pound, and these pieces go to their landlords, while the shin-bones and poor cuts go into the hospitals and quarters of the men, for which the United States pays the same price as the officers do for the best ones. That is what the tenderness about this privilege means, and the practice prevails everywhere.

It gives to the officers canned meats, preserved fruits, coffee, sugar, tea, and everything of that sort, bought at wholesale by the commissary and sold to the officers at the same price. Now, I agree that the abolition of this practice will not be a great saving to the Government, and perhaps I ought not to have spoken of it, but I do speak in behalf of the men. When you hear them grumbling about their rations it is not because the commissary has failed to buy good rations, but because they only get the inferior part of the rations which the United States pay for at the same price as for the best. Therefore we found the moment we struck at that little abuse a letter came to the chairman of the committee, saying "Look out for our rations." [Laughter.] "Take care that the privilege of buying them is not cut off. Take care of our preserved fruits, that we may not have to pay for them only the wholesale price."

Mr. ROSS. Does the gentleman know that officers on the plains draw coffee by the sack and sell it?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not know that fact. I am speaking of what can be done under the law. On the plains I suspect they are all pretty lawless. I am talking about what is done in Washington right under our noses, and there are men who know the fact that Army officers have paid their board bills to their landladies in whole or in part by selling the meat which they have thus obtained at the wholesale price. And there are members here who will confirm what I have said. Therefore I have endeavored in this bill to cut off all allowances which may grow into abuses, and substitute a salary only.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman inform the House to whom he refers?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The officer or the member of the House?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. To what gentleman in the House does he refer?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He sits right before me. He stated this fact in the House the other day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is he white or black? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have never seen a black officer do anything but his duty.

Now, sir, I have been speaking of the abuses that may be cut off only. I have but one or two other provisions to which I will call the attention of the committee. I have provided that hereafter the line of the Army shall consist of twenty-four regiments of infantry. I have also provided that three of them shall be the

I will refer now to a matter merely to show how these allowances and privileges grow into abuses. In addition to what I have already stated, these officers also have the right to buy everything from the commissary department which they use as food, whether of necessity or luxury. When officers are in the field this privilege was allowed them to get what they wanted to eat from the commissary department at the contract price, because they could not buy their rations elsewhere than from the Government; but that practice has grown until it has got to this pass. It is carried into the cities and towns, and wherever there are commissary stores, and

Veteran Reserve corps, and for this reason: that corps consists of wounded veteran officers and wounded veteran men, and they are just as fit and effective to guard the posts as any men on earth; and so long as we keep a man or an officer in it we at least save the pensions. Therefore I propose to keep these three regiments. They are as good to keep up military knowledge as any other men, as good for all purposes of guarding the arsenals as any other men.

I then propose that four of the twenty-four regiments shall be colored troops. Every man who has served in the Army with colored troops will agree with me that there were no more faithful sentinels, no better troops to maintain discipline and order, no more obedient men than the colored troops.

Again, I provide that there shall be three regiments of artillery. I have proposed to cut down the number of regiments of artillery, because the minimum number of a regiment is eleven hundred men. Their horses and equipments make this a very expensive arm indeed. One regiment of artillery costs more than four of infantry. And, as regards the cavalry, if you look at the quartermaster's report you will find an immense sum has been paid for cavalry horses last year. And the expenses of this arm are enormous. Therefore the cavalry should be cut down to the smallest possible number, and if you want cavalry for Indian wars, ask for volunteers on the plains. It may be said we cannot get volunteers there in time. Let me give you an instance of the difference between the moving of volunteers and that of regular troops.

At three o'clock on the 15th of April, 1861, an order was issued by Abraham Lincoln to Detroit, I think, for two companies of regular soldiers there in barracks to come here and defend the national capital. At the same time an order went to the State of Massachusetts for four regiments of militia, two of which were to go to Fortress Monroe and two were to come here. On the 19th of April one of those regiments was here; on the 20th of April two were in Fortress Monroe, and the fourth regiment had been intercepted at Baltimore, or it would have been here on the same day, but finding its passage obstructed on that day, it seized and held Annapolis, and opened a road between the capital and the loyal North. The regular troops got to Baltimore thirty days after.

Let me give you another illustration of the fact that during the war the regular Army sought out the "soft places." I take the data from the Army Register, and I challenge comparison with the volunteers. We say we owe much to the regular Army. There were good, brave men in the regular Army. There are now. I have in my mind now some officers from West Point in the regular Army, and more faithful, braver, more gallant men or more patriotic men never bore a sword; but I tell you, you will find that most of such men commanded volunteer troops, or else were on the staffs of volunteer generals, seeking to serve their country to the best of their ability when it was the post of danger and of honor. For let me state here, in face of this House and in face of the country, that in the three great armies of the Republic, in the last battles of the Republic under Grant and Sherman and Thomas, which brought the rebellion to a final close by the surrender of the forces of the rebellion, there was no regiment of regular infantry—not one, not one. They had all found places elsewhere soft, and the volunteers did the fighting at that day. I made this statement once before without contradiction, and I repeat it. Therefore I say that this country owes its glory, its grandeur, its life, to the volunteers who left the plow, the anvil, and the shop to defend their homes, their liberties, and the laws. And whenever we are told that we want an army, I point to the workshops, to the plow, and to the loom, and say. There are your soldiers, and the officers to lead them will come from those men who will be retired or mustered out by this bill.

The House is told by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs as an argument why we should not reduce the Army that the General-in-Chief of the Army says he does not desire its force shall be reduced. The General-in-Chief prepared his report nearly seven months ago, when there was the beginning of an Indian war. He has spoken to us on this subject in no other way since, except to say that there must be retrenchment and economy; and that that economy will be promoted by my amendment I have the evidence here in a short table:

Pay of the officers of the Army.

Salaries of officers and clerks of the War Department and officers of the Army, and expense of printing for the Army for 1863..... $12,386,527 90

Salaries of officers and clerks, if the number and pay of officers alone be reduced as proposed..... 6,457,518 62

Amount saved by bill of Mr. BUTLER, *$5,929,009 28

Salaries, if the number and pay of officers be reduced as proposed and the number of clerks be reduced one half, $4,958,230 21

Amount saved †$7,428,267 69

Expenses of the whole War Department.

Current expenses of the War Department for 1863..... $68,743,094 71

Estimated expenses of the Army reduced from 48,081 to 25,000 men..... 33,310,638 21

Amount of reduction in expenses..... $35,432,456 50

Percentage of reduction, fifty-one per cent.

The pay of officers of the Army, therefore, is $12,000,000. If you pass this amendment it will cut down the pay of officers to $6,457,000, making a saving of $7,428,000 in the pay of officers alone, and almost $200,000 more if you cut down the clerks one half. [Here the hammer fell.] May I ask for five minutes more? [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"]

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks, however long it may take. [Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

No objection was made.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. With many thanks to the committee for this courtesy, I desire to proceed for the reason that I have taken great pains to bring these facts to the attention of the House and the country.

Now then, sir, as I was saying, we can retrench $7,000,000 in the pay of these officers alone, and still have officers enough in the service to organize and command twenty-four regiments of infantry, three of artillery, and four of cavalry, which, at the minimum rate, would give 25,000 men. I say further upon the question of economy that the current expenses of the Army for the year 1867 amounted to $68,743,000. The estimated expenses of the Army reduced by this from 42,081 to 25,000 is $33,310,638, or a saving of $35,432,456 50. If the principle—the pay table of my amendment—is adopted and officers are mustered out and good officers are selected by the General of the Army and the President, you will have all this saving to the country. Let me say right here upon this question that last month's statement of the public debt shows an apparent increase of $15,500,000 in a single month, and if any gentleman will take the trouble to look at that statement he will find that there is an actual increase of between six and eight millions for the past month, not taking in the payment of interest which might have been said to have accrued in the months preceding.

Therefore, while we are increasing our debt at the rate of $6,000,000 a month, why should we not wait, why should we not spend time, why should we not examine and see if we cannot save $35,000,000 in one lump and leave the Army still effective with 25,000 men?

* Or about forty-eight per cent.

† Or sixty per cent.

I am told that the General of the Army did not last fall desire the Army to be reduced. The last time he spoke to us he said he desired economy. Now, he himself is the best example of the fact that we do not require officers to be kept in the Army in order that we may have officers to lead our Army in time of war. He left the Army and retired to civil life, precisely as these officers we speak about mustering out should do and will do. When officers were needed the needs of the country found him and elevated him, step by step, upward and upward, until he has reached the highest pinnacle of power known on earth. He himself is an army in himself for the preservation of peace and good order. After the 4th of March next he will command peace with a single word. Does any one believe that for the next ten years at least there will be any fighting south of Mason and Dixon's line? No; or if the rebels there shall ever undertake to renew the fight we from the North will go down there as we did before, long before the officers of the regular Army get on their boots, and sweep them into the gulf. We know how to do it now.

Now, a few words upon this matter—the opinion of the General of the Army—in another point of view. While we ought to entertain the very highest respect for any opinion of the General of the Army, especially upon this subject, which is his specialty, and while I, for one, entertain the very highest respect for his opinion, yet I must remember, and members of the House will remember, that he can only speak to us through his reports, and hereafter only speak to us in the way known to the Constitution, to give us advice upon the state of the nation in messages to be addressed to the House and Senate, and not to be doled out through anybody's supposed private conversations with him. And when he gives us those opinions of his, and makes known to us his desires for the reduction of the expenses of the Government, they will be heeded by me with that respect and that honor and that loyalty that is due to him as the head of the nation, and with that cordial and earnest support that I propose to give him as the great head of the Republican party of the nation, whom they have been glad to honor with the place he has, and whom we shall be glad hereafter to honor, as we shall do, as he fills that place true to the principles that elected him, and carrying on the Government to higher and greater and more perfect command and benefit of the whole country, and raising the nation, step by step, in the future, as it will do under his guidance and the guidance of the Republican party, until the whole earth shall wonder at the glory thereof and tremble at a power which never, never will be used except in support of justice and of right.

Mr. NIBLACK. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to commit himself to support General Grant for the Presidency in 1872?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If he is the best man for President in 1872, yes.

Mr. NIBLACK. That is not very definite.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We will find out whether he is the best man for the place before then. We think we have found it out now. At any rate we are going to try the experiment, no thanks to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] [Laughter.]

I now yield for a few minutes to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to make a statement or two, so that, if he thinks it worth while, we may have the benefit of his views with reference to the suggestions I propose to make. I see by the last report of the Secretary of War, dated November 24, 1868, that on the 30th of September last the force of the Army was forty-eight thousand and eighty-one men: and it was stated that by the 1st of January next it would be reduced to about forty-three thousand. I desire in this connection to refer to the singularly short annual report which General Grant has chosen to make, and to which the gentleman has alluded; and I wish to remind my friend that he is mistaken in saying that the last official recommendation from General Grant is seven months old. It bears date "Washington, November 24, 1868;" so that it is not quite three months since we had the last official statement from General Grant. Now, that statement contains a paragraph which has been once or twice brought to the attention of the committee during the present discussion, but which I will read again, as it is short. As this is about the whole of what the General of the Army chooses to say, (as his entire report is made up of two sentences, of which this is one,) we may infer that it is in his judgment important.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Reduction of the Army—Mr. Butler.

HO. OF REPS.

"While the Indian war continues, I do not deem any general legislation for the reduction of the Army advisable. The troops on the plains are all needed. Troops are still needed in the southern States; and further reduction can be made in the way already used, and now in operation where it is safe, namely, by allowing companies to diminish by discharges, without being strengthened by recruits, and by stopping appointments of second lieutenants. If it should be deemed advisable, the Veteran Reserve regiments might be discontinued by absorption and retirement of officers and discharge of men without detriment to the service."

Now, in the first place, if there is any subject-matter in reference to which Congress is dependent upon the recommendations of the public officers having charge of a subject-matter, it is the very thing upon which we are now legislating. In the nature of the case, Congress must here and in the anomalous state of the country be dependent to a large extent upon those whose official duty it is to know and whose training and education enable them to know what military force is requisite to enable the Executive to restore and secure the public peace and safety everywhere. This is one thing that we should bear in mind.

And right here I may be pardoned for saying that members generally cannot make themselves, as the gentleman from Massachusetts appears to have made himself, thoroughly familiar with the details of this subject. Not only the House but the country, I may remark in passing, will feel indebted to him for this most careful and if accurate, as it seems to be, most valuable exposition which he has given of this whole subject; and I take this occasion to tender to him my own personal acknowledgments for the remarks which he has just made. But still I again submit that in this case, if ever, Congress must of necessity be dependent for its most reliable information as to what military force the Executive needs upon the recommendations of the officers of the Army or upon those of the President based upon information from the officers of the Army and communicated to us in the messages which the Constitution provides shall be sent to us. In all that the gentleman aims at in the way of retrenchment and reduction of expenses he has, I am sure, the most hearty sympathy and concurrence of every member of the House. We will vote with him and work with him to the utmost that we may do with safety.

Now, my next suggestion is, whether it is not wise to adopt the plan of reduction indicated in the bill of the Military Committee, so far as regards this feature, namely, that we shall permit, or rather, to make it stronger, that we shall require the Army to be reduced as rapidly as can be done consistently with the interests of the public service? Is not this, for several reasons, the wisest course? The first reason is that to which the gentleman himself has alluded and to which General Grant alludes, that there must be peace in the southern States. The gentleman says there will be no more war there. I hope, for the sake of my country, that he is right; and I believe he is right. But it must be remembered that there is still in that section of the country insubordination, want of personal safety, danger of bloodshed, violence, assassination, danger of proscription, danger of interference with elections, such as, for example, we saw in New Orleans a few weeks ago—an occurrence that will be forever one of the terrible shames of the Republic.

Now, sir, that thing must stop, and we must have peace in that sense; not only that there shall not be war, but there shall be absolute peace and public safety. Where do we stand? Here we stand with a President elected by half a million majority of the people, the greatest captain of the age, a man who knows more than any other man on the continent of America in reference to this subject, and that man has said to us that we must have peace, and also, that to the end that we shall have it, it is not best now to compel by law a sudden reduction of the Army. He has said in one sentence, which turned into a proverb as it came from his pen, that the highest ends of his Administration and the profoundest purpose of the mighty people were peace. That sentence was, "Let us have peace." But, sir, we will not have the peace that sentence means until every citizen of the Republic shall be as safe on every foot of land in the Republic as he is upon any foot. That is what he means by peace; not only absence of wars, but safety everywhere. Now, that man, charged with the duty of seeing that we have such a peace, has said to us that it is not wise to reduce by command of law the Army just now very greatly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me I will ask him a question in the line which he is pursuing.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly, if the gentleman from Massachusetts does not object, as I am occupying the floor by his courtesy.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Ohio has spoken of the necessity of personal security everywhere, and he has also spoken of the uncertainty of life, liberty, and property in the southern States. I will ask him whether he knows of any worse cases than the case of murder in the city of New York in open daylight, or the one in the city of Philadelphia, or the one in the city of Chicago?

Mr. ROSS. Or the one in Jacksonville?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Or the one in Jacksonville? Does the gentleman know of any cases in the South more grievous than those showing the want of public safety in the North? Does he know of any in the southern States equal to those which have occurred recently in the northern States?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If the gentleman's question refers to the murder in the city of New York which occurred just before the election, when a Republican was pursued by a member of his own party in daylight and killed, I believe then, I answer, that there is necessity for peace there as everywhere else, and we propose to have it. Now, if the gentleman will excuse me, I will go on with my remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to answer my question. The cases to which I have referred are notorious.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will say, with all due kindness to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that if his suggestions were in the line of my remarks I would go into detail and answer him; but as they are not, and I do not want to trespass too much on the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts is quite willing to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That General of the Army has stated to us that it is not wise to make a law for the compelled reduction of the Army. He stands to us in a double relation in making this recommendation. When he made it he was the President-elect as well as the General of the Army. He has said to his political friends as well as to his political opponents, he has officially, unofficially, and abundantly said to us, first, that he may need all the Army he now has, and he has said, second, that every possible economy shall be exercised under his Administration. It is the purpose of General Grant to be as economical as the necessities of the Republic will permit. In that double relation he has spoken to us, first, as General of the Army, and secondly, as a man about to take the responsibility of the President of the United States, charged with the restoration of order and peace. He has asked us not to reduce the Army more rapidly than under the method which he has pointed out. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts to say to us whether he is not willing to trust General Grant under such a provision as is in the Military Committee's bill, that this reduction will be made by the General as rapidly as it is safe to do it. I wish to say that there is an economy which is both profligate and criminal which is indicated by that old aphorism that for want of a nail the shoe was lost, and for want of the shoe the horse was lost, and for want of the horse the rider was lost, and for want of the rider the kingdom was lost. We must not make a mistake. When General Grant made this recommendation he was about to become President of the United States. We must remember these facts when we come to this letter of his. He says, "I am about to become the President of the United States; I mean to be as economical as possible, but I mean to have peace; and to be certain that peace shall surely come it is not safe to reduce the Army just now by such a law as leaves no option with me, and compels me to part with troops which I may need to the securing of the public safety." I can agree to go for everything—for the gentleman has captivated me with his argument—I will go for everything he argues in favor of if it does not contravene the proposition I now state, to wit, that I am in favor of leaving the General of the Army, so soon to be the President of the United States, with an Army large enough to give us that blessed consummation that he alluded to in that sentence which crystallized into a jewel the moment it was uttered, "Let us have peace." I fear that if we compel a reduction below what the General of the Army says it ought to be, we will hamper his Administration, and cripple him in the very face of the advice he has given in his last official utterance.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to cripple the administration of General Grant. Far, far from it. His administration I propose to uphold in every way that I know how. But the argument of the gentleman that in the matter of the Army we must be guided by the wishes and opinions of the Executive, however communicated to us, grates harshly on my ear, and for this controlling reason: our fathers in England were so strenuous for civil liberty and so chary of yielding anything to the Army that they never voted supplies for one but for a single year, and always determine how many troops they will raise before they will vote a single dollar. The British army has to undergo revision every single year. The Parliament first vote how many men they will have and then how much they shall be paid. That is done lest they should have fixed upon them a standing army which they cannot get rid of. They treat the navy very differently. They vote the wages of the seamen and let the number of seamen be fixed afterward. But it has become a maxim of the British constitution that the army must undergo revision by the House of Commons every year lest the army should so fasten themselves upon the country as to steal away the liberty of the nation.

Now, while General Grant is a great military officer, yet he has the esprit de corps of all military officers; hence he did not wish while he was General of the Army to offend his brother officers by asking that the Army should be reduced and they mustered out of service; and I honor him for it. They would have looked upon him invidiously had he so done. What would his fellow officers have said in such case. "By our efforts, by our services you have attained your high position, and now you take advantage of it to throw out your comrades in arms." He did right.

Now, my friend did not observe what I said about the time when that report was prepared. How many months have passed since then? One thing is certain at all events. The Indian war is now substantially ended. There is no general Indian war; there are not three thousand men fighting Indians to-day; there have not been three thousand men in battle array against Indians anywhere, and shall we maintain forty-eight thousand men to fight a few hundred Indians?

Mr. GARFIELD. Our Army is less than thirty-eight thousand. It will be about thirty-six thousand on the 1st day of March.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well, then, shall we maintain thirty-six thousand men? And more than all that, shall we maintain officers enough for seventy-five thousand men, and staff officers enough for seven hundred and fifty thousand men? That is the point. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] does not seem to appreciate that there is not one word said in the bill reported by the committee about reducing the Army by one man. The President cannot reduce it under that bill by one man, let him do all he can. If an officer will not commit an offense for which he can be court-martialed, he cannot reduce it by one officer, because under the provisions of the present law he cannot dismiss an officer of his own motion for any cause. Therefore, this leads me to this question which it is for this House to determine and decide before the country. Will you muster out the officers that are not needed and the men that are not needed, or will you leave them in to draw pay and suck the blood of the country? If you take the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs you agree to keep them in; if you take my bill, then you have the means of getting rid of them. The bill of the committee provides no means of getting rid of them; mine does. The bill of the committee does not touch the pay; it leaves it with every allowance, every longevity ration, everything that is an abuse in the Army it leaves still an abuse. There is one other thing in which the bill of the committee differed from mine, and that is it proposes to consolidate three departments—the quartermaster's department, the subsistence department, and the pay department. Now, by a single clause, which I have put in my bill, I have done all that. I provide that the President may detail any staff officer to act in either of the staff departments and to consolidate two or more such departments at his discretion. There I am willing to leave him to his discretion. That is a proper place for the exercise of his discretion. If he thinks it best to detail one staff officer to pay and to buy quartermaster's stores and to buy commissary stores, be it so; let him consolidate as much as he pleases. There is where I will bow to his opinion and to the opinion of the Executive, whomsoever that Executive may be.

But upon the great constitutional privilege of the Commons, upon the great right that we have to say how much of an army we shall have, there I am very tender-footed when any officer of the Army undertakes to control my vote or my opinion. The king of England never yet dared send in to his Commons a recommendation how many troops he wanted—never; and for the reason that the Commons felt that they understood what was necessary for the liberties of the people of England.

Now, then, as I say, while I do not yield to any man in my respect for General Grant's opinion, when I see a difference of circumstances, when I see where he stands true to his craft, true to his calling, true to his brother officers and not recommending a reduction, which it would be unpleasant for him to do, to say the least, while I give all the weight to his opinion that it ought to have, yet as a man guarding the tax-payers, as a Representative of the people, seeing this country going deeper and deeper into debt; taking his other great and quite as glorious utterances "let us have economy," and finding that we can retrench, I am for retrenching by cutting off supernumerary officers.

Again, my friend from Ohio says you want an army in order to have honest elections in New Orleans. That was the effect of what he said. Well, we had an army there at the election last fall. Well, we had more men of the United States Army in New Orleans at the last election there than the general commanding there in 1862 had when he hung a traitor for tearing down the flag, and yet we had no peace in the one case and perfect peace in the other. It does not depend so much upon the numbers of the Army as upon who commands it. I undertake to say that the single voice of General Grant is more potent in New Orleans without any soldiers than any number of soldiers with an officer in command who advises the Republicans not to provoke a conflict by registering their votes. There is the difficulty, and not in the want of troops. Troops will not prevent murders and will not prevent riots in the South; that will require the hand of the civil magistrate, under the guardianship of the general.

Now, I have trespassed far too long upon the committee. I want to call the attention of the committee to a single further question, and I have done. Let me say to you that the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs seems to be only a skeleton on which to hang the Indian Bureau. It has been twice amended since it was presented. It has but three provisions. One is that the staff officers shall be reduced in number by consolidation—when they die or resign. The other is that the ordnance and artillery departments shall be put together and the officers mustered out—when they die or resign. That is all there is; that is the whole of it; the rest is Indians.

Now, when we come to vote we must take this matter up and deal with it intelligently. I desire the House, if they mean anything by this reduction, if they mean to have the Army reduced, to so act as to accomplish that purpose.

Gentlemen will remember that we discussed this matter on the 11th of July last, and we then ordered the Military Committee to bring in a bill for the reduction of the Army. But they never have brought that measure forward so that we could vote upon it. And now I desire a vote upon this question. We can take this substitute and have five minutes' debate upon it, and by amendments add one or more regiments or take off one more regiment, or to strike out an officer or to put in an officer. In that way full discussion can be had upon the bill and it may be perfected.

Now, will the committee adopt this system, or will you take a bill which gives you no system of reduction? That is a question on which members will vote according as they want economy or not.

Question of Privilege.

SPEECH OF HON. H. P. H. BROMWELL,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1869,

In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the resolutions that the House protest against the counting of the vote of Georgia by order of the Vice President pro tempore.

Mr. BROMWELL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The matter upon which I rise to speak to-night is that which recently created so much disturbance in this Hall. I wish, before speaking of the more important questions involved, to call attention to the particular matter which occasioned the disorder, a matter which has not been spoken of to any extent before the House. The disturbance which has been spoken of in such animated terms by the press and by Representatives on the floor, and stigmatized by two gentlemen from Ohio as the violence of a mob, or an exhibition of the spirit of hell, arose upon an appeal taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] from the decision of the Chair.

Concerning that appeal I will say that when the convention met we saw a President in the chair and three tellers. How came they there? Those who speak so much about the Constitution should take notice that the Constitution puts no man in the chair and makes no man a teller. By legislation of Congress, and that alone, was there any presiding officer over that convention. Every one has recognized the right of the Congress, from the beginning of the Government up to the present time, to fix the time at which the President of the Senate shall open the votes according to the Constitution, and the time and manner of counting the same. The Constitution has not devolved that duty upon any particular person, but the Congress, seeing the necessity that some provision should be made, has heretofore passed rules on that subject.

During the discussion that has sprung up on this occasion three different views of the nature of the convention have been put forth. Some have insisted that it was a joint convention; others simply that both Houses of Congress were present; others that members of the House and of the Senate were here as mere spectators, while the Vice President or President of the Senate was performing his functions.

Now, sir, I wish to say concerning the matter of that appeal and concerning the whole of that question that it is manifest to my mind that if any body of men be assembled together in the name of law, and charged with any functions whatever, they have certain inherent and necessary powers in order that they may first ascertain and know that they are the parties intended; and, secondly, there being an object for which they are convened, whether or not they are doing anything tending to accomplish the same, and whether or not they are doing it in the mode ordained. If they have not these powers they are the merest spectators, entirely supernumerary, and are in no sense a legislative, judicial, or executive body, an assembly wholly destitute of legal functions, and only useful as witnesses to the impotency of the law on an occasion so vital to the interests and existence of the Republic.

By the voice of the Constitution alone, according to the interpretation of some gentlemen here, the Vice President might have notified both Houses of Congress of the time and place when and where it would suit him that they should come and be present and see him count the votes. Under the interpretation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] the President of the Senate might assemble both Houses to witness his performance of counting the votes; and then, if he should choose to lay aside the vote of Pennsylvania, for instance, and say that in his opinion it was informal, that would be an end of it. Manifestly the Constitution contemplated no such result, but intended that there should be a count by a party responsible at once to the representatives of the people, who should be present competent to oversee and direct in the name and by the authority of the people. Who, then, are to count that vote under the Constitution aside from your laws? The two Houses by themselves or officers appointed to count for them. For what else are they to be present? Why be assembled? For, if the President of the Senate choose to do his work correctly and fairly, he can as well notify the public when he has finished it to his own satisfaction without any witnesses whatsoever, and if he should choose to play the despot and usurper he could do it clothed with the form of law as well in the presence of the powerless Houses of this Congress as by himself, and the whole provision of the Constitution would be utterly a nugatory.

But manifestly when the Constitution says that a count shall be made, having first assembled the Houses of Congress, it is intended that the Houses of Congress shall count, and they have shown this to be clearly the understanding of Congress by ordering tellers to do in their presence that which would be too inconvenient to be done by the whole body, and further by making the President of the Senate President of the assembly. The Constitution having made him the custodian of the budget of certificates, he is to bring forward those papers and do what? Open them in the presence of both Houses. And then when he has done that he has done all that the Constitution requires him to do, and from that moment the whole proceeding falls into the hands of the representatives of the people and of the States. His function under the Constitution is at an end when he breaks the seal; and the Congress has recognized this to be the law by the rule I have mentioned providing tellers. Who counts when a body of men are commanded to be present at a counting and nothing is said as to who shall count? Manifestly it means the body, and Congress has so recognized it by providing laws, and particularly by this twenty-second rule, which prescribes how and in what manner the count shall go forward. By fixing a definite time for the transaction of this business Congress has assumed jurisdiction to legislate on that subject, for Congress thereby takes from the President of the Senate the determination of the time when he would open the certificates, which power was by the Constitution left in the hands of the President of the Senate as much as the power to count. When Congress passed a law or a joint rule which provided that in a certain event the vote of a State should not be counted, they were then legislating on the subject and assuming control of it, and the Senate and the House on the occasion of this count this very week recognized this doctrine, for they transacted business in reference to Louisiana under that rule, and finally they transacted it in reference to Georgia itself under that rule. Take notice, sir, that the Senate left the Hall under that rule.

In fact the Senate went out under one statute and came back under another. They left the Hall because the President said that objection being made to counting the vote of Georgia under the rule the Senate would retire to deliberate upon it. It seems that after they went out they deliberated on the question whether the objection was in order or not; they deliberated on this because of the former joint resolution, till they decided that said resolution did not bind them to deliberate at all; and having decided said resolution not in force concerning Georgia, they came back into this House and announced to the House that the cause for which they went out did not exist, for the reason that a subsequent resolution controlled the case of Georgia; but still acting under the rule they held not to control the case, they then and there by their President announced to this House and to the Senate that the Senate had decided that the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts was out of order, and therefore he, the President of the Senate, for the reason that the Senate had so decided, held it out of order. Upon that statement by him that the Senate alone determined this question the gentleman from Massachusetts appealed from the Chair. To whom did he appeal? Of course he must have appealed to the body present, for clearly there could be no appeal from the chairman of a joint convention or any other assembly to either of the Houses. And yet the Constitution never could have meant that the Vice President should be an autocrat on that occasion. The Constitution never intended that John C. Breckinridge, then about to become a major general in the rebel army, might have sat in that seat and declared Abraham Lincoln not elected, by withholding the votes of New York and Pennsylvania and other States on motion of his own, and therefore absolutely overthrowing the Government without a struggle with arms. The men who framed the Constitution never contemplated that; and whatever casus omnis there may be in the provisions of that instrument touching this matter, it is manifest that they intended that the body assembled to count should know when it met whether it was the body intended, and whether it was proceeding in order to execute the order of the Constitution.

I know it is said, and perhaps it may be true, that the founders of the Constitution founded a double-headed, a hydra-headed assembly, which, being completely organized as both Senate and House of Representatives, sits at the same time and in the same place for the transaction of business. Manifestly such a body as that cannot do business in any manner. However plausible it may sound that two complete and separate organizations can sit down in the same Hall, everybody knows that as a matter of fact two organizations cannot transact business in the same Hall at the same time in any manner that would not reflect utter contempt and disgrace upon the entire proceeding. Would one body be passing upon the objection raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] while the other body was considering and determining a question of order arising out of that objection? Would one Presiding Officer be recognizing the Senators composing the body to which he belongs, and would the other Presiding Officer at the same time be recognizing the Representatives composing the other body to which he belongs? Why, sir, a confusion of Babel would be inaugurated by the overweening power of the Constitution.

There can be no doubt that the Constitution intended that the two Houses of Congress separately should regulate, by concurrent action, the law touching the mode and manner of counting the electoral votes; and that when assembled together they are so much of a joint convention that they can take notice whether they are there or not; that they can ascertain whether each House is there by roll-call or otherwise; that if the man presiding under the statute sees fit to grasp the whole power and take proprietorship of every rule of order, they can, by a right inherent in every assembly that ever sat, judge whether its own mouth-piece is speaking truly its own voice. How came the President of the Senate to be President of this joint convention? Does the Constitution say that he shall preside? Nay, the Constitution does not say that any man shall preside. Yet the manifest propriety of the officer who takes rank in other respects, taking the chair and presiding in the joint convention, has caused the law to prescribe that course. And the Senators are by courtesy provided with seats by themselves, when otherwise the members of the two bodies might be mingled together promiscuously.

Did the Constitution contemplate that the members of the Senate should leave the Hall of the joint convention and formally proceed to their own place of business every time any member of the joint convention should choose to raise a question of order? Plainly, if that were the case, they might never be able to count a single electoral vote, for as soon as they might return from deciding one question any member could raise another, and out would go the Senate, or perhaps the House be compelled to go, to decide it.

Did the framers of the Constitution ever contemplate the organization of a legal assembly so absurd and preposterous as this joint convention would be should that be the course they must pursue? Sir, such was not their intention. Their intention must have been that, under laws which Congress might frame in their separate bodies for the regulation of this matter, the inherent rights of a body assembled together for the transaction of public business should pertain to them when assembled for the purpose of counting the electoral votes, at least to an extent sufficient to enable those who are the counters on behalf of the people to know that they are counting.

There can be no doubt that the Vice President or Presiding Officer of the Senate presided over both bodies when assembled in joint convention by the consent and acknowledgment of every member of both Houses. They all recognize his duty to act as the Presiding Officer of the joint convention. The Speaker of the House himself commanded the members of the House in so many words to obey the orders of the President of the convention under penalty of arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House. Then, if the President of the Senate has such authority while sitting in the chair presiding over the joint convention that members of the House on this floor are to be arrested for not obeying his orders, it must be derived from some law. Not being provided for in the Constitution it must come from some law of Congress. And, clearly, if the laws of Congress can place the President of the Senate over the joint convention with powers of that description, clearly the laws of Congress can go further and clothe the joint convention itself with all the functions that are necessary, and without which all assemblies are but mockeries. That is, if it would be at all necessary to go further than to give a presidency with such powers to a convention in order to show that the body so presided over was a convention having all the inherent powers of such bodies in general.

And now I wish to say a few words in regard to the concurrent resolution which was passed on Monday last in relation to the electoral vote of the State of Georgia, and which controlled, in effect, the counting of her vote. Generally a member feels that an apology is due for his conduct if he is not present when important legislation takes place in the body to which he belongs. But upon this occasion I do think that I may esteem it rather creditable than otherwise that I was not present when such a resolution as that passed this body. It is a kind of draw-bridge resolution—that if Georgia be going up stream she may go through, but if she be going down stream she shall not go through. It is a fast-and-loose alternative, unworthy of the Representatives of a free people, or of any people that can maintain their freedom. The resolution said in fact to the world that we were afraid to throw out the vote of Georgia and afraid to count it, but that we would append it in this most preposterous manner to the tail end of the count. This was not simply an act of oppression in case the resolution were wrong; but an act which, whether right or wrong, is, let Georgia be what it may, an act of insult and contumely to the people of that Commonwealth, and this whether she be entitled to vote or not. To throw out the vote of a State contrary to law is an act of oppression; but to tie a State on in that manner to a count with an alternative that if she does not count she shall count, but if she counts she shall not count, is making sport not only of the people of such a State, but of the highest functions of Government. Hence I am very happy to state I was not present when this resolution was adopted by this House.

In the confusion that prevailed in the joint convention—for I think it is generally admitted that whatever thing was done that particular thing was not in order provided you could get at anything else that was in order—the Senate under the joint rule adopted in 1865 retired from the House to deliberate, and upon deliberating found that the joint resolution did not affect the case, and came back, and under that very resolution decided, and the President of the convention announced the decision, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was out of order. The decision rendered upon the return of the Senate was a decision under the twenty-second joint rule, and not under the concurrent resolution recently passed in reference to Georgia, and which the Senate said governed the case of Georgia. So that the Senate retired under one rule and decided under another, and then came back, and the decision of the Chair was announced under the former.

It is not to be wondered at that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in such a State of affairs, thought it would not be unreasonable to ask an appeal, for if all these things were in order I do not see why any kind of an appeal or other motion would not be in order also. Yet because, when the members of this House were told that the Senate had decided this matter for the joint convention, including the House, and for the country, there was excitement at the announcement, the House has been designated as a "mob," and we have been told about the "fell spirit" in which this thing was conducted. I, among others, had the honor to call upon the President on that occasion to state by what authority the appeal was not entertained, and thus, I presume, I became one of the "mob" and one of the "fell spirits" that at that time were horrifying the imagination of the gentlemen from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. GARFIELD.] All that was meant by the demonstration made at that time, as far as I understand, was that gentlemen of this House did not want this new doctrine that had come to light in so much confusion thrust down their throats by the gavel of the President of the Senate without at least some explanation on the subject. They were willing to submit to the common judgment, and under the very arguments that have been used against them all around the board, if that very question puzzled the President of the joint convention so that the two Houses had to separate and decide it separately according to the theory of those who are in favor of separate action, and that, too, according to this very same rule under which the Senate went out to deliberate, there was then no need that the appeal made by the gentleman from Massachusetts should have caused an uproar in the House, or a conflict between the House and the Senate, or the arrest of members on this floor. According to the theory of gentlemen who take opposite ground from mine, the two Houses still retain the power to settle that question by their separate action.

Looking at the state of the law and the rules, it is not to be wondered at that on the day the Houses recently met to count and declare the vote for President there should have been considerable excitement and disorder. The only matter of wonder is that there was so little. But if there is under the present rules reasons to apprehend disturbance in case of a counting, when the vote of a State put in question cannot in any way change the result, what must we expect in a case in which the vote of a single State would determine the result? And this very case might have happened on this occasion. A few thousand votes in Pennsylvania and a few other States changed in favor of Seymour and Blair would have made the vote of Georgia decisive. In such a case as that what would have been the scene here; and what would have been the action of our Democratic friends here who now sustain the acts of the President of the Senate? Could the supporters of either candidate for the Presidency have been controlled when they would have seen the result of the great canvass which cost so much time and money and roused every energy and passion of both parties finally disposed of in a summary manner, and in a way which the unsuccessful party would be sure to look upon as clear usurpation?

It is idle to argue the danger of such an occasion. Everybody can see that a terrible convulsion must be the result, not because the beaten party would complain of oppression, but because they would see in the mode by which their defeat had been accomplished nothing but absolute usurpation; and although it is possible to hold the American people in some order under great oppression within the forms of law, yet the least attempt at usurpation sets the whole community in a flame. In all cases in which powers are doubtful, as in this, any exercise of them against the interests of any portion of the community is held by them as clear usurpation.

Clearly, then, no presidential election can be peacefully settled under such provisions of law as we now have in case such a contest as I have supposed should arise concerning the vote of a State that would change the result. Nothing can be gained in this matter by a quarrel between the two Houses. Should they censure each other in the most ample manner it could do nothing toward avoiding future danger. It could do nothing toward providing proper security for coming elections.

In my opinion the constitutional provision is too uncertain; it is wholly defective, and the laws we have in aid of it make the matter worse, as was pointed out by the gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. BUTLER,] for where the Constitution left it uncertain what might be done, the joint rule comes in and provides that something shall be done wrong. This is manifestly the case in that provision which allows either House alone to forbid the counting of the vote of a State, instead of providing that it should require both Houses to prevent it.

In view of this state of things I have offered in this House an amendment to the Constitution providing that Congress may make laws covering the whole subject, and furnish proper officers to count, and also a proper tribunal to determine in all questions of dispute touching the legality of any vote. And I think that it is proper here, as was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] to call the attention of Congress and the country to this great defect in the framework of our Government. In fact, the Government is compelled every four years to pass through dangers, such as can only be compared to those of a ship passing through a narrow channel in which are sunken rocks, and no man knows, until she reaches them, how many they are or where they lie or how near to the surface of the waters. No man can tell what States may send up informal certificates, nor when, nor in what way they may be defective, nor what might be the effect of their rejection on the result of an election.

For this reason many members voted against laying on the table the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the substitute of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KELSEY,] as the substitute provided for future legislation on this very subject. Even if no collision should ever arise under the existing law, yet the law itself is clearly wrong, and holds out temptation to any dominant party in either House to defeat willfully, for partisan purposes, the clear will of the people. In case at any time a decision under this rule should change the result of an election it could not fail to happen that the law would be challenged at once as wholly unconstitutional; and the best answer that could be made in its defense would be that it probably is and probably is not—in either case it is wholly wrong and dangerous.

I wish, sir, to defend the action of members of this House against the aspersions thrown upon them from several quarters, and especially by those members of this House who saw proper to be very active in getting the whole subject out of the way. What could gentlemen expect to happen in such a case? The cause of disturbance came suddenly upon the House. In order that the whole House should submit quietly and with due subordination to whatever the Senate or its President or those who assume leadership in the House might think proper it would have been necessary to train the members of the House and instruct them until they could understand just what was to be required of them. They should have been informed precisely what would suit the proprietors of the public business, and thus put upon their good behavior, and after that if they proved refractory there would be great propriety in all those who might be offended administering a severe castigation.

But I insist that no pains were taken to put the House in a proper frame of mind, and hence the natural impulses of human nature under such circumstances impelled several members to act in a manner considered very "fell" and hellish, to wit, in a dissatisfied and insubordinate manner.

In saying these things I do not wish to censure the Senate. I would not vote for any resolution to that effect. First, because the House cannot censure the Senate. To censure is to punish, and presupposes some vitiorial, inquisitorial, or supervisory power in the party censuring, and the House has not such power in the least.

Secondly, the Senate did no wrong. What they saw proper to do in their own Hall is no business of ours, and in fact they only did just what we did; that is, to vote whether the vote of Georgia should be counted; and in this Hall they did nothing but take their seats in a quiet and decorous manner and remain in good order till they departed in good order.

The truth is the House can do nothing but grumble; first, at the President of the Senate for not allowing an appeal, and secondly at the Speaker for compelling obedience to his orders. But such a complaint would in fact only be a complaint against the uncertain and improper condition of the law, and the House can do far better by busying itself with plans to put the law in better condition.

I have nothing further to add but to express the hope that the House will not let this occasion pass without setting on foot some measures for the safety of the country in the future.

Death of Hon. Darwin A. Finney.

REMARKS OF HON. S. J. RANDALL,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 18, 1868,

On the resolutions announcing the death of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY.

Mr. RANDALL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: During a period of six years as a member on this floor the present is the third time I have been called upon to speak a few parting words of respect to the memory of associates. This time death has selected as its victim one who was my warm friend, although of different political opinions. Mr. FINNEY was my sincere friend, and that friendship was mutual.

I first became acquainted with him in January, 1858. He was a member of our State Senate when I entered that body as a member from Philadelphia. For two years we lived in the same house, and of course the opportunity was given me of knowing the man and of studying his character.

He was slow in forming attachments, but when formed they were firm, and he was ever at the command of those to whom he was so attached. In fact, where he liked he liked strongly.

He was of a generous nature both in his sentiments and in his acts. He always allowed those who differed with him in opinion, whether on public matters or in private affairs, credit for honesty of motive, and he never would see a friend suffer for the want of what he possessed, if its gift would contribute to his comfort. He was of a nervous disposition, sometimes taciturn. This was, I think, attributable to a seated disease—gout.

As a legislator he was upright and possessed a mind of rare culture and balance. During my stay in the Senate—for he was there before and after me—he was the intellectual peer of any man in it; and among the number then composing that body, I may mention the venerable William Wilkins, who, as a Senator of the United States from my State, as American minister at the court of St. Petersburg, and as Secretary of War under President Tyler, occupies a conspicuous space in the history of our country; Thomas S. Bell, who had been chief justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, was there a member at the same time; our present able and distinguished Senator, Mr. BUCKALEY; Titian J. Coffey, since assistant attorney general of the United States; Mr. SCOFIELD, now here, and others of approaching intellect, were leading spirits in the body. Mr. FINNEY coped successfully with all.

As a logical reasoner or as an expounder of the law he had few superiors. His views were always freely spoken without regard to those with whom they came in conflict. He never catered to public opinion; never yielded to policy, and was altogether unmindful of temporary popularity if it required him to step aside from what he deemed right. He was ever ready in debate; and was sometimes, if provoked, severe in sarcasm. In fact, he was one of the ablest legislators who ever came under my notice.

He took great interest in the revision of our penal code, and both in the Judiciary Committee and in the Senate, proposed many wise reforms.

His friends had great hopes of his usefulness and his power in this House, but disease had taken full possession of him, and after being in his seat but a few days his physician directed for him an entire cessation from mental and physical exertion. Under advice he traveled abroad, but it was of no avail; he gradually grew worse, and finally yielded up his spirit in a foreign land, away from his home and his friends. His wife was with him until the last, and ministered to his every want with care unceasing, and with a tenderness which is known only to woman.

It would be well for us to contemplate and understand this renewed warning of our end, so that we may struggle to make the future of our lives blameless; for there can be none here who having gone thus far in the pathway of life that can fail to recognize and realize the fact that this is a world where pleasures fade, hopes are delusive, and friendships perish.

Reduction of the Army.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM A. PILE,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 18, 1869.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870—

Mr. PILE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The question of the reduction of an army after a war has always given rise to earnest and excited debate both in this country and in England; and especially has the disposition of the officers rendered supernumerary by such reduction given rise to difference of opinion and to careful and earnest consideration and discussion. After the continental war under William and Mary, for several sessions of Parliament a large portion of the time was given to the discussion of the military establishment of that country, the fixing of the peace establishment, and the disposition to be made of the large number of officers appointed in the army during that war. The same thing occurred in this country after the revolutionary war and the war of 1812. This is one of the most important considerations involved in the question now before us.

Two propositions have been presented. I propose to confine what I have to say in the limited time given me to a consideration of the points of difference between the proposition reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the proposition offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on the subject of the pay of the Army. Two thirds of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] last evening was devoted to this simple topic; and it was presented as the main point of difference between the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and his own proposition; representing, as I understood him, all the time that the Military Committee opposed and antagonized any change in the present system of paying the Army. I undertake to say for myself, and I think for the balance of the committee, that such is not the fact; that the facts brought out so elaborately and distinctly with reference to the system of paying the Army had been collected and were in the hands of the Military Committee of this and the previous Congress; and that the gentleman's proposition is substantially the proposition prepared by the committee and presented to the Thirty-Ninth Congress by the chairman, [Mr. SCHENCK.] And, sir, the only reason why the committee did not incorporate this feature in their bill was because they understood the House to give them the privilege only to bring in a bill for the reduction of the Army, and did not understand it was the will and desire of the House that they should embrace any question in reference to the pay of the Army. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] afterward, perhaps without much attention being paid to it, had permission to bring in his proposition in regard to pay.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this system of paying the Army by stated salary instead of the present cumbrous and absurd system. With some modification as to details in the gentleman's proposition in reference to the pay of the Army I shall favor and vote for its incorporation in the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. This disposes of the point of difference to which a large part of the speech of the gentleman was devoted last evening. This section can be incorporated in the proposition of the Military Committee without any conflict with its provisions; but precisely in harmony with the language of the bill.

The first material point of difference between the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts and that reported from the Military Committee is as to whether the Army shall be reduced at a fixed and stated time peremptorily and absolutely, or whether some discretion as to the time of reduction shall be left in the hands of the President of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Where does the gentleman provide for that discretion? Mr. PILE. In the first section of the bill, as follows:

After the 31st of March the President of the United States is authorized to reduce the Army as the necessity of the public service will permit and to the extent and in the manner prescribed.

In addition to the well-timed and, I think, cogent remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLARARGER] last evening in reference to the impropriety of providing now absolutely by law for the immediate reduction of the Army, I desire to call attention to a table prepared this morning at the Adjutant General's office, which shows there are now on duty in Texas alone, under General E. S. Canby, six thousand troops for the preservation of order and for the protection of Union men from the bitterness and animosity of the rebel element in that State, that State being as yet unreconstructed. I tell gentlemen that that State will not be under the control of a loyal State government for months to come, and he who expects the bitterness, animosity, hatred, and malignancy of the rebel element there to pass away as the morning cloud and early dew from the simple fact that General Grant has been elected President will find himself much mistaken. It is perfectly clear to me that until there is a loyal State government there, until the sheriffs, constables, justices of the peace, and judges of the court are loyal men, we need these men to preserve order and protect Union men. There are now over three thousand men on duty also in the State of Louisiana. So that I think it will be wiser now, under the present circumstances, to leave the precise time of this reduction to the counsels of the Administration that is to come into power on the 4th of March next.

The next particular difference between the two bills—that reported by the Military Committee and that submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts—to which I wish to direct attention, is the provisions with reference to the staff. Now, the bill submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts provides that the staff shall be reduced one half. To any person who looks carefully into the subject it will be apparent at once that some of these staff departments can be reduced materially; but others cannot, in justice to the public service and the public interest, be reduced at all. The engineer's department, for instance, with the large amount of duty required of them now in the control and prosecution of the various public works, in the improvement of rivers and harbors, having now to employ civil engineers to do the work required of them by the laws of Congress—to reduce the engineer corps one half would be simply to dismiss a portion of that corps and pay out as much or more money in the employment of civil engineers to do the work absolutely required by the demands of commerce and the interests of the country.

Again, this bill requires that there shall be a reduction of one half in the several grades in the staff departments. Now, this is simply ridiculous. In some of these grades there is but one officer; will you attempt to reduce it by one half of an officer? In others there are three; you must of necessity reduce it either by one third or two thirds. In others there are five; you must reduce it by two fifths or three fifths. The provision for the reduction of the several grades by one half is crude, indigested, and impracticable.

Then, sir, the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs provides for the reduction of the infantry regiments to thirty, and no reduction in the cavalry and artillery. Now, sir, I agree with what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said as to the courage of the volunteer army, as to the promptness of the people to come to the rescue whenever there is danger in any quarter, and I honor the State he represents in part for their wonderful promptness in sending regiments to the national capital in the hour of peril in 1861.

But the House will bear in mind that while you can improvise infantry regiments, composed of men taken from civil life, who know how to load and fire a musket, you cannot improvise artillery soldiers. And under the present system of artillery warfare, with the improvements made in the use of guns of various kinds, it is demonstrated that you can sink any vessel that floats with two or three well-directed shots. So that in case of war with any foreign nation our defense will depend mainly upon such obstruction in the channel as will compel vessels of war to go into the harbors adjacent to our cities, so as to come within the range of the guns of our forts, and then with skillful, educated, and efficient artillery any vessel that is or can be built can be destroyed before it reaches any of our cities on our coast. I think to reduce the artillery when it is known that the artillery service cannot be improvised, to make skillful artillery soldiers you must have passed months and years in drilling, training, and study, so that the science of gunnery and the knowledge of the different kinds of munitions may be thoroughly understood, would at this time be disastrous. And while there is continued disturbance on the borders, and continued probability of war with the Indians, there will be, as stated by all the general officers in the recent examination made before the Military Committee, an absolute necessity for every cavalry soldier now in the service.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment—Mr. Fowler.

Now, sir, one word with reference to the main question at issue, the principal bone of contention as between the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts and that of the Military Committee, namely, the disposition to be made of the supernumerary officers by the proposed reduction of the number of regiments. I wish to call attention for a moment to the plan proposed by the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It provides for the assembling of a board of examiners. This board is to consist of three general officers, three officers of infantry, two cavalry officers, two of artillery, one officer of the Adjutant General's department, one officer of the engineer department, one officer of the ordnance department, one officer of the quartermaster's department, one officer of the subsistence department, and one officer of the pay department, and one of the medical department, making in all sixteen officers. It then provides that it shall be the duty of this board—

"To inquire into and consider the capacity, character, record of services, and fitness to be continued in the military service of every officer below the grade of general who may be in the Army at the time of the passage of this act. And the council shall for this purpose be furnished with all information, papers, documents, records, and evidence they may require from the War Department; and the council shall furnish a report of their conclusions to the Secretary of War."

And after that personal examination into the character, services, records, and history of two thousand eight hundred officers, each officer who receives a two-thirds vote of this council of sixteen officers is to be placed on the list of officers that are to be retained in the service of the United States, and those officers who have not received that vote are to be allowed to come before this council of officers with rebutting testimony, and then the council are to summon witnesses and examine them; and after all that is done the consolidation is to commence.

Now, sir, I submit that such a council of officers as is here provided for will consume one whole year in the preliminary examination, and that not less than five years will be consumed in hearing and determining the cases of officers called before the council for personal examination. So that the gentleman's boasted reduction of the Army, so far as the official force is concerned, will be no reduction at all.

The measure, if it becomes a law, will simply result in embarrassing the Administration, breaking up the present Army organization, and rendering it inefficient and worthless, without any corresponding reduction in the expenses of the people. Who ever heard of an army organization being summarily cut in two and one half thrown out with no regard being paid to the symmetry or efficiency of the organization? This would be an achievement certainly brilliant and original, unique and unapproachable. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has won many distinctions, some of them, at least, enviable, but this would be a triumph absurd and ridiculous, unequalled by anything within my remembrance on the subject of army legislation. I hope this House will not adopt the substitute. If time is to be given to perfect a measure in detail on this subject the bill of the committee, with such amendments as may be made in Committee of the Whole, is infinitely better than the substitute.

I desire, in conclusion, to restate the opinion I expressed when this subject was permitted to be introduced, that no detailed measure for the reduction of the Army can become a law this session; and in that case I shall favor the adoption of the brief proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE.]

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. S. FOWLER,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 8, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. FOWLER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Senate Judiciary Committee have reported the following form of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

The right of the citizen of the United States to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

It has been alleged that this is the consummation of the reforms inaugurated by the rebellion, and is to be the crowning glory of that grand event; that freedom will thus be established throughout the whole land. If this or any other measure would produce so desirable a reform it should meet the generous approval of all.

It may become a grave question whether this amendment and the manner in which it is to be made will produce any such a desirable result. When reformatory reforms come from the individual through the neighborhood and the State to the General Government they are likely to become salutary and permanent. If on the contrary they begin with the Government and are extended by the authority of the nation over the individuals it becomes a question, and a very important one, whether the measure should meet the approval of the country.

Our institutions are based on the virtue, intelligence, and will of the people. The Government is but the expression of the popular will, which is the concurrence of a majority of the individuals speaking through the forms of law prescribed by them. The action of Congress is the termination of the process, not the beginning. It is always hazardous to reverse the method.

The report from the committee seeks to alter the fundamental law in a material form, and that without expressing any positive principle. The Constitution has heretofore served so admirably the object for which our fathers made it, without any very evident reason for its change, that the propriety of any alteration might well be questioned. If an amendment should be deemed by the people necessary it should be some well-defined positive principle. The present form is only privative. It seeks to place restraints upon the States. It rests upon no basis of its own. It is founded in no assertion of principle. Several amendments have been offered much superior to the one urged so persistently on the Senate. The amendment I have had the honor to offer is in my judgment not liable to this objection. It is the clear, positive announcement of a principle. I shall claim the attention of the Senate to this hereafter.

Considering the great liberty of our people, the elasticity of our institutions, it is far from safe to place all that may be desired in an inflexible constitutional amendment. It is difficult to alter or repeal such a law. It demands two thirds of Congress and the concurrence of three fourths of the States to alter or amend. This is difficult to obtain, indeed can rarely be done. When it comes to act heavily upon the people there will be a tendency to revolution; and all such laws must act harshly upon society if not made in strict harmony with the genius and spirit of the people. It might seem that it must always be in strict harmony with the people when it requires so large a majority of Congress and the States to adopt it. This would always be the case if the measure were first referred to the people and the members of Congress and the State Legislatures were elected on such an issue. If, however, reforms are introduced into Congress and then into the Legislatures on issues not involved in the canvass when these bodies were elected, majorities may readily be obtained that do not express the popular will.

It is a question of grave consideration whether there is any demand for an alteration of the Constitution. If under that instrument all the rights of the individual can be secured and protected without such an amendment it might be just as well to leave the framework of the Government where our fathers left it. If the measure is clearly the will of the people it will at once pass into State constitutions and meet the approval of the popular voice, which is much more likely to secure the certain and harmonious operation of the principle among the people. It is not in the nature of human society to advance the popular operation of institutions out of harmony with the voice of the people. When the public mind has arrived at a certain condition of advancement, when it has come to the recognition of its own worth, it at once becomes the law of society, and no effort of any part of the body can alter or destroy the practical fulfillment of that law; nor can it return so long as the people retain their integrity and love of liberty. There is no reversing a principle that has become one of the unwritten laws of the social constitution. The substitution of an individual or a party dictum for a divine truth does not make it so nor does it insure for any great time the successful operation of the desired rule. Human pride and egotism very frequently declare mere convictions arising out of selfishness as the law of God. The advocates of good measures and genuine reforms are not often the seers who foresaw their good and success and set in motion the slumbering element of life. They are more frequently the mere slaves of party, valuable it may be, believing themselves the ministers of heaven, but still the dull pack-horses of a blind self-adulation and love of power and gain.

The powers confided to the General Government have thus far proved adequate for all purposes of peace and war. Our population has steadily increased from three to thirty-five million men. From thirteen sparsely scattered colonies on the shores of the Atlantic, they have poured like a resistless torrent over the Alleghenies, across the great valley of the Mississippi, and filled it from the lakes to the Gulf. Where, but a few years ago, roamed the wild buffalo and his still wilder master and companion, the Indian; where no civilized voice had ever cheered the undisturbed solitude of nature, now flourish cities far more opulent and possessing a commerce far greater than Tyre or Carthage or Damascus. Nor is this all; this living flood has crossed the sterile barriers of the Rocky mountains, and settled on the distant shores of the great Pacific ocean. There, on sands richer than those of the fabled Pactolus, majestic cities are stretching their broad wings across the shoreless ocean and commanding the commerce of the oldest empire on the globe. The wealth of India begins now to pour its treasures into the channels of American enterprise. Our territory has spread wider and wider as the resistless tide of population has pressed forward. By the acquisition of Louisiana, Florida, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California, and finally Russian America, vast empires of territory far surpassing its original limits have been added to the Republic. The Constitution has carried us through three wars, the last war with England, the war with Mexico, and the great rebellion. The last has been without exaggeration the most sublime exhibition of human passion and ferocity the world has ever recorded in its blood-stained annals.

With our progress in population and territory our attainments in the useful arts have kept pace; no other people have made so many and so useful discoveries. Education has been extended and impressed upon the whole land as a part of the nation's life and function. Manufactures have risen as intelligence has advanced and commerce has been the necessary result of our progress and luxuriant soil.

As the nation has advanced in all the material elements the personal liberty of the citizen has been equally extended. Slavery has ceased, and the former slave freed from his shackles has become a citizen, and a full and complete one, clothed with all the privileges of the most favored classes. The people who were once the owners and masters of the African races now acquiesce in the decision of the war.

In all the former slave States that seceded from the Union suffrage of the negro is secured. In Missouri, Kentucky, Delaware, and Maryland only of the slave States he has not been enfranchised. There is a general conviction of its propriety and correctness among the people. No more can he become a slave. Never again could he be deprived of his right to the ballot. This is the decision of the popular mind, and is far stronger than a constitutional amendment.

There are other and graver considerations that induce me to hesitate in making a partial and inadequate amendment to the Constitution. The genius of the people, as expressed through the framework of our Government, should not be rudely assailed in times of unusual excitement and party centralization. The tendency of all strong parties that have been long in power is to derive their power from one source. They readily look to a center, move from it, and conform their action to one will. No party can in its nature avert such a result. Material considerations far outweigh all mere moral and intellectual forces in the control of a large and triumphant political party. In the formation of such organizations, where they are without power and contending for a principle, it requires the inspiration of moral and intellectual forces to produce the desired result. The end attained, and human nature triumphs over the still small voice of conscience and the reign of right. Power in the hands of a great party is far more dangerous than in the hands of one man, whom the force of responsibility tends constantly to check in its improper exercise. On the contrary, there is no sense of responsibility among the many. The rash and strong-willed communicate their force to those who readily conform in all such organizations and thus the power of the leader accumulates as it extends to the mass. Personal individuality is lost in the mass, which soon learns, as an army, to obey one will when the power of the organization is complete. This is the end of civil liberty, unless the barriers of the Government can interpose for the protection of the minority and the preservation of the individual. It seldom happens that the feeble restraints of institutions can avert the force of such an organization if there is any tendency to revolutionize, alter, or amend them in the interest of those wielding the power. To the love of power and place in the leader is added the love of party organization in the follower, who, if tardy in his movements or obstinate in his will, is lashed into conformity by the whip of his fealty to his faith by political and social ostracism, by partiality, injustice, and tyranny.

There is no protection against the voracious maw of this monstrous power but a firm reliance upon the principles of the Government. If these safeguards are broken down in the interest of the ruling power, anarchy, war, and despotism—organized despotism—will inevitably succeed the overthrow of our liberties. Monarchical Governments may and do modify their forms and become republican and democratic, but democratic Governments fall inevitably into the hands of factious parties, and finally into the power of a despot. When a party becomes the governing authority, instead of the constitution and laws of a State, the liberties of the citizen have already been overthrown, for the action of the party is the will of a few, if not one. The Federal Government has been organized to guard against the force of party organizations. Our fathers did not fear the direct action of an individual but his indirect and greater power exerted through the multitude. They divided the Government into many departments and built up many pillars and counteracting agencies. The waves of the ocean have to roll over shoals and breakwaters before they can enter the tranquil bay; so the impulses of the party have to pass over many barriers before they are divested of their destructive power and made a part of the peaceful and just laws of the State. In its organic structure it is not a union of the people alone nor of the States alone. It is a union of the States as States and also of the people and the whole people. The States are united in the nature of a confederacy and the whole people in the nature of a nationality. The nation as based on the solidarity of the people is limited to powers necessary to maintain the rights and relations of the people to foreign nationalities. It can act directly on the people within the sphere of its granted powers, without the action of the States, for national and specified purposes. There are two other classes of powers it may not touch. The powers granted to the States by the people and the powers still retained by the people are beyond the reach of the powers of the Federal Government. These, by far the largest class of powers, are reserved as checks upon the national power and as guardians of the rights of the individual and society.

The powers of the nation are in their nature centralized and consolidated. These have a tendency to draw to them a constant accumulation, and if such tendency were not counteracted by opposite forces would soon terminate in one central despotism. It is the centripetal force, and to preserve the system must be balanced by an equal and self-adjusting centrifugal force. That force has been provided in the independent and equal States which enter into the system. The reserved rights and jealous watchfulness of the people under the deliberate exercise of their judgment will regulate the action of these two forces in our system. There can be no union without these two counteracting forces harmonize and balance each other. A union must be composed of individuals acting from a voluntary assent to one general principle. That assent is obtained from a mutual perception of its general good in order to produce harmonious action. The consent of the individual must be obtained not by force but by reason. It must not be anticipated or presupposed, enacted into law and then enforced. This would be the application of the sponge to our boasted system. If one section moves faster than another it cannot impose its imagined excellence on the other. The national system and its several distinct, equal, and independent parts make up one great harmonious system, the American nation. The Constitution of the United States and the laws are a part of the constitution and laws of the several States; and reciprocally the constitution and laws of the States are part of the Constitution and laws of the United States. These all make up our national unity. It is of all Governments the most complex in its nature and demands the greatest amount of intelligence and the highest civilization for its preservation.

There is in our Government the absence of all sovereignty. That term has no place in our system, which rests on authority conferred by the people and States in the character of a power of attorney to an agent. Ours is but a system of agencies, with well-defined and distinctly limited authorities. Great confusion will result from attributing to the Government so imposing a name as sovereignty and then deducing from it powers which such a term carries with it in other and despotic States. We should, therefore, spurn this error of the feudal times so carefully rejected by our fathers. This is of far more importance than we may at first suppose. The great power, moral and physical, augmented by the pride, vanity, and natural spirit of domination of the officers of the Government, is of itself centralizing and dangerous. When you attempt to hedge this around with such an imposing divinity as that of sovereignty the religious feelings of the people are entwined around it without reference to liberty or justice. The sovereignty and divinity of the individual is lost amid the glory of a nation. When the sanctity and worth of a human spirit, walking in rags and racked by poverty and toil, are placed in the scale with the grandeur of a nation's power, liberty and right are infinitely small. The glory of our Government does not reside in its power, its gorgeous Capitol, its vast extent of territory, its Army, its Navy, its merchant princes, but in the sanctity and the inviolability of the individual. While the citizen is powerful and the Government subjected to his rights, interests, and voice, liberty is safe. When the Government becomes more sacred than the man, freedom has ceased to regulate its action or dwell in its borders. A splendid Government with sovereign powers has attracted the adoration of men in other lands and in all ages, but a Government in which the rights, worth, and dignity of the citizen have been worshiped, has been but half developed in the history of human society. If this should fail the boasted progress of humanity is but a name, and all the sacrifices in behalf of our institutions but the blood-stained footprints of the murderers of men. May virtue and love of humanity avert so terrible a fate to the sacrifices of our illustrious ancestors and contemporaries. Let their glorious deeds be embalmed forever in the hearts of men ever becoming more sensitive to the love of human rights and dignity.

The altars at which we sacrifice are not those of power. That is but a Juggernaut that has rolled over humanity for centuries, crushing out life and hope for ages. The free American bows to none but God, his creator and preserver. He knows nothing else higher than man. The humblest infant that breathes is above all Governments and all officers, be they Presidents or emperors.

It is the adoration of power that marks the institutions of the East. The purest of all those forms is that of China. There there is but one free being, the emperor, the representative of the divine, the infinite, and immutable. The people are all equals because all slaves. Under its organization the individual is absorbed in the universal. There dull monotony loves to linger. There the civilization, arts, manufactures, and agriculture, although carried to a high degree of perfection, have remained unchanged for ages. As the sun of intelligence arose in more western horizons the human mind gradually became conscious of its character and the spirit became emancipated from the thraldom of matter and asserted the freedom of the individual. As a consequence of this, Greece, the first to recognize personal supremacy, became a free government of free and independent States. She remained free so long as the States maintained their individuality. When the strong arm of the Macedonian king was laid heavily upon them, molding them into one great empire, the liberties of Greece, with all its universe of beauty, art, oratory, history, and philosophy, passed to the domain of history. So must the increase of a central power too great for the centrifugal force of the States affect our Government.

The freedom of the individual depends on the all-absorbing love and sympathy of one individual for another. The playmates of our boyhood hours never cease to command our affection and our aid. Our neighbors and associates are better calculated to protect our rights than strangers who know us not. Hence the right of trial by jury. It gives to the citizen the right of being judged by those who best know his character and his motives and who feel more disposed to extend justice tempered with mercy to him. States are divided into counties and districts the better to guard the rights and interests of the people. For the same reason the Republic must be divided into local State governments.

The national officials execute their duties without sympathy or restraint. The citizen of Maine cannot feel properly for the people of Texas; and the reverse of this is also true. Our institutions have fenced around the liberties of the citizen with all possible safeguards and barriers. Not power, but reason, interest, and affection should govern. To send foreign judges into a State or community, or to remove the citizen to distant States for trial, would contradict and overthrow all the ends of our institutions. Governments have never fallen from the power of the citizen in the State, but from the centralization of power in the prince or in a body.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NYE. What better protection to human liberty do you propose to give than the ballot?

Mr. FOWLER. I will endeavor to show the honorable Senator from Nevada that I am in favor of giving the ballot to every citizen. No individual of mature years and sane mind can be righteously controlled without his or her consent to the political force that is to govern him or her. While I maintain the inviolability of the individual, I do not forget that the States have an existence and rights and a function in our Government. They fill a place, and a very important one in our institutions. They were organized and preserved there by our fathers, and there they must remain while civil liberty has an advocate. When the national Government has attracted all power to it the States will cease to exist, and with them the rights and liberties of the citizen. As long as they maintain their course the system will move on in harmony. As I adore the rights and dignity of the individual I would maintain the guardian that preserves these rights. I would preserve the jewel by preserving the casket in which it is inclosed. Other republics have risen and flourished, other peoples could boast of their liberty and free institutions, their power and all conquering enterprise. They have all passed from the roll of nations and are now known only by the historian. They felt as confident in their capacity to preserve forever their liberties as the American. They yielded day by day to the seductions of ambitious demagogues and the corroding influences of wealth and vanity until the organic structure of their government was completely undermined. While a nation preserves a sacred veneration for the wisdom and virtues of its founders it is secure; when they cease to remember these they have fallen.

The founders of the American nation were thoroughly conversant with the art of government. They had studied profoundly all the writers of ancient and modern times. To their great learning they brought a large and sad experience in all that could instruct and qualify man for a profound understanding of the institutions necessary to protect and preserve his liberty. Adversity, the great teacher, had been their constant companion. It had wrung from them all that men naturally endow with the highest gifts of intellect and wisdom were capable of producing. Their works are treasures of wisdom clothed in a style never excelled for clearness, force, and elegance. The wisest and richest statesmen of England have done homage to their worth and talents. The greatest men of our Republic that have succeeded them have always turned with reverence to their counsels. Having taken my lessons in reference to the framework of the Republic from the writings of those who founded it, I am unwilling now to reject their advice or to treat lightly their great labors. The people of this Republic have not forgotten the labors of their ancestors nor ceased to venerate their great work. Having through life bowed in humble adoration to the sacred rights of the individual, I have always advocated his right to the exercise of the ballot. I have advocated the most enlarged and Christian duty of the State to guaranty this right to the citizen. I desire now to give some reasons why all men should have the ballot.

The question is not without grave objections, and has not been submitted to the test of experience in any Government. The principle has long been settled, so far as the Anglo-Saxon race is concerned, that taxation without representation is unjust and oppressive. After a gradual progress in the light of republican institutions the great majority advocate the right of the white man to the ballot. The doctrine that the colored races should exercise the same prerogative has not so generally been admitted. I will endeavor to set forth the reasons that have influenced many to oppose their enfranchisement and the reasons that have operated on others to favor the principle. The chief arguments for and against it are directed toward the negro race. I will therefore make my argument mainly with reference to this race.

The natural pride of race, always active and strong, particularly in the English race, would not readily brook the idea of equality even in political rights. The debased condition of one race has intensified this feeling. There are many persons who distrust the capacity of the individual for self-government. There are comparatively few persons who really believe that each individual of the higher races understands best his own interests. It is not uncommon to find the most profuse eulogists of humanity insisting upon impressing their own convictions or views upon the legislation of the country, utterly unwilling to trust the decision of the people.

The influence of party associations and triumphs control the action of a very great number, and often retard salutary reforms in society and government. The enfranchisement of the colored races has acted upon this class with the cumulative force of party and personal prejudice and selfishness. There are very many influenced by what they regard as special disqualifications in the negro race. His long servitude to the white race, his barbarism in his native country from the dawn of his existence, the fact that he has of himself made no advancement in science, religion, or the art of government beyond the rudest known to humanity all tend to impress the white race unfavorably.

These are substantial facts that stand forth as almost irresistible arguments against incorporating the colored African races into the body-politic of the Republic. They are arguments that only experience, education, and the successful use of the ballot can answer. Eloquent homilies on the rights of men, earnest appeals in favor of human brotherhood, will do no good. Men long admit the truth of proposition before they become a part of their lives. Human philosophy and religion has advanced none in its dogmas for two thousand years. Plato is at present more powerful in his principles than he was eighteen hundred years ago. The precepts of Christianity were just as clearly defined and quite as well illustrated eighteen hundred years ago as they are to-day. Since these epochs there have been no discoveries in the duties pertaining to humanity. It is true that the world of mankind has made very rapid advances in learning and reducing to practice principles long since discovered, but no new discoveries have been made. It will require many generations to pass before the race has reduced to actual life the precepts of the past. It is now actual, living action that benefits the world. It is not principle but conduct that can now benefit mankind.

Having long advocated the doctrine announced in the Declaration of Independence, believing in its truth and obligation, I desire to offer some reasons for the course I have taken on the question. I do not offer them to others who have loudly professed the doctrine as applicable to States in which they did not reside, but wholly unsuited to their own people. The prejudice of race and demands of party never asserted themselves so openly and so inconsistently as they have on the present question. These feelings have been carried so far as to place the ancient civilization of the Chinese, marked by its centuries of conquests in arts, science, literature, and philosophy as beneath the intellectual and moral deserts of Africa, more cheerless and barren than her burning sands, in which no green plant has ever appeared.

When the prejudice of race can go so far as to obliterate the wonderful results of that people it may not be astonishing to find men advocating the suffrage of the African for South Carolina and spurning it for Ohio. The Chinese have proved themselves competent, not only to maintain civil institutions in their own land, but to maintain them for centuries extending far beyond the period of history known to western civilization, without a shadow of variation. The African is without any development in his own land, indeed without the conscious recognition of himself or his relations to the universe. He is without history, the embryo of humanity. He is still a man, and when brought under the influence of the highest civilization in history he has rapidly developed in that direction, passing at a bound over centuries of human struggle and human development. He has now reached the confines of the highest civilization and made it his own. If he has attained that place slowly and by much suffering and oppression he is abundantly compensated for his sorrow. In his process of development it must be conceded that every institution designed for his elevation was to him a sealed book. The great civilizing agent, the only nurse of religion, honor, faith, and manly virtue, the family, was forbidden to him. An inexorable public opinion doomed all to a life of sensuality. It was the boast of slavery that it produced people without shame, because without the sentiment of virtue. Under the "divine institution" the higher sentiments of humanity were extinguished in theory. If the angel of darkness had produced his master-piece for the extirpation of every sentiment of good from the human soul, he could not have excelled the matchless device of American slavery. In its vocabulary there was no such words as father, mother, wife, child, brother, sister, or home. Fortunately for them and us the love of virtue is too strongly implanted in the soul to be utterly extinguished by any form of oppression. In defiance of the relentless system these people have proved themselves possessed of extraordinary insight into the character of the times and the part they were destined to take. They exhibited fidelity, courage, and patriotism in every emergency. Their kindness, forgiveness, and moderation have never been excelled. Their anxiety to educate their children and the progress they have made in that laudable undertaking entitles them to respect. From the good they will receive it, from the wicked they may not hope. More than two hundred years of toil, an empire redeemed from the forest and filled with wealth and luxury from the sweat of their brows, vast cities built and innumerable rivers made alive by the hum of commerce that covered oceans by well-loaded ships, are the evidences of their labor. These facts alone entitle them to the consideration and protection of the Government. They are debased. What of that? Are they more so than those who have oppressed them? If their minds are unenlightened they are not so dark as those of the men that enslaved them, or those who have approved of their enslavement. The most benighted of all human beings is he who does the greatest wrong. This institution was not alone the expression of an African civilization. It found in the American heart a ready home. It is rather the exponent of English cupidity and love of power. If the institution and its victims are degraded that degradation has been cherished by those who founded, maintained, and tolerated the institution.

But who is responsible for the unworthiness of the humble classes of all races? If vice and ignorance are found in the cottage you need not search the palace for perfection. If crime abounds in the ranks of the lowly you will not find saints among the higher. If the cottage and workshops are filled with ignorance and error the university and the church are far from perfection. Nor do I charge those immediately interested in the institution as its best friends and ablest defenders. On the contrary, among them often appeared the most elevated and refined of humanity. They were but parts of the political and social unit, and no worse than their companions and their fellow-citizens elsewhere. If the school-house, the family, and the Halls of Congress had been free in fact, slaves would never have cursed the rice-fields of Carolina. It was the spirit of American society that plied the lash in the cotton plantations of Mississippi. The love of gain, so powerful in the American mind, has not yet been extinguished by the overthrow of slavery. It is as active now, blocking up every avenue to a more enlarged and purer freedom, as before. It seeks now to bind the whole laboring element and drive them to toil for its luxury and pleasure.

This argument is the ever changing one that has opposed the enfranchisement of the masses in all ages. It is human pride and ignorance against freedom and light. Men do not readily part with power and prerogative when they have once gained it. The most stolid prince pretends to treat as inferior all who do not enjoy his rank. He does not yield a part of his authority and place to those who have not been so highly favored without a struggle. It is just as true of an American citizen who assumes all the airs of princes when brought in antagonism with those they have looked upon as their inferiors. The same arrogant, dark, malignant spirit works now that has opposed the progress of the masses in other ages and in other times. It has filled the history of the world with all its civil wars and persecutions. The effort of a part of humanity to rise, and the determination of the other to subject them to their wills, has ornamented the shores of time with the ashes of ruined cities and empires overthrown.

The battle has all been between the despots and the slaves. I care not by what name you may call the parties, the contest has been the same. Command and obedience have been the spirit of the one party and liberty and equal rights of the other. "Despotism is the making of another's will bend to the fulfillment of our own; slavery is the having of our own will subordinated to the will of another." Do thou as I will is the spirit of the despot. I will obey none but God, is the freeman. He who sees in other men the worth which he claims for himself, and grants as a due to his own dignity the right of another to control his own action and to give his own voice for the choice of the force that is to control the State, is alone a free and enlightened man. Who denies this worth and right to his fellow-citizen is not only a despot, but an ignorant, dark mind subjugated by passion. As the franchise has been extended our prosperity and power have been augmented by the interest it gave the citizen in the State.

The events of the war threw four million people without political rights, without homes, destitute of education, ignorant of the useful arts, dependent on the necessities of their former owners for employment in the rudest forms of labor, into the condition of citizens. The prosperity of this Government above all others resides in the good will and prosperity of the laboring classes. That good will depends here, as in all human action and motive, on the interest they have in the Government where the people are conscious that their families reside in their own homes, and cultivate their own fields, and obey the laws made by their own wills, they are more ready to support and defend their Government than when they are denied all rights and interests. This principle must become national. If adopted by Congress for one State it must be for all the States and for all citizens. It will not answer to say that it is necessary and proper for South Carolina, but not proper for Pennsylvania. The ballot must be supported as a human right, not as a privilege granted. Any local application as to race, color, or condition of servitude is a condemnation of the principle. The defeat of manhood suffrage in Ohio and Kansas is far more fatal to the cause of human happiness and the peace of the Republic than its failure in Texas. If people may vote it must be because of their right and their competency. These qualifications are as strong in one section as in another. State lines can communicate no such qualities to the man if he does not have them inherent.

If a proposition is made in favor of suffrage in the Constitution of the United States, it should be made in the name of humanity, not of a race. Our religion knows no races, our principle of government recognizes no races. It recognizes humanity, the freedom and equality of the individual. Any limitations on the principle would be unworthy of the age and a disgrace to the Constitution it vainly seeks to amend. This amendment is made wholly in the interests of colored races and not in the interest of the white race. It does not even condescend to relieve or protect our own race.

It cannot be affirmed that the white race do not require relief. More of them are disfranchised to-day than of the colored races in the United States. It is not for the rights of any race, color, or condition that we should legislate; it is for the family of man. This is the life and spirit of our institutions. It has met the approval of the wise and good of other times and other nations.

Before leaving this question I desire to record the opinions of some of the men who have thought upon these questions earnestly without regard to the political influences that might affect them. I shall not rely on the opinions of men as authority only, but for its concurrence with the spirit of justice that has characterized the benefactors of mankind in all ages. Says Dionysius, of Halicarnassus, Rome raised itself from the most obscure to the most illustrious "by the reception of those who were destitute of homes, by a communication of the rights of citizens to all who had been conquered by them, who had been manumitted among them, and by disdaining no condition of men from whom the Commonwealth might reap advantage." If a part of the citizens are weak and destitute, so much the more do they need and should they have political equality. On this subject Cicero says:

"Si enim pecunias aequari non placet, si ingenia omnium paria esse non possunt jura certe paria debent esse eorum inter se, qui sunt cives in eadem republica. Quid est enim civitas nisi juris societas?"

It is not from the masses that public virtue receives its first wounds. Says Montesquieu:

"Virtue in a republic is a love for the republic; it is a sentiment and not a consequence of acquired knowledge; a sentiment that may be felt by the meanest as well as the highest person in the State. When the common people adopt good maxims, they adhere to them steadier than those we call gentlemen. It is very rare that corruption commences with the former; nay, they frequently derive from their imperfect light a stronger attachment to the established laws and customs."

Herbert Spencer says:

"Neither party recognizes in the other itself in a different dress." "Label men how you please with titles of 'upper' and 'middle' and 'lower,' you cannot prevent their being units of the same society, acted upon by the same spirit, of the age, molded after the same type of character."

"In whichever rank you see corruption, be assured it equally pervades all ranks. While the virus of depravity exists in one part of the body-politic no other part can remain healthy."

The weight of great names might be multiplied indefinitely. I will content myself with the addition of John Stewart Mill, who has so zealously advocated the right and policy of all to the ballot. But the argument drawn from authority of great names has but little influence in working out a great reformation. The light of truth must be diffused through the masses of men by more powerful agencies than the advice or reasons of philosophers. When each man carries with him the perpetual authority that his neighbor is as well calculated to act wisely his part in the State, and has as many impelling demands for the proper use of the right as himself, he will give but little heed to the opinions of others, however wise they may be, for he is conscious of a higher authority. When the period arrives for the evolution of a great reform the causes adequate to convince are invariably provided for the inauguration of the coming age. The thunders of Sinai that ushered in regenerating institutions the sacred law of the Jews have been heard in still louder tones in other mountains and other valleys than those of Arabia. God has written a new law in nobler lines amid grander displays of power than when he gave the tables of stone to Moses. From the Potomac to the Rio Grande his will and power will be traced by coming ages in brighter lines than at the present. In this wonderful display of power he did mean something, and that meaning will be and must be learned and obeyed. I shall not pretend to write it in feeble words. The full meaning of this lesson will be deciphered by the future historian; but if I may be pardoned for expressing a conviction, I would say that he has taught us that the individual is free and inviolable. This is sufficient for my purpose, for he cannot be governed without his consent. There cannot result any great injury to society from admitting all to the exercise of the right to vote. The intellect will, of necessity, in a government of law, control. Force, mere force, is no longer an object of worship. That belongs to a barbarous age. The intelligence of the wisest will impregnate the whole mass and determine its action as certainly as attraction determines the course of matter. How absurd, then, to amend the Constitution in the interest of the uncultivated and unenlightened alone. Would not reason, would not policy dictate such an amendment as will embrace the race that have framed our institutions? The more wisdom, the higher morality you can embrace, the better for the State and the world.

The arguments used by most of the advocates of this measure are addressed to the prejudice of the people against the former owners of the negro and the authors of the late rebellion. I can neither commend the head nor the heart of the man who seeks to keep alive the memories of this unhappy conflict. It is the part of a patriot to forget the events that have occurred when the demon of passion lashed our countrymen into fury. Wisdom and charity will come at last, alas! too long delayed to heal the bleeding wounds of the nation and administer consolation to the bereaved. Happily for the nation the vice of distrust comes not up from the heroic men who periled life for their country, nor is it heard from the bereaved families of those men who sleep their last long sleep on the many battle-fields of the war. It comes from the demon of hate, inspired by the love of power. It rules the conduct of him who seeks to feed upon the passions of the hour. No people submit more readily and more cheerfully to the will of God when they see it written so logically as it has been in the recent war than the citizens of the States lately in insurrection. Their conduct generally will challenge history for an example of similar resignation to the decision of the sword. They generally acquiesce in the right of the colored man to equal political rights. The principle of "equality before the law" is established, and no man need distrust the people of the South. Distrust is the element of weakness as well as tyranny. It belongs not to faith, courage, and generosity.

The argument drawn from prejudice against the southern whites in favor of this limited amendment of the Constitution is without any warrant from the history of the people. The history of the Republic is illustrated with her great names and generous and patriotic deeds. No portion of the country showed more devoted attachment to the principles of liberty and humanity or displayed more courage and self-denial in their defense. They were not the men that could see their brethren overrun by a foreign host without rushing to their defense. They eagerly espoused the war of the Revolution, and hesitated not to press it to a successful termination. Let it not be forgotten that Jefferson is the apostle of liberty and humanity, that he was the organ of the Western World when it announced the principle upon which free institutions should be based. Under his mission slavery was attacked, primogeniture and entail went down, and freedom of religion was established. It is not yet time to estimate his labors or his capacity. The long line of advancing centuries will hail him as one of the greatest benefactors of his race. His shadow still hovers over the land of his birth and his love.

What could I say of the devotion and wisdom, the love of liberty and country of the Father of the Republic, the leader of our revolutionary armies? He never neglected nor forgot a duty; never violated faith or confidence. Could the people that produced so grand a character either forget his example or abandon the love of liberty he illustrated by a long and devoted life consecrated to its service? Among the many bright examples of illustrious men he stands without a rival for all that could dignify and elevate human character. To the father of his country I might add Madison, Henry, Mason, Marshall, Randolph, and how many more, all the demi-gods of the nation's glory. Then comes the long line of the posterity of those that fell on every battle field for liberty, honor, and defense that has adorned the nation's history. The people of my own State, nursed in the lap of liberty, catching their inspirations from their lofty mountains and fertile plains, early entered the conflict for independence, and at King's mountain achieved a glorious victory. With Jackson they marched in triumph to Florida, and tore the honors from the brows of the conquerors of Napoleon at New Orleans. With Scott they entered the halls of the Montezumas. On every field they have poured forth their blood like water for their country's honor. These men, though led astray in a sad hour and under unpropitious auspices, have not forgotten the principles of liberty taught them by their fathers and defended by their blood. They should not be neglected nor reviled now that the leader of the national armies who has conducted the war to a triumphant peace says let us have peace. Peace, he means not by perpetuating the memories of the unhappy past, but through a glorious hope of the future. He desires to restore the alienated citizen to his former love of country, to rebuild their burned cities and desolated homes. He desires to erase the vestiges of war and bury in perpetual oblivion angry and vindictive passions, and resume again the reign of love and good-fellowship.

Believing that he means what he has said and what we all have promised from his words to the people in every part of the Republic, I am led to look with bright anticipations upon the future. I ardently hope to see the man whose cup of military glory is more than full devote himself to the love of his fellow-citizens in all the States of this Union. As he has no more honors to win on the field of strife and dissension, he will now embrace the Republic in his generous hopes and beautiful promise. May we not fondly hope, under his magnanimous, trusting, and tranquil administration, to see the sad and mournful remains of our country won back to their former prosperity and patriotism? Over the ashes of their ruined homes the beautiful cottage will again arise surrounded with all the delights and comforts that gladdened its inmates in the past. That they will still love the cause for which their first-born bled and mourn their loved and absent ones will neither surprise us nor cause us to love them less. That they still bear hearts responsive to the voice of sympathy will not render them unworthy of Americans or their brave ancestors. May the long-looked-for day of peace soon arrive. Gladly shall we greet its coming and hail him who hastens the "lagging hours of its long delay." Another Pollio shall he be to an empire greater and more lasting than the Eternal City?

"Teque adio decus hoc ævi, te consule, inibit
Pollio: et incipient magni procedere menses.
Te duce, si qua manent vestigia nostris
Irrita perpetua solvent formidine terras."

The war has long since ceased. The roar of arms no longer terrify the wives and mothers of the soldier. The sacred dead have been gathered to their homes. Over their graves the flowers of spring "bloom and breathe their fragrance on the air." Many a pilgrim seeks their silent abodes to do homage to their memories. From every grave comes up a prayer for peace and forgiveness. The rude and nameless graves of the confederate soldiers are the most touching and eloquent appeals to the heart of the magnanimous patriot. Here is a standing monument of the blasting policy of passion and selfishness. At the voice of the furies they offered up name, hope, country, cause, and life to sleep forever in their nameless and neglected tombs.

The modest patriot meant peace when he uttered the word. It was a speech for his country and his countrymen or it was a hollow mockery. It was wrung from his heart by the agony of the sad and disjointed times, by the memories of a hundred bloody fields in which he had seen the hands of a brother raised against a brother in mortal conflict. Sufficient and more than sufficient blood has flowed. It has flowed until the "tongueless caverns of the craggy hills cried misery!" How different must he feel from the hollow-hearted imitators who cry peace and demand a new scourge with which to lash even the children of the rebellion with new furies. No sooner is one rod worn out than the tireless demon of rage cries "cede Alteram." Passion will not appease its own raging tempests; it is the voice of an all-embracing Divine love that can say to its proud waves, peace, be still. Who shall first show forth this Divine benevolence? Surely the conqueror can best afford to become the prince and pardon. It is no personal matter; no humble confession can be asked.

The confederate can point to his desolated homes, his ruined fortunes, and the remnants of his family demanding support. He can say the flag you follow is mine. My grandfather followed it with Washington over the blood-stained snows of New Jersey; at Monmouth, Brandywine, and Yorktown, in victory and defeat; with Shelby and Williams and Campbell he ascended King's mountain; with Green he marched in his heroic and determined struggle for the Carolinas. My father followed it in the last war with England. I myself was at Cerro Gordo, Churubusco, and Molino del Rey. The memories of the past are ours and our children's. The Government you serve was framed by our fathers; it too is ours; ours by the dear purchase of blood; ours by the glorious liberties and sacred history it guarantees; ours by civilization, by language, by an inheritance, and support; ours for peace and war, to love and to defend. We have no other country or flag but that of the Union.

Let us have peace. Let the dead past be all forgotten over the graves of the multitudinous thousands that have fallen for country and liberty in the late unhappy storm of madness and folly.

I have no hopes in the man who shouts "peace, peace!" and then carries us to the cities of the dead and exhumes the coffin and opens up its ghastly skeletons to arouse the demon of eternal hate. In a time like the present, when it is thought best to make an amendment to the Constitution, let it not be said the American Congress has been influenced to such a step, not by the universal love of mankind, not by an enlarged patriotism, but from suspicion and distrust of our own race and fellow-citizens. Let it embrace all, not a part. Let it protect the white man as well as the colored. I would go still further, and embrace all who are the subjects of law. I would found it on the spiritual worth and inviolability of the individual. It should embrace women as well as men. There is no argument in favor of the suffrage of men that will not apply equally as well to women. She is equally well calculated to decide what measures are calculated to promote her own interests. If any man were asked whose advice was the wisest and truest on all matters of business and politics he would unhesitatingly answer his wife's, his mother's, or his sister's. It is all a delusion and a sham to talk of excluding women from the ballot and admitting all the civilized and uncivilized men of the world.

When men base their support of suffrage upon the natural rights of man, upon the worth of the individual, and then exclude woman, they do not believe the doctrine they assert. It is a direct contradiction of terms. When they admit the African and the Indian, and exclude their mothers and sisters, it is a startling exhibition of prejudice and the force of custom.

If elections are conducted improperly and rudely it is because the refining and humanizing influences of woman has not been brought to purify it. Let the husband and father go with his wife and daughters to the polls as he does to church, and the rudest men will be taught self-respect and integrity of purpose. It will make the polls as refined and solemn as the lecture or the school.

I do not design to discuss this feature of the question. The great body of the people, and especially of the legislators, are not ready to confer upon their wives and mothers and sisters the exercise of a right they are ready and willing to give to the youngest children of the race, to the babies of civilization. The day is coming, the light of truth is spreading, the time is not far distant when a step in favor of rear Suffrage Constitutional Amendment—Mr. Loughridge.

HO. OF REPS.

progress will be taken. The dead hours of the night have been passed and—

"Jocund day Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops."

The proposition from the House to limit the constitutional amendment by the qualifications of race, color, or previous condition of servitude is a disgrace to the age. It must have been made in utter scorn of civilization and reason, or from party zeal or the blindness of vengeance. It sets aside civilization, the true, the beautiful, and the good, and bows in humble submission to race, color, and previous condition of servitude. It erects a standard of worship lower than that of the most barbarous tribes of Africa, who hold dominion over their divinities and change them at pleasure. This scorns intelligence and worth for the mere accidents of race. The Senate amendment is the same practically as that of the House. I do not know who of the Judiciary Committee approved this piece of sublime stupidity. I can only hope that the profound and enlightened and patriotic chairman never gave his assent to a proposition so abhorrent to the wisdom and magnanimity of a statesman.

If we would second the wishes and virtues of the coming patriotic Chief Magistrate let us adopt an amendment that shall embrace the disfranchised whites as well as the colored races.

The amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] is much better than the monstrous proposition before the Senate from the Judiciary Committee. Although it does not meet the requirements of the times and appears to have been offered in as reverential a devotion to the sanctity of institutions as ever made an Egyptian bow in adoration to his sacred cat, it is based on no immutable and reverential principle of human worth, but on the same devotion to habit that has marked the course of the departing past. It has this redeeming feature, that it does not necessarily take from the States the right to determine the qualification of electors, but gives to the General Government the power to regulate when Congress may think it prudent.

The amendment I have had the honor to offer is very different from any of those already proposed. If an innovation upon the framework of the Government must be made let it be such an one as will go to the bottom of the question. The following, in my judgment, will meet the question:

Strike out section one and insert the following:

All the male citizens of the United States, residents of the several States now or hereafter comprehended in the Union, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, shall be entitled to an equal vote in all elections in the State wherein they shall reside, the period of such residence as a qualification for voting to be decided by each State, except such citizens as shall engage in rebellion or insurrection or shall be duly convicted of treason or other infamous crime.

Having already discussed the principles involved in this amendment, and especially the danger of so amending our institutions as to divest the States of powers they now possess and thus destroying the equilibrium of the Government, I will not detain the Senate much longer. To consummate so desirable an end as that of restoring all our citizens to their rights I would be willing to vote for the amendment I have offered.

If it were my own I should distrust my prudence in proposing it. But it comes to us from a venerated source. It is the principle contained in the plan of the Constitution submitted by the most distinguished and accomplished statesman of the Republic to the Convention that framed the Constitution. It is in the original draft of the plan of Alexander Hamilton, and completely refutes the charges made against the purest, wisest, and most comprehensive statesman of his own or any other age. I allude to the charge that he was afraid to trust the people. He was the trusted counselor and constant companion of George Washington throughout the Revolution. When the labor of forming a new government devolved upon the men that had won their independence he contributed more than any other man in the country to devise, perfect, and establish a permanent form of government. He was placed by his illustrious chief at the head of the Treasury, the most arduous and responsible post in the nation. The country was then poor, War had rolled its all-destroying waves over its whole limits. Without commerce, without money, overwhelmed in debt, without the practical operation of a government, he undertook to create public credit and money, to evoke commerce and national enterprise, to build up manufactures and mechanic arts. How well he executed his great purpose only the inspired tongue of a Webster could utter. It was that great orator who said of Mr. Hamilton:

"He smote the rock of the national resources and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of public credit and it sprang upon its feet."

His commentaries upon the Constitution have become unquestioned authority. He accomplished more labor in a few years than any other of our great men did in a long life. At an age when other minds just begin to ascend above the horizon he had reached the zenith of usefulness and fame. When others have just begun to live he had completed his mission. His mind was ever in a state of sleepless activity and he labored by night and day to execute its discoveries. The magnitude of his labors, considered with reference to the short space in which they were accomplished, is startling to the wildest fancy. Through life he was the idol of his country and his party. His death was mourned in solemn grief by the whole nation. His memory is embalmed in the grateful remembrance of his countrymen and grows brighter with advancing years and coming generations.

This amendment has in itself merits that commend it to those who desire to place in the Constitution the principle of male suffrage as founded in the rights of man to vote. The amendment of the Judiciary Committee protects no attributes but "color, race, and previous condition of servitude." For any other cause the citizen may be divested of his only peaceful and effective defense, the ballot. One is based on the rights of man, the other on the contingent and prospective advantage of party without any more permanent foundation.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. W. LOUGHRIDGE,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 29, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

MR. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the proposition now before the House, and upon which I desire to submit a few remarks, is a joint resolution proposing to the States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States by which the States shall be positively prohibited from denying or abridging the right of any citizen to vote by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of slavery of such citizen. I shall vote for this joint resolution, and yet, sir, I do not desire to be understood that by giving such vote I admit that by the Constitution as it now is the States have the right or the legal power to disfranchise any class of citizens of the United States by reason of race or color. I do not admit this. It is a sufficient reason for the adoption of this amendment that there exists in the minds of a large portion of the people serious doubts upon the question as to whether this power exists in the States under the Constitution of the United States. Many believe that it does, and I do not know but I might say that in my opinion a majority of the people of the country so believe.

How far the Federal judicial tribunals of the country might go in this direction is but matter of speculation. The courts of the majority of the States, I have no doubt, would hold that under the Constitution Congress has no power to regulate the right of the elective franchise in the States. More especially would the courts of the States where the colored citizen is deprived of this right so hold; and such State courts could, in their own jurisdictions, to a great extent thwart the operation of any remedial legislation in this direction by Congress, at least so far as the right of franchise in State and local matters is concerned; and I suppose it will not be denied that with the supreme judicial tribunals of a State against the right of congressional control in relation to the right of franchise in the States it would be impossible, or at least very difficult, for full relief to be given to the injured class. The only way in which this difficulty can be entirely avoided is by an amendment to the Constitution so plain and positive that there can and would be no disagreement in relation to it, and for this reason one who holds that by the Constitution as it now stands no State can legally deny the right of franchise on account of race or color may nevertheless very consistently vote for this amendment, so as to place the proper construction of the Constitution beyond doubt or cavil, and so that no State court, however much it might desire to do so, could interpose its power to deprive a class of citizens of their rights by legal and technical quibbles.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that there exists such a state of feeling and of fact in any of the States as to render the application of a remedy by Federal power necessary to secure to the colored citizens of this country their equal and just rights. It would be much more noble, much more magnanimous, and much more creditable for all the people and all the States freely and willingly to accept the situation and adapt their laws to the changed and advanced order of things, the result of the war through which we have passed, and extend to the colored man the full enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of citizenship and equality before the law with all other citizens. A noble example of this course has been set by the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor.

The people of Iowa, at the election held last November, adopted an amendment to their State constitution, by a majority of over twenty-four thousand votes, striking out the word white from their State constitution, and abolishing, so far as civil or political rights are concerned, all discriminations on account of race or color.

The people of Iowa are not afraid to extend to the colored man equal rights; they are not afraid that with a fair start and an equal chance in the race of life the colored race will outstrip the white and become the superior in intelligence and power; at least they are generous enough to be willing to give him a fair chance. There are, I admit, a certain class of people in Iowa, as there are in every State—and they universally vote the Democratic ticket—who are fearfully exercised over the danger of "negro equality," and even of negro superiority, as likely to result from the admission of the colored man to equality in civil rights. They seem to be satisfied that with an equal chance the negro will rise to a level with themselves, legally, socially, and intellectually; and, impelled by this imminent danger, this class of people bitterly and uncompromisingly opposed the extension of civil rights to the negro, and the powerful organization of the Democratic party, sympathizing with its members in their fears and the threatened danger, threw the weight of its influence in the scale against equal rights. But, with all opposition, justice triumphed. Satisfied that duty, principle, and consistency required it, the people of Iowa put their feet upon prejudice and trampled it in the dust, and decreed and wrote down in their constitution that within the borders and jurisdiction of that proud young empire of liberty and of law all men, wherever born, whatever the color of their skin, whatever their previous condition in life—all shall stand equal before the law.

And now, sir, in Iowa, as it should be in every State and the world over—

"A man 's a man for a' that."

But, sir, in some of the States of the Union the colored man is still persistently denied his rights, and will continue to be, I have no doubt, until those rights are secured to him by the exercise of Federal authority. In the States of Kentucky and of Maryland there are seventy-five thousand colored men, who by the Constitution of the United States are citizens of the United States, and yet who are denied by the laws of those States any participation in the civil governments of the States. Those seventy-five thousand men are required to obey all the laws of the State governments, to pay taxes to support them, and yet they are allowed no voice whatever in making the laws by which they are governed and by which their property is taken from them for taxes. And yet, sir, guilty of this great wrong, this oppression and injustice, the white people of Kentucky and Maryland, upon this floor by their Representatives and elsewhere, talk eloquently of the sanctity of justice, and claim to worship at the shrine of liberty, while they desecrate the altars of the one and violate the temples of the other.

Tell me not that the governments of those States are republican in form. As well call despotism by the sacred name of liberty, as well assert that vice is virtue. What is a republic? A government by the people; not by a portion of the people, but by all the people. A government, then, in which one fourth of the people are denied any voice or participation lacks every element of a republican government. It is an aristocracy of the most invidious type, as far removed from true liberty as the most absolute despotism; and experience proves that the despotism of a single ruler with unlimited power is far less grievous than the despotism of an aristocracy.

Sir, I deny the right of the one million five hundred thousand white people of the States of Kentucky and Maryland to refuse the privileges and immunities of citizenship and all participation in the Government to the four hundred thousand native-born American citizens of their States, whom they disfranchise on account of their race and color. I deny it on the general principles upon which this Government is founded and which are incorporated into the fundamental law of the Republic. One of those principles, and one which our fathers incorporated into the Declaration of Independence, among other great truths which have come to be acknowledged as political axioms, is this, "that Governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed." If this be true, then that cannot be a just Government or exercise just powers which denies absolutely to one fifth of its citizens any voice or participation in the Government, the laws of which they are required to obey, and to the support of which they are required to contribute by the payment of taxes. On the contrary, tried by the principles of the Declaration of Independence, it is an unjust Government, exercising unjust powers, forcing upon the people the tyranny of "taxation without representation," resistance to which lit up the fires of the revolutionary war.

So far, sir, from such Governments being republican in form they are, as I have already said, aristocracies of the most detestable and hateful character. The qualification requisite to admission to the privileged class is not merit, talent, personal achievement, or wealth, but the arbitrary one of race, in which no individual member of the unfortunate ostracized class can be inspired with the least hope to acquire, even through the exhibition of the highest genius, talent, and worth, admission to the rights and privileges of the governing class. An aristocracy in which if a man be of white blood, though he may be destitute of talent, intelligence, patriotism, or virtue—though he be ignorant, vicious, and depraved, yet all the privileges of the governing class are freely accorded to him—he is one of the acknowledged sovereigns. But if a man unfortunately be of African descent, even to the remotest degree; if to any extent there be the blood of that injured race in his veins, although he be a natural-born citizen of the United States, although he may have an intellect of the highest order, a cultivated mind, and a character unsullied by vice; although he may, when the Government was assailed by traitors, have given liberally of his means for its support, and upon red fields of battle bared his breast to the cruel storm of war and periled his life in defense of the flag, yet notwithstanding all this he is ruthlessly and cruelly thrust down and consigned, without question and without reason, to hopeless degradation.

Sir, it should cause the cheek of an American citizen to blush for shame, that while the whole world, even where the most absolute despotism has heretofore prevailed, is advancing so rapidly toward the full recognition of the rights of humanity in this the great Republic, the boasted asylum and home of liberty, such a gross wrong and such an outrage upon every principle of justice and of democracy should be any longer suffered to exist. In the name and for the sake of the great cause of human freedom, in the name of five million native-born citizens of the United States, such by birth and such by the letter of the Constitution, whose dearest rights are thus trampled upon, citizens who have been patriotic and true to the starry flag at all times, and in the dark hours of the great rebellion one hundred thousand of whom put on the blue uniform of the armies of the Republic, and upon many hard-fought fields battled bravely for a Government from which they had never received aught but injustice and wrongs, and not one of whom was a traitor to the Government, I insist that this aristocracy of race, this last relic of the barbarism of slavery, shall no longer be tolerated in the land. Sir, I have said that this denial of the elective franchise to citizens on account of race or color was contrary to the principles which lie at the foundation of the Republic and at variance with the whole theory of the Government.

This Government was established on the great principle of the natural equality of all men. The Declaration of Independence, the foundation-stone of the whole edifice, starts out with the bold and sweeping affirmation, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving all their just powers from the consent of the governed." Here in this instrument man is recognized as man, and all distinctions, whether of race or of color or of any other kind, are repudiated. The framers of that instrument, which has always been and always will be the glory of the Republic and the admiration of the world, in framing it spake for no clan or particular race of men; they spake no narrow, selfish words; they did not choose, by confining their claim of natural rights and natural equality to themselves and their particular race of men, to insult the instincts and the intelligence of the friends of liberty throughout the world, while at the same time appealing to mankind for the justice of their cause and to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of their intentions. And therefore they wrote down great and true words of universal liberty, and embraced in their claim for inalienable rights and natural equality the whole family of man, of all climes, kindreds, and nations, and in fit words declared the truth of the existence of these sacred rights to be "self-evident," political axioms, which needed no demonstration and which no man could deny, and that these rights were held by no muniments of human title, but were the gift of God. And, sir, standing upon that declaration, and by its authority, I denounce that blasphemy against Heaven which would rob man of his birthright, and would deny to a portion of God's children the royalty of their lineage and the nobility of their descent—a descent from the great Father of all, and a lineage unbroken and direct from Him who gave their names to the beasts of the earth and the fowls of the air, and for whom and for his descendants, even the humblest and poorest on earth, as much as if there were no other living man, this world was made and fitted up in all its architectural beauty and grandeur by the hand of the great Creator. As such a being, with such a fatherhood and such a lineage, the Declaration of Independence treats of man; and all that I ask, all that the colored man asks, is that the principles of that instrument shall be carried into practice, and that the natural equality of men before the law be recognized by the laws of the land and guaranteed by the Government. And sir, after our fathers had made good their declaration and vindicated the justice of their cause upon the battle-fields of the Revolution—

"And the red lion, haughty Britain's emblem, Discomfited, went howling back with rage,
To lair amid the white cliffs of Albion," and when the statesmen of the Republic, their minds imbued with the true principles of liberty, met together and framed the Constitution, they carried into that instrument the same principles which were so conspicuous in the Declaration of Independence.

Although slavery then existed in the most of the States, and the States would not consent to give the Federal Government power to abolish it in the States, yet in framing the Constitution they carefully excluded from it every sentence and word which would imply that there could be such a thing as property in a man. In that instrument they recognized no distinction of color or race among men. Under its provisions a negro is eligible equally with a white man to any office in the Government up to and including that of President of the United States. Neither the word white nor the word black is found in that carefully written instrument, nor is there a single word in it, from beginning to end, showing any distinction between white men and black men, or from which such a distinction can be inferred. In the preamble it is "We the people of the United States," and throughout the instrument it speaks only of "persons" and "people." Every provision in that constitution protecting the white citizen in his rights of life, liberty, and property, applies equally in substance and equally in terms to the colored man.

Sir, this is the character of the fundamental law of our national Republic; these are the just and equal principles upon which it rests, as framed by our ancestors and handed down by them to us.

The Constitution of the United States, to the glory of its framers be it said, denies or abridges the rights of no person in the broad domain of the Republic by reason of race or color. It either guarantees the civil rights of none or it guarantees those of all. It either gives protection to none or it spreads the broadegis of its protection over all alike. It either secures the right of elective franchise to none or it guarantees that right to all. Under it either the States have no power to deny the colored citizen the elective franchise or they have the right to deny that privilege to the white citizen as well.

And, sir, the term "white," as used in laws and constitutions of some of the States, to create unjust and wicked distinctions among men and to rob the colored man of his rights, is a device of a comparatively recent period, the growth of a spirit and feeling nourished and strengthened during those thirty years in our history when the Government, under the control in all its departments of the slave power, was rapidly verging toward the recognition of slavery as a national institution, universal as the domain of the Republic, and protected by the Constitution, the culmination of which period was reached when the Supreme Court of the United States declared that the Constitution carried slavery into all the national Territories, protected it in all the States, and in substance that the black man in this country had no rights under the Constitution that the white man was bound to respect. It was during this period, I say, that this distinction of races and this ostracism of the colored citizen on account of his race crept into the constitutions and laws of most of the States, and it was but the natural outgrowth of the spirit and tendency of the times.

For three generations we had robbed the black man of all his rights, both natural and civil. As nearly as we could we had allied him to the brute, had closed to him every avenue of light and of knowledge, and clouded his intellect over with darkness as thick as night. Chains, handcuffs, and whips were his only incentives to exertion, and his only reward; placed on the auction-block and sold like merchandise to the highest bidder, and driven like the ox and the horse to his daily toil under the cruel lash of the heartless task-master, so far as human ingenuity could do it he was made to forget that he was a man, or had any of the rights of humanity. That he did not forget the nobility of his origin and accept his situation by the side of the brute is convincing proof that the soul of man is allied to immortality. No wonder, sir, that in view of these things Jefferson, that profound political philosopher, "trembled for his country" when he remembered that God is just, and that His justice cannot sleep forever. His justice did not long sleep, but brought swift deliverance to the oppressed, and through the blood, the suffering, and the intense anguish of the nation He brought deliverance to the slave, broke every fetter, and let the oppressed go free. But in the progress of this deliverance the angel of death passed over the entire land and shadowed it with his dark wings, leaving a vacant chair in almost every home and the sables of mourning in almost every household. And now, strange to say, after all these generations of oppression and wrong toward this unfortunate race, after all our suffering in consequence thereof, Pharaoh-like, we yet hesitate to do justice.

Sir, speaking as an individual member of this House, and speaking what I know to be the sentiments of those I have the honor to represent, so far as my voice and my vote shall go, from this time henceforth, the colored race shall have secured to them all the protection, all the rights, and all the immunities of American citizens in every portion of the Republic, from this Capitol to the remotest limit; from where the cold blue waters of the Arctic ocean dash up against the icy rocks of Alaska to the flowery shores of the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, so that in all this vast empire all men, high and low, rich and poor, of every clime and race, shall stand equal before the law. Sir, I do not expect the assistance of the Democratic party upon this floor or elsewhere in the consummation of this act of justice and this recognition of human rights. I expect their opposition both here and in every State, for that party is no longer the party of freedom or of progress. It has been for years the champion of slavery and the deadly foe of human freedom. It resisted every step in the progress of the nation toward emancipation and freedom. It has opposed every measure taken by the Government to protect, educate, raise up, and encourage the poor freedmen. In its national councils and in every State it has thrown all its weight against every proposition or measure to extend to the black man those rights of citizenship of which he has so long been robbed. The Republican party will carry this measure through here and in the States as it has carried through upon its stalwart shoulders every measure of progress, of justice, and of liberty, from the commencement of the great struggle down to the present time, and as I trust it will continue to do fearlessly and boldly as long as injustice exists in the Republic; as long as one citizen, even the poorest and the humblest in the land, is deprived of his rights as an American citizen.

The contest between slavery and liberty has been a long and a fearful one. From the murder of Broderick, the bosom friend of Douglas and the noble and true Democrat, who fell with the declaration upon his dying lips, "They have murdered me because I was opposed to the extension of slavery," to the cruel assassination of the great Lincoln, tens of thousands of noble men gave their lives for the sacred cause of liberty, and died that the Government of the people, and by the people and for the people, might live. To perpetuate its own wicked life the fell monster of oppression bathed its hands in the blood of countless patriots and brought weeping and desolation upon the land. But the contest ended, liberty triumphed, and slavery died. Yet a few lingering relics of the great barbarism still exist in the local ostracism of those who were its victims, and from whose limbs its chains have been unloosed; but this proposed amendment, if adopted, will sweep the last of them away forever; and it will be a glorious consummation. We shall then have no aristocracy of race; no privileged classes; no taxation without representation; but a just Government, deriving all its powers from the consent of the governed.

I trust, sir, that this joint resolution may pass; that the proposed amendment may be ratified by three fourths of the States, and thus become a part of the supreme law of the Republic.

Power and Duty of Congress in Counting the Electoral Vote.

REMARKS OF HON. J. R. McCORMICK,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1869,

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, a few days since a resolution was adopted for the government of the joint session of the two Houses in dealing with the electoral vote of Georgia, which reads as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That on the assembling of the two Houses on the second Wednesday of February, 1869, for the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice President, as provided by law and the joint rules, if the counting or omitting to count the electoral votes, if any, which may be presented, as of the State of Georgia, shall not essentially change the result, in that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: were the votes presented, as of the State of Georgia, to be counted, the result would be, for ——— for President of the United States, ——— votes; if not counted, for ——— for President of the United States, ——— votes; but in either case ——— is elected President of the United States; and in the same manner for Vice President."

The provisions of this resolution are simply these: if the vote of Georgia affects the election

it shall not be counted, but if it does not affect the election then it shall be counted. What intelligent reason has Congress for such action as this? By what rule of common sense has it been governed in this proceeding? Where is its authority under the Constitution for such action? Why mock the people of Georgia by treating the electoral vote of their State in this way? It were more frank to say that if the vote of Georgia has been cast in conformity with the political views of Congress it may be counted; but if it has not, then it shall not be counted.

But we are told Congress has a precedent for its action in the adoption of this resolution; that in 1821 a similar resolution was by Congress adopted in reference to the electoral vote of Missouri, and again in 1833 the same thing was repeated in reference to Michigan. I deny the correctness of the proposition. The case of Missouri and Michigan is entirely unlike that of Georgia, which is an original State in the Union and has never been out of the Union, unless the heresy of secession is true. Under the Constitution Georgia is entitled to choose a number of electors equal to the whole number of her representatives in both Houses of Congress, and no power under the Constitution can deprive her of that right. At the time Missouri and Michigan attempted to choose electors they were Territories not in the Union, had never been in the Union, and under the Constitution were not entitled to choose any electors whatever. The resolution of courtesy then adopted by Congress toward these Territories who had made application to be admitted into the Union, and who had reason to hope would be declared States in the Union in time for them to participate in the election for President, is now sought to be made a precedent by which Congress may reject the electoral vote of a sovereign State; and the recent action of this body has gone far toward the establishment of a precedent by which a partisan Congress at some future time may overthrow the choice of the people and involve the country in anarchy and revolution. The action of Congress in reference to the vote of Georgia is without excuse; it was purely partisan in its character, inflicted a wrong upon the people of Georgia, and for which no authority can be found in the Constitution. Having given the reason for my objection to the joint resolution of the two Houses, I now proceed to consider the twenty-second joint rule for the government of the two Houses, which reads as follows:

"The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m. on the second Wednesday next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their Presiding Officer. One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses thus assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the vote having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the Presiding Officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision. And no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses."

This rule provides for the settlement of questions which under the Constitution cannot arise. It recognizes the right of a member of either House to object to the vote of any State, and provides that the vote of a State when questioned shall not be counted except by the concurrence of both Houses. Suppose that either House should take advantage of its power under this rule, and persistently refuse to count the vote of a sufficient number of States, to defeat the choice of the people. Would not that involve the country in imminent peril. I assert the Constitution grants to Congress no such powers, and whenever it is exercised it is a usurpation which from its very nature must tend to anarchy and the subversion of our institutions. But we are told that some such rule as this is necessary to enable Congress to reject the vote of a State when cast in opposition to the will of the people. To this it may be answered, the right to secure a fair expression of the people of a State, to decide who are chosen electors for a State, and to correct irregularities of elections in a State is by the Constitution secured to the States themselves. The Constitution provides:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

Here the whole matter of choosing electors is left to the States, and for the best of reasons. Is it probable that Congress, composed of members from all the States, should be more capable to judge of the will of the people of a State than are the electors coming from the State and chosen by the people of the State? Suppose a State is politically opposed to the majority in Congress and stands in a feeble minority, are its rights and privileges more safely lodged in the hands of such Congress than in its own? I assert Congress has no power under the Constitution to reject the vote of any State; the exercise of such power may endanger the existence of the Republic, and to prevent which the Constitution declares "the vote shall be counted."

But suppose a State fallen under the domination of political faction which by corrupt legislation has disfranchised the majority, whereby electors have been chosen whom the people intended to reject, has Congress no power to right this wrong, by rejecting the vote thus fraudulently obtained? I answer, no. The people thus unfortunately situated must look for redress to the judiciary of their country. Again, suppose the people of a State to have chosen electors who have corruptly cast the vote of the State in opposition to the will of the people, has Congress no power to reject such vote? The answer still is, no; and although the courts cannot redress this wrong, and the people are without remedy, it is better they should suffer the penalty of their own folly in electing unfaithful men to office than that Congress should be clothed with a power the proper exercise of which may redress the wrongs of a State, but the abuse of which might outrage the rights of a nation. I am now speaking of electoral votes cast in conformity to the requirements of the Constitution. It is thus, I assert, Congress has no power to reject.

I propose next to consider what constitutes an electoral vote under the Constitution. That instrument provides:

"The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice President and of the numbers of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

From this it appears that a separate list must be made for each person voted for, in which shall appear the name of the person voted for, the State of which he is an inhabitant, the office for which he has been voted, the number of votes he received, and by a comparison of the lists it must appear that the electors have voted for a President and Vice President, one of whom at least is not an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. The lists must bear the signatures and certificates of the electors.

In addition to this I believe the laws of most of the States require the secretary under the seal of the State to certify to certain facts, as that the persons whose names and certificates are hereunto attached are the persons legally chosen and qualified to act as electors for the State. The lists thus made, signed, and certified constitute an electoral vote which must be counted. But suppose the lists purporting to be the electoral vote of a State show the vote for President and Vice President to have been cast for persons both of whom were inhabitants of the same State with the electors themselves, or that a vote five times as great as that to which the State was entitled has been cast, such returns cannot be counted, because the evidence of their unconstitutionality is borne on their face. It therefore is the duty of Congress to reject such vote; but informality in the returns, not affecting the election itself, are not cause for rejecting the vote; for instance, the name of a person voted for has been misspelt or the date of the return shows the election not to have been held on the day required by law, these being no part of the election cannot invalidate the election returns. These are questions coming properly under the jurisdiction of Congress, because the returns themselves furnish the evidence by which Congress is enabled to judge of their character. But I deny the power of Congress to go behind the returns and look into the elections of the States at which the electors were chosen with a view to ascertain the validity of the electoral vote, because the Constitution provides the electors shall be appointed in such manner as the Legislatures of each State may direct. The action of electors so appointed when in conformity with the Constitution is a finality. To this I may add that the brief period which is to elapse from the opening of the electoral vote until the inauguration of the President wholly precludes the possibility of Congress investigating the legality of a State election.

In the discussion of this subject considerable has been said as to who shall count the vote. This, I think, is a question of minor importance, and on which the Constitution is silent. Congress may devolve that duty upon the President of the Senate alone, as he is made by the Constitution the recipient, the custodian, and the person to open the returns, or it may be devolved upon the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House jointly, or on a committee of both Houses, as is now the case; but in either event Congress ordinarily is a silent spectator of the transaction, a mere witness of the procedure; it is only when on the face of the returns a palpable defect is apparent, a manifest violation of the Constitution is evident, that Congress may act while the vote is being counted, and its action must then be confined to these questions alone. After the vote has been counted nothing remains for Congress to do but to hear the results announced, except when the result shows no person to have received a majority of all the votes cast. In this event the House of Representatives becomes the principal actor, and immediately proceeds to elect a President and Vice President for the United States. Having briefly attempted to show the duties and power of Congress in dealing with the electoral vote of the States, I now propose to show wherein it has transcended its powers in this matter.

It will be remembered in the recent joint session of the two Houses, when the vote of Louisiana was announced, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] moved to reject the vote of that State, giving as a reason for his motion that no legal election had been held in Louisiana. The motion was entertained by the Presiding Officer, and the two Houses separated to consider the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. No witness was examined, not a word of testimony introduced in support of the motion, and yet when the question was put to the House of Representatives, "Shall the vote of Louisiana be rejected?" sixty-one members voted in the affirmative.

An attempt to exclude the electoral vote of a State upon ex parte evidence would be a violation of every rule of law and equity; but to attempt it without evidence, as was done in the House of Representatives, was a disgrace to the nation. Scarcely had the vote of Louisiana been disposed of when the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] following in the wake of the gentleman from Tennessee, introduced a similar motion in reference to the vote of Georgia, notwithstanding the vote of that State had been disposed of by a joint resolution of both Houses some days before the electoral vote was opened or the contents of the returns from Georgia known. The Presiding Officer entertained this motion also; whereupon the two Houses again separated to take into consideration the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. In this case the Senate decided to be governed by the joint resolution adopted by both Houses in reference to the vote of that State, while the House by an overwhelming majority decided to reject the vote in total. In this condition of affairs the two Houses met. The President of the Senate, upon taking the chair, declared the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts out of order, although an hour before he had entertained a similar motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, which had been rejected by both Houses, while the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts had been sustained by the House of Representatives.

The President of the Senate, sustained by the Senate, determined the vote of Georgia should be dealt with in conformity to the joint resolution adopted in reference thereto. The gentleman from Massachusetts, sustained by his friends in the House, determined the action of the House upon his resolution should be sustained, claiming that under the twenty-second rule the vote of no State could be counted except by the concurrence of both Houses, and that so long as the House objected the vote for President and Vice President could not be announced. The President of the Senate determined that the vote should then be announced, and so ordered. The gentleman from Massachusetts with his friends determined that the vote should not be announced except by the concurrence of the House. And here commenced a scene in the House of Representatives which every good citizen must contemplate with feelings of regret. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in his subsequent remarks before the House, characterized the action of the President of the Senate as a violation of the rights of the House under the twenty-second rule, and that it was the duty of the House to resist the aggression, because if this precedent is established the Senate may, independent of the House and in opposition to the judgment of the House, declare in the future who may fill the office of President, leaving the House nothing but the sacred right of revolution by which to redress the wrong. What are we to conclude from such arguments as these? Simply this: if the Senate rejects the vote of a State, and that rejection is concurred in by the House, the action is legitimate; but if not concurred in by the House and persisted in by the Senate, it is an outrage which may justify revolution.

Mr. Chairman, there is no power in either House, nor in the joint session of both Houses, to reject the electoral vote of any State when cast in conformity to the Constitution. The enactment of any law, the passage of any joint resolution, or the adoption of any joint rule conferring such power on either or both Houses of Congress are alike unconstitutional, null, and void. It is not the recent action of the Presiding Officer of the Senate that should be so much condemned, but it is the action of Congress itself in reference to the electoral vote of the States of Louisiana and Georgia that merits our unqualified condemnation. The whole proceeding was a partisan measure whereby a precedent has been set which a future Congress availing itself of may reject the electoral vote of a number of States sufficient to defeat the choice of the people and elevate to the Presidency a creature of its own power.

These unwarranted acts of Congress are but a part of a wide system of partisan legislation which has afflicted the country for several years past. The repeated reconstruction acts of Congress have had for their object the maintenance of political power. The enfranchisement of the negro and the disfranchisement of the white race have had for their object the maintenance of political power. The denial of certain States the right to participate in the late presidential election and the rejection of the electoral vote of another State have had for their object the maintenance of political power. The enactment of a law regulating the tenure of civil offices and the impeachment of the President have had for their object the maintenance of political power. And because the Constitution has interposed its authority to prevent these aggressions of party it, too, has been made to run the gauntlet of every Congress in order that it be tortured into conformity with the requirements of party. Mr. Chairman, the signs of the times do not warrant the belief that this Republic is to be of long duration; our institutions cannot live under these repeated innovations; we must stop the one or bid adieu to the other.

Contested-Election Case.

SPEECH OF HON. S. N. PETTIS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 18 and 20, 1869.

The House having under consideration the contested-election case of Chaves vs. Clever, from the Territory of New Mexico—

Mr. PETTIS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no ambition that seeks gratification by unnecessarily trespassing upon the time and patience of my associates here, and especially when the consideration of questions of vital importance to the people and the country are demanding the attention of Congress, and my apology for what might under other circumstances be considered an obtrusion is found in the fact that the relation which I sustain to the report now under consideration makes it proper that I should ask the indulgence of the House for a short time.

This subject embraces the old question of wrong by which our fathers were oppressed, and involves the invasion or protection of the dearest interests that belong to an American citizen, his personal, political rights. The charge that the contestant makes is, that by fraud and violence he has been deprived of a seat in this House in consequence of the false and fraudulent return of votes by bad men to the territorial officials of New Mexico, and his people denied a representation upon this floor by the representative of their choice. This is denied by the sitting Delegate, and thus the issue formed between the parties to this contest.

The testimony in the case is voluminous, and upon it and the law bearing upon the controversy the parties and their counsel were fully heard.

Of the 17,606 votes cast, as returned to the secretary of the Territory, it appeared from the abstracts and poll-books forwarded by the probate judges of the various counties that the sitting Delegate had received a majority of 540, and upon that showing a certificate of election was given to him, and upon it he was admitted to a seat upon this floor. The contestant, Colonel Chaves, anticipating that result, after learning that Mr. Clever had received the certificate of election, gave notice of the contest and proceeded to make up his case, which is now here for final decision. He alleged, and the testimony shows, that in some precincts the poll-books were altered and changed, by which in some instances Mr. Clever's vote was materially increased; and in others the contestant's vote was greatly reduced in fraud of his rights and in violation of law. It is true that such charges were and are of a grave character, and the committee gave the whole subject that careful consideration that its importance demanded. In the county of Rio Arriba, at the precinct of Tierra Amarilla, it is alleged that 464 votes were polled, of which Mr. Clever received 452 and Mr. Chaves 12. That state of facts is set forth by the poll-book of that precinct. Colonel Chaves maintains that the poll-book falsifies the facts, and that only 80 votes were cast at that precinct, of which he received 12 and Mr. Clever 68.

Felipe Madrid, one of the clerks of the election, and Francisco Martin Y. Sanches, one of the judges, testify that 464 votes were polled, of which Mr. Clever received 452 and Mr. Chaves 12.

Juan Ygnacio Miera and Eliseo Salazar depose and say that only 80 or 82 votes were polled, of which Mr. Clever received 68 and Colonel Chaves received 12. Miera was an educated man, and, as he testifies, was present and an attentive observer of the election during the whole day, and saw the votes counted and heard the result announced that I have already stated.

Eliseo Salazar testifies to the same effect. He was a candidate for the office of senator, and was present from the casting of the third or fourth ballot; was at the table at which the votes were received the whole day; kept a tally-list of the votes polled, and that when the polls closed heard the judges and secretaries announce that Mr. Clever had received 68 votes, and Colonel Chaves 12 votes.

The credibility of the statement of Felipe Madrid is questioned by the testimony of Rafael Sovats, who states that he saw him a day or two after the election coming with the ballot-box and poll-books from Tierra Amarilla to the county seat, and that he told him that the number of votes cast at that precinct was 82, of which Mr. Clever had received 68 votes and Colonel Chaves 12.

The credibility of the statement of Francisco Martin Y. Sanches, one of the judges, is impeached by the testimony of Major José D. Sena, sheriff of the county of Sante Fé, who testifies that shortly after the election Francisco Martin Y. Sanches, the judge of election, and who testifies on behalf of Mr. Clever, told him that to the best of his recollection the number of votes cast at Tierra Amarilla did not exceed 100; and yet this man testified six months afterward that 464 were polled at that precinct. It would appear, therefore, that the preponderance of testimony as between those witnesses—two on each side—is in favor of Mr. Chaves, as the veracity of his witnesses has not been questioned. And then there is evidence corroborating the testimony of the contestant's two witnesses that goes a great way toward establishing the position claimed by Colonel Chaves. At the election held at this precinct the year previous for county officers and members of the Legislature only 37 votes were polled, and the year following the election now in controversy the registration list of this precinct shows only 119 legal votes; yet the returns of this election held during the intermediate year exhibit about four times the number registered the next succeeding year.

The poll-book of this precinct will not bear inspection. The names of the two clerks of the election, Felipe Madrid and Miguel Gallegos, are signed very differently on the last page to the certificate from what they are on the first page to the oath. The name of the latter on the first page is written "migelle-gas," on the last to the certificate, it is written Miguel "Gallegus," and it is apparent that on each page the same person wrote the names; or, in other words, that one person wrote the two names on one page, and some other person the two names on the other page. And it is strikingly obvious that the name pretending to be that of Miguel Gallegos was written by different persons on the different pages. This is demonstrated by the difference both in penmanship and orthography; and a strong circumstance going to show that he did not in either case write the name purporting to be his signature is found in the fact that this name is not properly spelled in either instance, and it is a rational presumption that a man knows how to spell his own name. In this point of view the poll-book wears the appearance of having been foully handled.

The clerk of the judge of probate, who appears to have been a friend to Mr. Clever in the election, testifies that the poll-book of this precinct was made, and the leaves stitched together just as they now are, when he sent it to the precinct; but an inspection of the poll-book indicates clearly that such could not have been the case, for it was manifestly stitched together after the names had been recorded and the figures designating the respective numbers of the votes had been written, as the stitches in some instances pass through the first figure of the respective numbers, indicating that the poll-book had been tampered with after it left the hands of the officers of the election, that votes had been fraudulently added, or that the poll-book had been reconstructed or fabricated entire and the names and figures written therein before it was sewed together and after it had passed into the hands of the judge of probate, or at least that the votes and figures therein recorded were not written during the election, as the figures could not have been so written while the book was in this manner stitched.

A circumstance going strongly to corroborate or strengthen the witnesses of Mr. Chaves in their statement that there were only 80 votes polled for Delegate at this precinct is to be found in the fact that the other party has failed to take the testimony of Miguel Galligos, the clerk of election, whose name on the poll-book was evidently twice forged, and also the testimony of Bernardo Sanches and Juan Lopez, who were judges of the election. If it were true that 464 votes had been polled, as alleged, Mr. Clever might, by bringing those men forward, have had five witnesses to the fact, and the presumption is that their depositions were not taken because they could not conscientiously testify that 464 votes were polled. Mr. Clever is left to rely for proof of his large vote at this precinct on the manifestly unfair poll-book and the witnesses, whose testimony is somewhat discredited, and who are contradicted by two other witnesses whose veracity stands unimpeached, and who testify that there were only 80 votes polled for Delegate at this precinct, of which 68 were for Mr. Clever and 12 for Mr. Chaves.

A careful examination of the poll-books of this precinct, and an analysis of the testimony on both sides, taken in connection with corroborating circumstances, leave no doubt of the correctness of the witnesses Juan Ygnacio Mierro and Eliseo Salazar, who testify that only 80 votes were cast for Delegate at Tierra Amarilla; and that being the case, Mr. Chaves becomes entitled to a credit of 384 votes which were improperly and unlawfully counted for Mr. Clever. Beyond that I would say that I have no doubt that the whole poll-book is a forgery, and that not a leaf or scrap of it was before the board of election upon election day; that is, at the polls.

From the precinct of Santa Clara, in the county of Mora, 209 votes were returned—19 for the contestant and 190 for Clever. Colonel Chaves contends that only 52 votes were polled—32 for Mr. Clever and 19 or 20 for Colonel Chaves.

José Angel Padilla testifies that he knew that only 52 votes were polled; that he derived his knowledge of that fact from seeing the poll-list all day, and the numbers on the poll-list as the names of the voters were taken down by the clerks of the election, and from counting the votes as they were polled.

Benigno Baca, one of the judges of election, testifies that he thinks there were 209 or 210 votes, and that, though he could not read or write, he supposed that the true number was put down by the clerks of election, and that he knew it because the other judges could read and write, and he was present at the counting of the votes.

Manuel Abieta says that he arrived at the polls after the votes were counted, and that it was publicly announced by the clerks and judges that there were over 200 votes given, and that Chaves had received 18 votes and Clever the "balance." The other two judges were not called by Mr. Clever to testify, nor was the clerk, Fernando Nolan, who was a candidate for the Legislature on the Clever ticket. The contestant summoned Nolan, but he refused to attend, and was lurking around the place of taking testimony while it was going on, showing reluctance to testify. At this precinct only five months previous to this election for Delegate 185 votes only were polled at an election for local officers, and in 1868, the next year after the election for Delegate, the registration list showed only 106, yet it is pretended that 209 votes were polled at an election in the intermediate year.

An examination of the poll-book discloses beyond all question its total want of integrity. The names of the three judges, Jesus Barreras, Jorge Chaves, and Benigno Baca, and the name of the clerk, Fernando Nolan, as purporting to have been subscribed to the oath, are all written in the same handwriting, and the same name as signed to the certificate of the result are also written manifestly by one person, but in a handwriting entirely different from that in which they are written on the first page. The name of Jesus Barreras is spelled properly as subscribed to the oath, but in the signature to the certificate it is spelled Bareras. The Christian name of Jorge Chaves is spelled Jorge to the oath and George to the certificate. The Christian name of Benigno Baca is spelled improperly Benino in both places. The name of the justice of the peace purporting to have sworn the officers in is written to the jurat Bernardo Torres, the surname, which is Torres, being spelled wrong. The name of the same man is signed as justice of the peace, on the last page, Bemandia Torres—the surname being spelled wrong in the first instance and the Christian name in the last. There can be no doubt that two different persons wrote all of those names except the name of the clerk, Fernando Nolan, who doubtless wrote all the names on the first page, and even his name was manifestly written by another person in his pretended signature to the certificate. It is very apparent that every name on the poll-list from No. 57 to the end was written by the person who forged the names of the officers to the certificate. Every vote recorded after the forty-third vote was recorded for Mr. Clever. These circumstances clearly indicate that the poll-book of this precinct passed through a severe ordeal of manipulation and impugn the integrity of the entire poll. There can, at least, be no doubt of the correctness of the testimony of José Angel Padilla, for his frank and positive testimony is corroborated by the appearance of the poll-list.

So far as the contestant's allegations are concerned touching the impropriety and illegality of the election in precinct No. 11, known as La Junta precinct, Mora county, the committee found the facts to be as alleged, and that coarse, improper, vulgar, and threatening language was used by the friends and supporters of Mr. Clever, and that it was done to intimidate and prevent persons from voting for the contestant, and yet did not recommend that the entire vote of the county be thrown out, but only the 100 votes that Walter Fosdyke, one of the judges of election and a Clever man, testifies were fraudulently added to the poll-list and the certificate changed and forged so as to correspond with the fraudulent alteration or addition. The committee should have probably gone further and thrown out the vote of the camp-followers and lawless persons who voted in violation of law at such precinct.

In this connection Mr. Fosdyke says that only 543 votes were cast, and that 100 were inserted in the poll-book after he had signed the certificate. Mr. Fosdyke is a man in high standing, and his statements touching this matter are corroborated by the certificate, the book, and the alterations apparent upon inspection. Mr. James F. Johnson testified that Mr. Fosdyke stands as high as any man in the Territory, and that nothing can be said against him either as a man of truth or honor. Mr. Fosdyke says that after the closing of the polls he, with the other officers of election, having signed one of the poll-books and attested the result of the election, turned the poll-books and ballot-box over to Mr. Nelson, one of the clerks of the election; that he went to the house of a Mr. Kronig the next morning after the election to see Mr. Mink, and could not find him anywhere; that about eleven o'clock Mink and Nelson came out of a private room where they had been closeted during the morning, Nelson having the ballot-box under his arm. James F. Johnson testifies that he had a conversation with this same Mr. Mink just before the election, in which Mink said, "We must beat them, and even take our old books and get all the names of the hired men and take the list and put their names upon the poll-books," and that he meant that Clever must beat Chaves. This is the Mr. Mink who was cloistered with Mr. Nelson and the ballot-box and poll-books, doubtless with a view of executing the fraud suggested in his conversation with Johnson. Mr. Nelson was subpoenaed by Mr. Chaves to testify in this case, but he failed to appear, having left the country.

I am not at all clear that it was not the duty of the committee to recommend the throwing out of the whole vote of Mora county. The returns were not made by the judge of probate to the secretary as the law requires. The statute is explicit upon this subject. The returns of each county are to be sent by "special messenger to the secretary of the Territory," and the law recognizes no other mode of transmission. The returns from Mora county were not so forwarded, but were placed by the probate judge in the hands of one Harris, at Fort Union, a partisan of Mr. Clever, and by him sent through the medium of a common carrier to R. B. Mitchell, Governor of the Territory. Harris, to whom the judge of probate handed the returns, states that he inclosed them in a certain kind of paper and directed the package as follows: "Governor Robert B. Mitchell, Santa Fé, New Mexico; value, $5,000," and thus he sent the same by express. It also appeared that the returns were covered by an inner wrapper, which was superscribed as follows: "Election returns for Mora county, New Mexico, 1867. His Excellency Governor R. B. Mitchell, Santa Fé, New Mexico." While Mr. Harris was upon the witness stand he was shown the inner wrapper, and he did not recognize the handwriting of the superscription or the superscription itself as ever having seen either before. He testified that the inner wrapping, on which was written the address that he did not recognize, was in the form of a sack or bag, such as merchants use to put sugar and coffee in. Vicente Romero, the judge of probate, testified that the poll-books, when he left them with Mr. Harris for transmission to Santa Fé, were inclosed in common wrapping paper, such as is used in country stores, and not in the form of a sack or bag. By a departure from so plain a provision of the law in the forwarding of the returns an opportunity was afforded for tampering with the official returns; and in view of the fact that the returns from precincts Nos. 11 and 12, La Junta and Santa Clara, were altered, as I have already shown, can any one doubt that they were violated and tampered with? No doubt this unlawful transmission was adopted to facilitate this intermediate manipulation of the returns, as they were bandied about in direct violation of law, and the presumption is not only violent but conclusive that these forgeries and alterations were made while in transitu.

With reference to the vote at the thirteenth or Moreno precinct, in the county of Mora, and which the committee disallowed in their report, the testimony of Vicente Romero, the probate judge of the county, ought to be sufficient evidence of the correctness of the report upon that point, and he testifies that he did not at that time consider that precinct as having any legal existence. But the secretary of the Territory settles the question beyond all cavil by testifying that the precinct was established by the Legislature in January, 1868. The vote of precincts Nos. 13 and 14 in the county were excluded by the committee, and rightfully, for they were not established by law until the next year after the election of September, 1867, and 153 votes more were returned for Mr. Clever than Mr. Chaves. The first of such precincts was known as Rio Bonito, the second as La Valle de Missouri, in the county of Socorro.

The proceeding of the probate judge in the county of Dona Anna as disclosed by the testimony was extraordinary, not to say outrageous and criminal. He was himself a candidate for election upon the Clever ticket; and by the returns from the different precincts as made by the judges and clerks he was defeated, and Clever 169 votes behind Colonel Chaves. The vote of his county was, by a process to which I will presently refer, changed from a majority of 169 for Chaves to 144 for Clever, and the defeated probate judge declared elected by the fraudulent and unauthorized acts of himself and those acting under and with him. Of 890 votes that had been cast and returned for Mr. Chaves 168 of that number were rejected, as the master of ceremonies would have it, for illegality and insufficiency of the returns, and 805 stricken from the poll-books outright.

The sitting Delegate rests the authority for the exercise of such power by the probate judge on a law of the Territory, which directs him to publicly examine and count the votes polled for each candidate. The authority so claimed for the probate judge's action is simply monstrous. It is the first real board of political inquisition that ever fell under my observation. The terrible system of frauds in the city of New York, which my colleague [Mr. KELLEY], charged as having been perpetrated there in November last, and which was so warmly and emphatically thrown back by the honorable member from New York [Mr. BROOKS] as having been originated in Philadelphia, whiten when compared with those disclosed in this case, and which have nothing but their coarseness and boldness to recommend them to the favor of this House. The twenty-second section of the compiled laws of the Territory of New Mexico, page 436, is in these words:

"SEC. 22. All votes shall be by ballot, each voter being required to deliver his own vote in person. Each ticket shall be numbered, and the number placed opposite the name of the voter; said ticket shall in no case be examined unless the election be contested, but shall be delivered by the judges of the election to the probate judge of the county, who shall retain them until the expiration of the time allowed for the contesting of the election, and they shall then be destroyed."

Section seventeen of the same law only authorizes the judge, as canvasser, to examine the regularity of the returns or votes. The authority to decide upon the legality of votes returned for Delegate, according to law, by the judges of election to the judge of probate, belongs exclusively to the House of Representatives.

The probate judge rejected the vote of precinct No. 6, in this county, because the people at the opening of the polls appointed a judge of election in place of an absentee, which was done under section fifteen of the election law of the Territory, page 434, which is substantially a copy of a provision that is to be found upon the statutes of nearly every State, and is in the words following:

"SEC. 15. If any probate judge should fail to appoint the judges provided by this act, or if from any cause they shall fail to attend to their respective precincts on the day of the election, it shall be lawful for a majority of the qualified voters, in the precinct where said vacancy occurs, to appoint judges, who shall conduct said election in the same manner and to the same effect as if they had been appointed by the judge of probate as provided in this act."

The returns from precinct No. 7 were rejected on the ground that the clerks did not sign the poll-books and certificate, although the judges had, while the poll-books of precinct No. 12, in Mora county, subject to the same objection, were allowed, the one varying or differing with the other only in this, that the one allowed polled a majority for Clever, and the one rejected cast a majority for Colonel Chaves.

It appears from the testimony that 23 votes for Mr. Clever were rejected as illegal by the judges of election at precinct No. 3 in the city of Santa Fé, but that the judges were subsequently induced to count them, in the returns, for Mr. Clever, under the influence of threats and intimidation on the part of his friends, who attended the polls armed with pistols and bludgeons.

It is alleged by Mr. Clever that 82 alien votes were polled for Mr. Chaves in the county of Santa Fé. He alludes to a certain class of persons who were citizens of the Republic of Mexico when by the fortunes of war between the United States and that republic the region of country of which the Territory of New Mexico is now a part became ceded to the United States, and who by the stipulations of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo were clothed with the privilege of retaining the character of Mexican citizens, provided the declaration of an intention to retain their allegiance to their former sovereign should be made within a period designated by the said treaty.

For the purpose of proving that the alleged 82 alien votes were polled by persons who, in pursuance of that treaty stipulation, had declared their intention to retain the character of Mexican citizens, the sitting Delegate took the testimony of Donacraña Vigil, who testified that he filled the office of acting Governor of the Territory of New Mexico under the Harney code; that he continued in that office until Colonel John M. Washington entered on the duties of the office of civil and military governor of New Mexico; that he was in the discharge of the duties of secretary of the Territory when Colonel Washington issued a proclamation requiring the inhabitants of the Territory to elect whether they would retain the character of Mexican citizens; that by virtue of said proclamation a book of registry was ordered to be opened in the offices of the several precincts of the Territory, in which the names of those who wished to retain the character of Mexican citizens should be recorded; that he saw from the list of names of persons residing in the county of Santa Fé—which seems to have been handed to him while testifying—that those names, to the best of his recollection, were in the book of registry opened in the said county for the reception of the names of those who wished to retain the character of Mexican citizens, when the said book was returned to the secretary's office by the judge of probate of the county of Santa Fé.

Witnesses are then introduced to prove that persons of the same names voted for Mr. Chaves in the election now in contest. If those persons registered their names as evidence of their intention to retain the character of Mexican citizens under the provisions of the treaty, their act became a subject of record, and that record should have been produced, or, if the record could not have been obtained, a certified copy of the same should have been produced, and if the record had been lost or destroyed, its absence should have been accounted for. The rule of evidence is, that the best evidence must be produced of which the nature of the case is susceptible. When better evidence is withheld it is fair to presume that the party had some sinister motive for not producing it, and that, if offered, his design would be frustrated. Besides, there was no evidence of identity to show that the persons who were alleged to have declared their intention to retain the character of Mexican citizens, though they bore the same names, were the identical persons who voted for Mr. Chaves. Other attempts seem to have been made by Mr. Clever to show, from the same cause, ineligibility on the part of those who voted for Mr. Chaves, but his testimony has been insufficient for the purpose.

It seems, then, from the evidence that it was before the election in 1867 resolved upon by bad men that Colonel Chaves was to be defeated and Mr. Clever elected. When an offense against the laws, against the rights of the people of the Territory—saying nothing of the rights of the contestant that were to be stricken down by the conspiracy against the ballot-box, was so early and coolly planned—can anybody affect surprise at the disclosures made in the testimony showing that after the election had been held, and under circumstances unauthorized, in unusual places, illegal voters permitted to vote, because resistance was dangerous to life, and persons prevented from voting by intimidation and threats of violence; that after all this being adjudged legal that still the contestant was elected; that a resort was had in the precinct Tierra Amerilla to add nearly 400 votes to Mr. Clever's majority, and smaller majorities in several others; and that failing still to overcome Colonel Chaves's majority, that bad men resolved upon the last conceivable monstrosity in this connection, and cap the climax of villainy by absolutely rejecting 393 votes that had been cast for Colonel Chaves in Donna Ana county, without objection or challenge, with nothing to commend such action save bold-faced impudence and brazen insolence, and all in order to falsify the records of the county, that a lie might be put in its mouth, and it made to say that instead of Colonel Chaves being the choice of her people as a representative Delegate in this House by a majority of 169, that Mr. Clever was by a majority of 144. I may say that it matters not whether the acts producing such results were virtuous or vicious, it is enough to know that they were unauthorized, for the injury is the same in either case to the contestant and an outraged people.

The evil which men do live after them, and nothing is more foolish than injustice. The bad faith of these ballot-box stuffers and election-return manipulators, repeaters and rejectors, come back to pester and plague them and theirs. Mink, Madrid, and Lemon, and their associates will die, but their infamy in this transaction is on record and will live after them, reaching down through the tide of time to the third and fourth generation, and will stick to the ribs of their posterity, and like a chronic infirmity will be felt at every change of weather. And now when this nation is emerging from the sea of trouble and error into which it had fallen because of the wrong of her people, and when the dry land has at last rose through the great sea of blood and crime, I beg of you do not by your action in this case do that which recognizes in that struggling Territory that has united her fortunes, her interests, and her honor with our own, that force, violence, and disregard of law—that is but another name for rebellion—and would have better graced a society whose chief accomplishments were whips, chains, yokes, thumb-screws, blood-hounds and brothels, than the age in which we live. Every injury superinduced by a wrong act must be repaired by the power having control in the premises, and this upon a principle of primary and necessary justice; otherwise all the points of social and political contact, instead of points of coherence, would become points of repulsion, and society would soon cease.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. WOODWARD,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1869,

On the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

MR. WOODWARD. I wish to say a few words to-day in behalf of the people of Pennsylvania. The constitution of the State of Pennsylvania of 1790 was silent on the subject of negro suffrage. A diversity of opinion and practice to a limited extent grew up under that constitution. In some sporadic instances colored men were permitted to vote; but at length the question came before the highest judicial tribunal of the State, and it was decided that the constitution of 1790, rightly understood, never permitted negro suffrage.

That decision was based upon this ground, that the negro race never had become a part of the social compact of this country, a conclusion that was deduced from the history of the negro race and their introduction into this country as slaves. It resulted very logically out of the great principle of the Declaration of Independence, that all just Governments should be founded in the consent of the governed. A subject, inferior, ignorant, and idolatrous race, introduced into a country against their will to be slaves, would be greatly wronged in being treated as having consented to the government of that country. The African race has never consented to the government of this country. They are exotic, they are alien, they are strangers to the Commonwealth. They were brought here in violation of the laws of nature; they were thrust upon us without their consent and without ours; and according to Pennsylvania law they never became parties to the social compact upon which all our political institutions are founded.

The people of Pennsylvania, penetrated with these truths, which their judiciary had thus recognized, amended in 1837 their constitution of 1790, and in defining the qualifications of electors inserted the word "white" before the word "freeman." This was not only agreed to in their constitutional convention after great deliberation, but that amendment was submitted, with other amendments, to a vote of the people of Pennsylvania. And, sir, it is a part of the history of the times that those who were opposed to the reform of the constitution were especially opposed to this amendment, because of the popularity which it gave to the other amendments. I point the House to the fact that the people of Pennsylvania thus, through their judicial tribunals and by their own popular elections, decided as solemnly as it is possible for freemen to decide that the negro race was no party to the social compact and should not be admitted to the suffrage.

HO. OF REPS.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment—Mr. Woodward.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that decree has never been reversed. On the contrary, all political parties have recognized it and submitted to it. The Republican party, as often as they have been charged with intending to take out of the foundations of our State government that corner-stone, have asserted that they were slandered; that they intended nothing of the sort. They have pointed to the Chicago platform in confirmation of their assertions. In consequence of this disavowal they enjoyed in the last election, and in all the late elections in our State, a very large Welsh vote, which, I tell them, they will lose from the day that they force negro suffrage upon the people. They have enjoyed that Welsh vote by reason of their persistent and apparently consistent denial that they were for negro suffrage. The Welsh do not like the Irish; there is a lack of congeniality between the two classes on account of religion and other causes. The Republican party, while they cannot carry the great body of the Irish population, can carry a large proportion of the Welsh so long as, and only so long as, they can persuade that people they are honest in their professions against negro suffrage.

The effect of the proposition now before us is to change the fundamental law of Pennsylvania, to reverse the historic and traditional policy of the State, to introduce into the politics of that great Commonwealth this alien, foreign, unnatural element, which down to the present time the Republican party have told the people never was to be a part of their policy. I ask of the gentleman from Massachusetts and of this House that before this change of policy be adopted the whole people of Pennsylvania be allowed to pass upon the question. What answer does the gentleman give to this request? He has answered, sir, in your hearing, that he cannot allow the offering of an amendment looking to that end because the Constitution forbids him. I, standing here, asking the gentleman from Massachusetts to do an unconstitutional thing when I beg him to submit his amendment to a vote of the people! Well, sir, if the gentleman from Massachusetts had never done any unconstitutional thing it would undoubtedly be a very great sin in me to tempt him into transgression. But, Mr. Speaker, let me tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that I asked him to violate no constitutional provision when I asked him to submit this amendment to the people of Pennsylvania. And, sir, within five minutes after he refused to entertain my proposition, he stood in his place and declared, as the report in the Globe will show to-morrow, that this constitutional amendment was to be submitted to the people of this country. I deny that.

Its submission to the people, in the fair sense of the term, is exactly what I demand. The present Legislature of Pennsylvania was elected last October. It was elected while the Republicans were complaining that the Democrats were slandering them in charging them with intending to introduce negro suffrage. That charge was declared to be a defamation upon the fair fame of the Republican party. And yet it is to this present Legislature the gentleman insists upon submitting the amendment. A Legislature not only not elected to consider any such subject, but elected in the midst of profuse denials that such a subject was to come before them. On this question they do not represent the people—were never chosen to represent them. If the gentleman will say that this Legislature was elected to consider this or any similar amendment I will give up the discussion. Nay, I will give him anything I have to give if he will hazard that statement. But he will not, and the fact must remain unchallenged that you are about to call upon a body of representatives to ratify your amendment who do not represent the people upon this question. The ratification might just as well be submitted to any other body of men—it might just as well not be submitted at all.

What I propose is, that the amendment shall be submitted to a Legislature, the most popular branch of which shall be chosen after this date, with this question before the eyes of the people.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says that is unconstitutional. Why? Because we cannot select the Legislature to which to submit our amendments. I deny his premises. I say that the Constitution devolves upon us the duty of selecting the representative body to which we shall submit amendments. When I read the words of the Constitution you will see I am right. It is as follows:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress."

There, sir, is the constitutional devolution of the duty to exercise our discretion as between a Legislature and a convention to pass upon amendments. The duty involves the power. If we must choose between a Legislature and a convention, we may choose a Legislature or a convention elected last year, or to be elected this year. The Constitution does not shut us up to Legislatures now in session. We may take any Legislature that shall fairly and reasonably represent the people. And the ground on which I maintain that our discretion should be exercised in favor of a future instead of the existing Legislature is, that the people may have a chance to choose representatives with a view to this question. What right had the gentleman to say that the amendment was to be submitted to the people? It cannot be submitted to the people by being submitted to the present Legislature. Nobody knows that better than the gentleman from Massachusetts.

When you have matured the form of your proposition, throw it before the Legislature to be chosen next fall, and let the people understand that when we Democrats charged you Republicans with plotting for negro suffrage we did not slander you, but spoke only the truth. Put your amendment before representatives of the people chosen after you have shown your hands, and if they ratify it I will agree never to raise my voice again in opposition to negro suffrage.

Having said thus much in behalf of an amendment which the gentleman from Massachusetts will not let me offer, I improve the opportunity to add a few more thoughts on the general subject of negro suffrage. I have shown the House what has been the fixed position of Pennsylvania in all time on this subject. For more than thirty years all parties have acquiesced in the rule of white suffrage. So far as I remember no public man in Pennsylvania has proposed a repeal of the rule. Even the late Mr. Stevens, whose opinions were extreme on all subjects, never brought forward any measure to alter our constitution in this regard. He would not sign the constitution, as a member of the convention, and no doubt he would have voted to his dying breath to expunge the word "white." So also, had he been spared, would he have lifted up his eloquent voice to persuade the people of Pennsylvania to change their fundamental law and give the ballot to the negro; but, sir, I persuade myself that he would not have been guilty of the insincerity and duplicity that have characterized the conduct of the Republican party on this question. Having denied again and again that this issue was in last fall's election, Mr. Stevens would have said, with characteristic candor, the representatives then chosen do not necessarily represent the people on this question, let it go to the next representatives they may choose. Not only have all white men in Pennsylvania acquiesced for thirty-two years in the rule of white suffrage, but so also have the black men. I cannot recall a single instance in which any representatives of that class of our citizens have asked for a change. The colored people of Pennsylvania are a quiet, orderly, and respectable population. They enjoy full protection of all civil rights. Pennsylvania abolished slavery in 1780 by an act whose preamble is often quoted to attest her abhorrence of the institution, but whose substantive provisions show that she was no more unmindful of the rights of sister States than she was of the rights of the negro race. With us the negro is esteemed according to his individual merits. If he is industrious, sober, and honest he is respected and patronized. I have many friends among them, and cherishing only the kindest feelings for them, I am incapable of doing anything in my representative capacity to their prejudice.

But, sir, the ballot will be no boon to them. The assertion that it is necessary to the protection of their civil rights is false, and, so far as Pennsylvania is concerned, is slanderous. The negro no more needs the ballot in Pennsylvania for his security than the women do for theirs. The whole history of that grand old Commonwealth shows that the weak, the ignorant, the poor, the dependent have been cared for by her with a maternal solicitude. Look at her common-schools, her colleges, her asylums for the blind, the deaf and dumb, the insane; her hospitals for the sick, her houses of correction for the erring, her prisons for the guilty, her laws for the poor, for married women, her system of intestacy. What can Christianity or civilization do for the lowly, the poor, and the distressed that Pennsylvania has not done? Who dares to stand up and accuse her of robbing the negro of his rights? Who has the audacity to assert that the ballot is essential to the negro's safety and welfare? Founded by deeds of peace, Pennsylvania has been just to all men, whether red or black or white, and he wrongs her grievously who would undermine her institutions upon the poor and false pretense that her citizens of African descent are oppressed. It is not so.

But though this amendment is uncalled for even by the negroes of Pennsylvania, and is subversive of our fundamental law, it is supposed it will be a step toward universal suffrage which gentlemen speak of as a great and beneficent reform. I cannot help thinking, sir, that such opinions are founded in a misapprehension of the nature of suffrage. Having on a former occasion stated my views somewhat at length on this head, I will not enter again into the subject, but will content myself with saying that suffrage is not a natural right any more than any other municipal regulation which experience has shown to be expedient. It does not belong to manhood in the sense in which the rights of life and liberty do; but it is a political trust which the majority may bestow where it will best subserve the general welfare. It is a conventional as contradistinguished from a natural right. Its bestowal, limitations, and exercise are regulated by the law of convenience or expediency. The question always ought to be, will a proposed extension of suffrage promote the peace and welfare of the body-politic? When Louis Napoleon in the coup d'état that made him a despot decreed universality of suffrage, he demonstrated how this beneficent reform of which we hear so much could be made the instrument of an inexorable tyranny; and the same reformer who extended the basis of suffrage at Athens brought in with it the odious ostracism by which the greatest and best men of the city were banished. These and many other examples that might be cited ought to teach us that when suffrage is hastened or extended by force or fraud, instead of growing up out of the experience of the people, it is a curse and not a blessing.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Executive and Judicial Power—Mr. Ashley.

HO. OF REPS.

Our written constitutions are the outcroppings of our national life. Until lately they were formed, not on the wild dreams of theorists, but to record the conclusions of experience. What the common mass have found to be good for themselves they have secured in their constitutions, State and Federal. Suffrage has been left to each State to bestow or withhold according to its discretion. Nowhere has it been extended to women or minors or unnaturalized foreigners. Why? If a natural right, a God-given inheritance to manhood, as it is sometimes called, why should it be withheld from these classes? It is withheld from them on the same reason it is in Pennsylvania withheld from negroes—expediency. Human experience has proved that the trust could be best executed by excluding these classes, and, as in all other trusts, the selection of a trustee on ground of expediency is no affront to those who are not selected. Everybody except those strong-minded women who, not just representatives of their sex and "most ignorant of what they are most assured," clamor for "women's rights," would probably agree that it would be a degradation to the female sex to involve them in the responsibilities of the ballot. Universal experience attests that they are not suitable trustees; and, therefore by an almost universal consent, they are set aside. The reasons for setting aside the negro are stronger and better than those which apply to females. Between him and the white man there is an ineradicable distinction that must forever prevent that free, social intercourse on which alone popular suffrage can be based.

This distinction, if it be not inflamed into hostility by bad legislation, does not prevent the two races from dwelling together harmoniously in the same community, assisting each other in the labors and the charities of life, and contributing to their mutual welfare. But when you attempt to force them into social and political equality you inflame the passions of both parties and destroy the harmony of their relations. Out of these conflicts the weaker must inevitably come most damaged. It is impossible to provoke a conflict between the African and the Anglo-Saxon races in which finally the African will not be worsted. For a while you can force a sort of equality upon him by a standing army and the Freedmen's Bureau; you can oppress your own fellow-countrymen in the hope that the African will keep you at the public crib, but as surely as God has made intellect superior to matter and the white man to the black, the country in which they dwell together must be governed by white men. They will not, they cannot maintain a peaceful partnership in this matter. Call it prejudice or what you will, philosophize and moralize upon it as you may, the fact remains that one is black and the other is white, and therefore they cannot coöperate in exercising political trusts. I do not say that one may enslave the other—the superior may be compelled to respect the civil rights of the inferior race—but they cannot long be co-trustees of suffrage without riots and bloodshedding. If the time ever comes that the political destinies of this country, even for one presidential term, are controlled by negroes, it will be the darkest day that ever dawned upon that unfortunate race. May God in his mercy to them and us avert that day!

Now, sir, it is from considerations of expediency that I oppose negro suffrage. It is the good of the negro as well as of the white man that prompts my opposition. It is my desire that they may live together in peace and happiness, as always heretofore in Pennsylvania, that leads me to deprecate this amendment. And especially have we in Pennsylvania a right to complain when, in violation of all precedent, of all constitutional law, of your own party platform, and of the peace of our Commonwealth, you repeal our constitution without giving us a right to vote against your amendment. If such a high-handed wrong does not wake up the people of Pennsylvania to the revolutionary schemes of the Republican party; if they can be beguiled by fair speeches into the support of such a measure as this; if they are ready to have the negro thrust into political partnership in contempt of their solemnly recorded will, why then, sir, a sad and sickening degeneracy has come upon my native State, and, for the first time in life, I shall blush to own myself her son. Africa never so demeaned herself. The hardy savages of the mountain slopes in the interior of that continent never debased themselves to the level of the Bushmen and Hottentots of the Cape of Good Hope. No, no, sir, they could be torn from kindred and homes by the cruel slave trader and borne away to distant lands to be slaves, but they never would, and never did, voluntarily surrender to an inferior tribe of their own race much less to an inferior race. And have we, proud Americans, so lost our ancestral traditions that we can no longer be inspired even by African example?

We have seen in history the proud Roman refusing citizenship to the most illustrious aliens; we have seen the Goth and Hun and Vandal trample Roman grandeur into dust; we have glowed over the struggles between the Norman and the Saxon, the Cavalier and the Roundhead, the Briton and the Scot, all of them jealous of their nationalities and ready to shed their blood in defense of what they had inherited from their ancestors. But now, in this nineteenth century, we are to be held up as the first example in the world's history of a great people surrendering political trusts to one of the lowest and feeblest races of the world's population. The Anglo-Saxon of American descent giving up the inheritance which has made him great to the African! Not to the African in the wild freedom of his native jungles, but to the enfeebled, timid, ignorant descendant of a race of slaves! And these are to be made voters and law-givers, to be our judges and representatives. Is there any profounder depth of self-degradation than this? If there be I have not courage to explore it.

The Executive and Judicial Power of the Nation has Increased, is Increasing, and must be Diminished.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. ASHLEY,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1869.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: At the last session I proposed an amendment to the national Constitution which provided for the abolition of the office of Vice President, and for the nomination and election of the President without the intervention of caucuses, conventions, or presidential electors. In addition to this there was a clause which provided that the election of a President should never devolve, as now, on the House of Representatives.

When submitting that proposition I intended to do no more than suggest the practicability of abolishing the office of Vice President and to call the attention of the thoughtful men of the nation to the admitted defect in our present system of electing the President. I did not expect to secure, either at that session or this, the favorable action of Congress on that proposition; nor do I now expect to secure favorable action on the propositions I am about to present. I know how reluctantly the mass of mankind consent to reforms or changes of any kind, especially in matters of government. I know how accustomed they are to run in grooves and how averse they are to agitators and to all ideas which disturb them or jog them out of their old and familiar paths; nor am I unmindful of the fact that it would probably require years of persistent labor to bring the people to approve the changes in their organic law which I propose. John Stuart Mill, in speaking of governmental reform, says that "there is a natural prejudice against everything which professes much; that its perfection stands in its way and is the great obstacle to its success." Admitting the full force of this statement, and realizing how thankless is the self-imposed task which I am about to undertake, I nevertheless feel it to be my duty, before the expiration of my term of service, to offer for the consideration of the people, and especially for the consideration of those who are soon to be charged with the administration of the Government, the propositions which I now make for amending the national Constitution. The Clerk will please read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio why he offers these propositions now; if, as he says, he has no hope of their passage during this Congress.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks me why I introduce these propositions now if I have no hope of their passage. After the amendments are read, and before submitting the observations which I propose to make, I will answer him. Let the amendment providing for the modification of the veto power be read first.

THE VETO POWER.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out clauses two and three in section seven of the Constitution and insert the following:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the House in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration a majority of all the members elected and qualified in that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the President's objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by a majority of all the members elected and qualified in that House it shall become a law. But in all cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by the yeas and nays, and the name of the person voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal in each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law. Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him shall be repassed by the Senate and House of Representatives according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I also offer the following as a new article, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Provide for the Appointment of Cabinet Officers.

ARTICLE — There shall be an executive council to aid the President of the United States in administering the Government; they shall keep a record of each meeting and of all official transactions, which record shall at all times be subject to examination by a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress. The executive council shall consist of a Secretary of State, a Secretary of the Treasury, a Secretary of War and Navy, a Secretary of the Interior, an Attorney General, and a Postmaster General; they shall hold their offices for six years, and be elected as follows: the Senators and Representatives shall meet annually on the second Monday in December (unless Congress by law appoint a different day) in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in joint convention, and proceed to elect, under such rules and regulations as the Congress may by law prescribe, the members of the executive council hereinbefore named, each Senator and Representative having one vote, and a majority of all the votes given shall be necessary to the choice of a member of the executive council; they shall be elected separately, and the term of office for each shall commence on the 4th day of March next succeeding their election. Immediately after their first election the members of said executive council shall assemble and determine by lot which of their number shall go out of office at the expiration of each year, so that one member of the executive council shall thereafter be elected annually. Congress shall provide by law for any vacancy which may occur in the executive council between the periods of each annual election, and shall at the time appointed for their regular joint meeting elect a person for the unexpired term caused by such vacancy. All questions arising during the sessions of the joint convention shall, on the demand of one fifth of the Senators and Representatives present, be determined by yeas and nays; and the names of the persons voting for and against any proposition shall be entered on a journal to be kept for that purpose, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be the clerk of such joint convention. Any member of the executive council may be removed from office by a concurrent vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, separately given. Each member of the executive council, with the approval of a majority of said council, including the President, shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint all officers for his Department which by law may require the confirmation of the Senate. The persons thus appointed and confirmed and all other officers or agents in any Department may be removed in such manner as Congress shall by law provide.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will say to my friend from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] that I offer these amendments as I have heretofore offered other propositions which at the time of offering them I did not hope to see pass. I have sometimes offered propositions for which I had no intention of voting, in order to provoke a discussion of the question presented. For this I have been roundly abused by many, while others have called me the "suggesting member." I offer the propositions which I now submit and advocate them because convinced of their necessity. As the most disgraceful executive Administration which has ever cursed the country is about to die and pass into history, I believe it an opportune moment in which to present and discuss such propositions as I now submit, so that the people may be apprised of the danger which threatens them in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. But you cannot get a vote on them now.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I know that. Only a moment ago I said that I did not offer them with any hope of seeing them passed by this Congress. That does not deter me, however, from presenting and discussing them. I know that many men would not present them unless assured of their favorable reception by their party. I care nothing about that. During my term of service here I have been more concerned to be right than to have personal success or to have the credit of securing the passage of any particular measure. This is well known to my associates here, and especially to gentlemen who for the past ten years have been connected with the public press. I have been more anxious that the work in which I was engaged should be done and well done than I have been about what would happen politically to myself. I have always acted on the theory that politically he who would save his own life should lose it. If in our reconstruction measures the Republican party as a body had acted upon this theory, and gone to the root of the matter and made our Constitution conform to our new condition as a nation, instead of enacting laws and submitting constitutional amendments which were but patch-work, we should not now be environed with the difficulties which surround us. I submit these propositions because I believe they involve practical questions of the highest importance, and because I believe that to statesmen no question affecting the welfare of the nation or the rights of its citizens can be of secondary importance.

Mr. Chairman, I am a firm believer in the necessity of the propositions which I make for the abolition of the kingly prerogatives of the President and for a modification of the veto power, for selecting each of the officers for the Executive Departments by a joint vote of the two Houses of Congress, and providing the manner of appointing and the manner in which all appointees should be removed from office; for limiting the term of service of judges of the Supreme Court, as also their jurisdiction; for making them after their appointment ineligible to any office under the national Government, except, perhaps, foreign ambassadorships, and for retiring them at the end of their term of service on such pay as Congress may deem to be just and proper. No less important, it seems to me, is the question of appointing United States Senators by a direct vote of the qualified electors of each State by ballot, instead of electing them as now by the Legislatures of the several States; and last, though not least, the necessity of securing to the minority an equitable voice in the administration of the Government. To these several propositions I invite the considerate attention of all who recognize the fact that the whole power of the Government is gradually but surely passing into the hands of the President and the Supreme Court.

Mr. Chairman, it is claimed by the advocates of the veto power that under our form of government the Executive represents the whole people, and is the person in whose hands the requisite power ought to be lodged to protect the interests and rights of minorities and to check hasty and inconsiderate legislation. To this I answer that hasty and inconsiderate legislation may be checked and a careful reconsideration had of every bill which Congress may pass by the return of such bill by the President with his objections, and its reconsideration and passage by a majority of all the Senators and Representatives elected and qualified, as I propose in the amendment which I have submitted.

It is a fallacy to suppose that the minority can have any security from the use of the executive veto. The only way in which such protection could be obtained for them would be for the majority in the two Houses of Congress to concede to the minority the President, a proposition which the majority would not entertain for a moment. All know that, as a rule, the party strong enough to elect its President will be strong enough to elect a majority of Representatives of the same political faith, so that there must always be added to the numerical strength of the representative majority the cooperative will of a President of their own selection, armed with the veto power, and the additional power which under our system is secured to the President by the use of the entire patronage of the Government, which, as all know, amounts to many hundred millions.

If we can modify the executive veto and obtain an equitable representation in Congress for the minority, the future of representative government in this country will be secured; without it we cannot have such a negative on the acts of the majority as will afford proper security to the rights of minorities, and the legislative will of partisan majorities will by degrees be concentrated in the hands of the Executive. The experience of the past quarter of a century demonstrates the fact that the whole power of the national Government is gradually but surely passing under the complete control of our Presidents. The struggle of the great political parties for place and power strengthens his authority, and makes his will during his term of office the only law known to partisan Representatives in Congress. Against this violation of the representative principle and this dangerous innovation by our Executives of the fundamental theory upon which our Government was founded I am utterly opposed. All will admit that the veto power conferred upon the Executive by the present Constitution is a power at war with the democratic idea. There are but few men who have given the subject any consideration who will not concede that it is a dangerous power to lodge in the hands of any man, and that it is a power with which no man however able or reputable should be intrusted in a Republic. This power in the hands of any man who is not absolutely infamous or an imbecile enables him, with the use of executive patronage, to defeat the will of the nation so long as he remains in the presidential office. No man has ever discharged the duties of the executive office, nor is it probable that any man ever will, who is so far above the Representatives of the people either in wisdom or patriotism as to justify the lodgment of such vast power in his hands.

I am willing, if after discussion it be thought best, to have some check against hasty and inconsiderate legislation, that the President shall have a modified negative such as I propose, so that the Representatives of the people may avail themselves of any suggestions which a citizen so distinguished as our Presidents ought to be might make to Congress when returning a bill for their reconsideration. I am unwilling, however, to intrust any men with power sufficient to overrule the deliberately formed opinions of a majority of all the men who have been elected and qualified as Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States. The veto power as now conferred by the Constitution makes the will of the President equivalent to that of twelve Senators, where then are seventy-eight members of that body, and equivalent to thirty-eight members of this House, when composed of two hundred and thirty-three members. Thus one man, often a very ordinary man, is made by this anti-democratic provision of our Constitution the equal in legislative power, and the theory is that he is equal in wisdom, to fifty Senators and Representatives when the two Houses together have three hundred and eleven members. For instance, when the States are all represented in the Senate, there are seventy-eight Senators; of this number forty are a majority. If the President veto a bill it requires two thirds of the Senate to repass it, which, in a full Senate with seventy-eight members, requires fifty-two votes. From this it will be seen that the veto power makes the President equal in legislative power to twelve Senators. In the House, with two hundred and thirty-three members present, it requires one hundred and seventeen votes to pass a bill. If the President veto it, it requires one hundred and fifty-six votes to pass it over the veto, which makes the veto power of the President equal to thirty-eight members of the House of Representatives and equivalent to fifty Senators and Representatives, when both Houses number three hundred and eleven members. Add to this monarchical prerogative the overshadowing authority which the appointing power always confers on an executive or king, and you have at the head of the Government a man whose will is practically the law of the land so long as he is able to maintain himself in the presidential office.

The framers of the Constitution intended that there should be three departments in this Government, the legislative, executive, and judicial, and that these departments should be separate and distinct. That was their theory. They held, as I hold, that no free Government can long endure which violates this fundamental theory. If this theory be a correct one, then the Executive of this nation ought not to be clothed with any part of the law-making power. It was intended that our laws should be the embodied will of the nation, as authoritatively expressed by Congress. To execute these laws was to be the duty of the Executive, and I hold that this ought to be his chief duty. To clothe the Executive with the veto power is to make him part of the law-making power, which is a violation of the theory upon which the Government was organized. I shall never cease my war upon this kingly prerogative. I believe it to be utterly indefensible in a democratic republic. Secure the minority an equal personal representation in the national Congress, as I propose, and there can be no necessity for the veto and no pretext for maintaining so despotic and dangerous a power in the hands of any man.

Examine the ye and nay vote of this House for ten years and you will find that when a majority of all propositions were voted upon about one fifth of the members were absent. If one fifth of the members of both Houses are absent when propositions are voted upon, as a rule it will be found that the larger number are of the majority party. In a House of two hundred and thirty-three members we will have, if about one fifth are absent, say, one hundred and ninety votes; of this number ninety-six are a majority. If the President return a bill with his objections, my amendment requires the bill to secure one hundred and seventeen votes to again pass it; whereas under our present Constitution a less number may make two thirds of a quorum and pass the bill over the veto. One hundred and seventeen members make a quorum in a full House composed of two hundred and thirty-three members; a majority of this quorum, or fifty-nine, may pass a bill. If it is vetoed and only a quorum are present, seventy-eight members may pass the bill over the veto, or thirty-nine less than a majority of all the members of the House. Practically, then, the proposition which I make gives the minority all the security they ought to have against hasty and inconsiderate legislation where provision is made that a bill to be repassed must have a majority of all the members elected and qualified in each House. It requires time and labor to bring the absent members here when questions of great importance are pending. A bill, therefore, which on a rehearing passes both Houses by a majority of all the members of each, notwithstanding the President's objections, ought in my opinion to become a law.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Executive and Judicial Power—Mr. Ashley.

HO. OF REPS.

From the organization of the Government to this hour no one question has employed so much of the time and attention of the thoughtful statesmen of the nation as the danger incident to the use and abuse of executive power. When our entire annual revenue from all sources did not exceed $25,000,000, and the number of officers and agents employed by the Government did not number one fifth what they do to-day, this subject engaged the attention for many years of the ablest men in Congress. Clay, Berrien, Badger, Ewing, White, Webster, and many other statesmen of national reputations and conceded abilities all concurred in the necessity of modifying the executive veto and limiting the use of executive patronage. To this last proposition Mr. Calhoun gave much thought and labor, demonstrating its necessity by able speeches and one of the most valuable reports ever submitted on that subject to Congress. No man can read the able reports made to Congress in 1835 and the discussion on these two questions in both Houses of Congress, both before and since that time, without being deeply impressed with the great wisdom and foresight of the men whom I have named.

Some estimate may be formed of the vast patronage now at the disposal of the Executive by an inquiry into the amount of revenue annually collected and disbursed, and the number of officers and agents employed by the Government in its collection and disbursement.

The Clerk will please read the tabular statement which I send to the desk, showing the amount in millions and tenths collected and expended by the Government annually.

The Clerk read as follows:

Table showing the receipts and expenditures of the United States Government in millions of dollars and tenths from July 1, 1851, to June 30, 1868.

Fiscal year.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Balances.
1852.....	612.6	565.7	46.9
1853.....	936.3	899.8	36.5
1854.....	1430.0	1295.5	134.5
1855.....	1940.3	1906.4	33.9
1856.....	1304.8	1139.3	165.5
1857.....	1263.2	1063.1	170.1
1858.....	1200.9	1069.9	131.0
Total in 7 years.....	$688.1	7969.7	718.4
Average per year.....	$241.1	1138.5	102.6

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It will be seen by this table that our average annual receipts for the past seven years were over twelve hundred and forty-one million dollars; that our annual expenditures were over eleven hundred and thirty-eight million dollars, and that there has been on an average during all that time over one hundred million dollars in the public Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, if the ablest statesmen of the past generation were alarmed for the safety of republican institution, because of the use which the executive power could make of the patronage of the Government when its entire revenue did not exceed $25,000,000, and its officers were less than one fifth of the present number, what would be their amazement could they look upon these figures and realize the enormous increase of power and patronage now claimed for the Executive and conceded to him by the leading men of the nation without a protest.

The Official Register for 1867 shows the number of Government officers and employés in the civil service to be about seventy-five thousand. The cost of the civil and miscellaneous list for the fiscal year 1867 was $49,600,000, and for 1868, $51,600,000. The expenditures of the War and Navy Departments for 1867 were $126,800,000; for 1868, $149,000,000. The number of non-commissioned officers and privates in the Army for 1867 was seventy-seven thousand, that of commissioned officers about three thousand. The number of officers and men employed in the Navy in 1867 was over eleven thousand. So that in the civil and military and naval service of the Government there are over one hundred and sixty thousand in the employ of the Government, all of whom are practically subject to the order of the President and dependent for subsistence on the public Treasury.

Startling as is this array it does not include those who furnish supplies for the Army and Navy and for the Indian and other Departments of the Government, all of whom are more or less dependent on the Government for support. Experience teaches us that this vast army of office-holders, employés, agents, and dependents are influenced more or less by the executive will, and I am confident their power has never been overestimated.

Add to these the innumerable number of office expectants, in every county in every State and Territory, who are intent on securing the offices and places now occupied by others, and you may form some estimate of the many thousands in the country now appealing to the Executive for a recognition of their claims. Of this great army a large majority are ready to declare that every act and utterance of the Executive is the embodiment of wisdom and the perfection of statesmanship; indeed, they will not hesitate to say that the most imperceptible wink of the eye or nod of the head of his Excellency has behind it a meaning as full of significance as any of his utterances. So utterly abased and subservient has the public mind become because of the existence of this overshadowing power that men are dumb in the presence of the Executive, and dare not so much as express an opinion, much less criticize unfavorably his official acts. It is well known to observers how devoid of all manhood men become under the practical workings of this pernicious system which centers all power in the hands of the Executive.

Even the acting President, whose treason I regard as baser than that of Davis, had an army of apologists and defenders in the Republican party. It is well known that there were at one time in the Senate and House of the Thirty-Ninth Congress over sixty men elected by the Republican party who stood ready to cooperate with Johnson in his work of usurpation if there could be but the certainty of success. How many of them were ready to go the whole length, as he did, and abandon the great central idea of the Republican party will never be known. Nor will the nation ever know how much it owes to its faithful representatives who defeated this infamous conspiracy. There are members now within the sound of my voice who know where these men met in secret in this city to confer with a President whose apostasy was known to all men and whose treason was as clear as the sun at noon-day. No such meetings would ever have been held, no such infamous proposition would have been for a moment entertained by these men, but for the fact that the President had the veto and appointing power. Before this corrupting power men intrusted and honored by the Republican party abased themselves, and for a time imperiled the future of the Republic.

OF THE PARDONING POWER.

Mr. Chairman, in order to prevent the abuse of the pardoning power now conferred by the Constitution on the Executive, section two of article two ought to be amended so as to read:

And he [the President] shall have power, with the approval in writing of a majority of the Executive council, to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses committed against the United States after trial and conviction, except in cases of impeachment; but he shall grant no general amnesty or pardon to persons who are or who may have been engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States until he shall have first obtained the advice and consent of the Senate.

I suggest this additional proposition, because I believe that no one man in any Government ought to be clothed with unlimited power to grant pardons. It is a power liable to great abuse in the hands of any man, however able or upright. In the hands of a bad man it is a power which defeats the ends of justice and gives immunity to crime. The acting President has been for four years a national dispenser of pardons. I do not now refer to the unwarranted assumption of power on the part of the acting Executive in pardoning all the responsible and most guilty leaders of the late rebellion, nor to the fact that it is publicly announced as by authority that before he retires from office he will probably pardon the last of the assassin conspirators who murdered Mr. Lincoln, and thus placed him in the presidential office. It is enough to refer to the fact that he has pardoned confessed criminals before trial, and to the still more startling fact that he has pardoned over one hundred men, after trial and conviction, for the crime of counterfeiting the notes and other securities of the United States.

I need not say to members of this House that counterfeiting is one of the most indefensible of all crimes. Successful counterfeiting requires a large outlay of money; a high order of intellect and great skill in the preparation of everything connected with it. It must be done deliberately and with great secrecy. No immediate or pressing want of the person engaged in it, nor of any one depending on him for support, can be the impelling cause. No sudden impulse of passion; no motive such as often prompts men to commit crime under the pretext of retaliating for some actual or fancied injury; no cry of despair from wife and children because of hunger and cold, but almost every person engaged in the commission of this crime is a cultivated, deliberate, calculating villain, coolly weighing his chances and premeditating his every act. I am unable to divine the motive which has prompted the acting Executive to set at large almost every one of this class of criminals who during the past four years have been discovered, tried, and convicted at great cost to the Government. The fact, I believe, is notorious and undisputed, and I can only account for the apparent indifference of the public to this shameless prostitution of authority, intended only for beneficent purposes, on the hypothesis that they feel powerless in the presence of the defiant usurper of the White House, who, having been acquitted by the Senate of greater crimes, may, without question and with impunity, commit the lesser one of turning hundreds of dangerous criminals upon the country to prey upon the ignorant and unsuspecting and again engage in depreciating the credit of the nation by counterfeiting its securities. If the approval in writing of a majority of Mr. Johnson's Cabinet had been required as a condition to the pardon of the counterfeiters whom he has released, I am confident that but few if any of them would have been set at large to prey again upon the country. At all events I am unwilling to lodge the power to pardon even common criminals in the hands of any one man. In short, I am against the one-man power in any form, in any department of the Government.

Ho. OF REFS.

Executive and Judicial Power—Mr. Ashley.

If the question were now submitted to me whether to continue the executive office with the power now lodged in the hands of the President, or abolish the office altogether, I would vote to abolish it. For years I have believed that the executive power was the rock on which as a nation we should eventually be broken to pieces. It is the province of true statesmanship to point out prospective danger and suggest the remedy, rather than delay it until a usurper such as we now have at the head of the Government forces a recognition of the danger. The greater our confidence in General Grant the more anxious we should be to adopt an adequate remedy during the life of his Administration. We ought not to forget that Johnson succeeded Lincoln, and that we may need protection from the successor to General Grant.

APPOINTMENT OF CABINETS.

Mr. Chairman, in order that the dangerous and irresponsible power of the Executive may be still further reduced I have proposed that the two Houses of Congress shall, in joint convention, appoint annually one Cabinet officer; and that each member of the Cabinet shall, with the recommendation of a majority of the Cabinet, including the President, appoint for his Department all officers which by law require the confirmation of the Senate, the persons thus appointed and all subordinate officers for each Department to be appointed and removed in such manner as Congress may by law direct. I have also provided that each Cabinet officer may be removed at any time by the concurrent vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, separately given.

It will be observed that in providing for an executive council I have merged the War and Navy Departments into one. I have done so because my observation of the practical working of these Departments during the war satisfied me that the two Departments could be better managed if under the administration of one executive head. I have therefore provided for one Department of the Army and Navy. If this amendment were made part of the Constitution the President would still be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and he would have all the power incident to the command of so large and influential a body of men as compose the Army and Navy of the nation; he would also have the power to nominate and promote all its officers. He would appoint, as now, all consuls and foreign ambassadors and judges of the Supreme and district courts of the United States. This, with the right to nominate officers for all the Territories and grant pardons, is all the power I am willing to concede to any Executive.

The adoption of these provisions will bring the Executive Departments into harmony with the legislative, and destroy practically the one-man power in the Government. It will also give us abler and more faithful administrative officers in the Executive Departments. I would like to discuss these propositions at greater length did time permit. Each proposition is so plain, however, that they can hardly be misinterpreted or misunderstood.

THERE MUST BE ORGANIZED OPPOSITION TO EXECUTIVE USURPATION.

After the important questions growing out of the late rebellion are permanently settled, and the question of citizenship suffrage is disposed of by the adoption of the constitutional amendment now before us, I cannot affiliate with any party which as an organization proposes to maintain the kingly and dangerous prerogatives now conceded to the President by custom and usage. If we are to continue the presidential office at all, it must be simply as an executive and as no part of the law-making power. The duty of the President must be strictly limited to the execution of the law. The veto power, the appointing power, and the power of removal at pleasure and without cause, are all kingly prerogatives, and at war with the theory of a republican and democratic Government. As the national life is born of the will of the people, so the legislative representation of that will must be in the national Congress. In all Governments the ultimate power must somewhere have a lodgment. In a republic it is safest in the hands of the people's representatives. The nearer this ultimate power is to the people the more directly and easily it can be molded and controlled by them.

An absolute power in any Government which is above and superior to the people is a despotism. It is a fallacy to assume that there must be lodged in some department of the Government a despotic power such as the veto power. In any light in which I am able to view this great question I can see only danger in the constant encroachments and usurpations of the executive and judicial departments of the Government, and safety and security for the people only by the lodgment of the ultimate power of the nation in the national Congress. To the danger inseparable from the lodgment of such kingly prerogatives in the hands of any one man as are now conceded to the President may be added the danger of our present system of making nominations. The caucus and convention system and the manner of electing the President and Vice President by electors, or by the House of Representatives when the electors fail to make a choice, all tend to exclude the people from a direct voice in the government of the nation, and enables a few to control the Government and administer it, not according to the will of the people, but as decreed by nominating conventions and by irresponsible bodies unknown to the Constitution. All attempts to maintain the domination of the Executive over the legislative department of the Government must be defeated, and all efforts to clothe the Executive with new prerogatives or an increase of his present overshadowing power must be met by prompt, vigorous, and organized resistance; and to this great work I shall in the future devote whatever of political influence I may have.

THE JUDICIAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. Chairman, I now submit an amendment providing for the better organization of the Supreme Court, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section one of article three and insert the following:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and district courts, shall hold their offices for twenty years: Provided, That no judge shall act as a member of the Supreme Court nor of any district court of the United States after he shall have reached the age of seventy years. After their appointment and qualification they shall be ineligible to any office under the national Government. They shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. After the expiration of the term of service of each judge of the Supreme or of any district court of the United States, the Congress shall, by law, provide such annual compensation as they may deem proper for each retiring judge during life, which compensation shall not be diminished.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, next to the danger inseparable from the use and abuse of executive power is the danger to be apprehended from judicial usurpation and judicial corruption. The history of judicial usurpations in the United States is a history running over many years of judicial "sapping and mining." The judicial power is all the more dangerous because ever silent and insidious. In all ages and countries its most diabolical crimes have been committed in the sacred name of justice and of law. Jefferson was right when he declared that—

"The germ of dissolution of our Government was in the Constitution of the Federal judiciary, an irresponsible body, (for impeachment is scarcely a scarecrow,) working like gravity by night and by day, gaining a little to-day and a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless steps over the field of jurisdiction." "The foundations are already deeply laid by their decisions for the annihilation of constitutional State rights and the removal of every check, every counterpoise, to the ingulfing power of which themselves are to make a sovereign part." "An opinion is huddled up in conclave, perhaps by a majority of one, delivered as if unanimous and with the silent acquiescence of lazy or timid associates by a crafty chief judge."

"It has proved that the power of declaring what the law is ad libitum by sapping and mining slyly and without alarm the foundations of the Constitution can do what open force would not dare to attempt."

I have no time at this late hour to go into a history of the usurpations of the Supreme and district courts of the United States. Such a history would present a long and black catalogue of unjust and infamous decisions. The first speech which I made in this House was devoted to an exposition of its betrayal of human rights and its shameful affirmation of the right of slavery. I have nothing to retract of what I then said of its indefensible subservience to the slave power and to the baneful spirit of party; nor can I modify, as I should be glad to do, what I then said of the undisguised personal and political ambition for the Presidency of some if not a majority of its members.

Years before the Dred Scott decision was delivered an attempt was made to prepare the way for that usurpation or any other which might be deemed for the interest of slavery by a studied and labored effort on the part of the slave power and their northern allies to impress the country with a greater veneration for that "august tribunal" known as the Supreme Court than for any other department of the Government.

Its decisions were declared to be "finalities" from which there was to be no appeal, and its immaculate wisdom and purity was everywhere the enthusiastic theme of a partisan press and party leaders, who demanded that its decisions should be accepted as unquestioned law. Statutes were enacted which declared they were to be operative, provided they were in subordination to the Constitution as interpreted by a majority of this "august tribunal" composed of nine men, of whom five were a majority. So persistently did political demagogues press this point upon the country that the members of the Supreme Court began to act as if they were in fact an "august tribunal" endowed with a wisdom unknown to the rest of mankind, and that they had an intuitive knowledge of the Constitution unknown to any other body of men. Those who knew the court when the Dred Scott decision was pronounced will not hesitate to admit that whatever knowledge of the Constitution a majority of them had was probably "intuitive," and that their legal endowments were of a character incomprehensible to the great body of intelligent men who read that decision. So thoroughly did a majority of this court believe in the infallibility of their assumed power that they consulted with and gave directions for the guidance of their partisan friends, and were preparing to assume to interpret without question the Constitution for both the executive and legislative departments of the Government. Justice Wayne, of Georgia, than whom there was no purer or better man on the bench in his day, believed, and so expressed himself to his friends, "that if the Supreme Court could be brought to make a unanimous decision in the Dred Scott case, [in favor of slavery, of course,] that it would settle that question for all time to come." This was the kind of immaculate judicial wisdom to which the nation was called upon to submit without question.

It is now well known to all that the Dred

Scott decision was made on the demand of the slave power. But for a supposed party necessity there never would have been a Dred Scott case before the court. It required years of unscrupulous partisan labor to pack the court with men who would consent to degrade the judicial office by making such an atrocious decision. After the case had been finally argued and the court were ready to pronounce the required pro-slavery judgment upon it, and had authorized Judge Nelson to prepare the opinion of the court, dismissing the case on the only point which the slaveholders then desired to have passed upon, namely, that Dred Scott being the descendant of an African slave could not become a citizen of the United States, and therefore could not bring a suit in the courts of the United States against a slave master, the court were brought to an unlooked-for point in the case by the announcement of Judge McLean that he should deliver a dissenting opinion, and review at length the status of the slave under the Constitution, thus going into the whole question of slavery.

It is conceded by all who are familiar with the inside history of this case that but for the fact that there were men then upon the bench of the Supreme Court, as there are now, with a mania for the Presidency, which can only be given up at death, we should never have had the Dred Scott decision. Judge McLean, whose purity of life and great ability no man who knew him will question, had for years been an aspirant for the Presidency. He saw an opportunity to make political capital out of a general review of the slavery question from a judicial stand-point, and when he announced his purpose to his associates on the bench he caused a panic among them, such as does not often overtake that "august tribunal." It was on the eve of the presidential campaign for 1856, and the pro-slavery party could not afford to have such a bomb-shell thrown into their camp. The court, therefore, or a majority of it, reserved the decision of the question, and ordered the case to be reargued in order to gain time and to await the result of the presidential election. They did this in order that they might know positively whether they could rely on the executive arm of the Government to enforce with the Army and Navy their contemplated usurpation.

The points to be made in Judge McLean's dissenting opinion were well known to his partisan friends; and the fact that he was to deliver such an opinion was publicly used with a view to secure for him, if possible, the Republican nomination at Philadelphia for the Presidency. The opinions of the majority of the court were also known to the partisan friends of the court. After the presidential election the public mind was prepared for the forthcoming decision by skillful manipulations, such as were never employed before. President Pierce in his last annual message apprised the country of the fact that this Dred Scott decision had been agreed upon, although at that time it had not been officially announced from the bench, and that the court "had finally determined the pending question in every form in which it could arise." Mr. Buchanan in his inaugural address referred to the forthcoming Dred Scott decision in these words:

"To their decision, in common with all good citizens, I shall cheerfully submit, whatever it may be."

These declarations of the outgoing and the incoming Chief Magistrates were demanded by the slave power, so as to strengthen the purpose of the court, and to give official notice to all applicants for office under Mr. Buchanan that they must indorse one of the most startling and indefensible decisions ever delivered by any judicial tribunal in the world before their claims for official positions could even have a hearing before the Executive. So successful did the plotters work, that the partisans of the court succeeded in many of the free States in procuring an indorsement by their party State conventions of this monstrous decision. Then the office-seekers of the nation, with an alacrity and a baseness which no language can describe, bowed down in submission before the slave power, kissed the hands that smote them, and accepted menial positions as a reward for their infamy. All this because the Supreme Court had been molded into a political tribunal, and had upon its bench political partisans and aspirants for the Presidency. I wish the court were altogether what it ought to be now. I regret as much as any man that it is not. I need not dwell upon the painful exhibitions which may be witnessed any day gentlemen will take the trouble to go into the room of the Supreme Court. There they will find men upon the bench passing upon questions of the gravest magnitude who are utterly unfit for the discharge of such responsible and important duties as are almost daily devolving upon them.

It is painful for me to say this, and I do so only because I believe it to be an imperative duty. It is proper that the people should know the facts, so they may demand of their Representatives a remedy for the admitted defect in our judicial system. I presume the members of the present court are substantially like their predecessors, no better, and I hope no worse.

It is well known that for some time before Judge McLean's death his associates on the bench at the request of friends relieved him from all responsible labor in the preparation of opinions. Though sleeping upon the bench during the greater part of the time the court was in session, and dying with age, he was almost daily voting upon and aiding to decide questions of the gravest character; and even then was not without hope of ultimately reaching the Presidency.

Mr. Chairman, it is a sad sight to see such a body as the Supreme Court ought to be, with one third of its members sleeping upon the bench and dying with age, and the other third crazed with the glitter of the Presidency. I need not say how utterly this condition of body and mind unfits men for the proper discharge of the judicial office. If there is one body of men more than another in this country who ought to be financially removed from temptation, and intellectually to be clear and unclouded, as well as free from all partisan ambition, it is the members of the Supreme Court.

Our experience with this branch of the Government has been a sad one. I will not attempt to go into a history of its usurpations, its perversion of law, its criminal injustice, its political chicanery. It would employ more than the entire time allowed me, and then I could not present one half of the enormities of which it has been guilty. The people have been compelled more than once to disregard and reverse its infamous and unjust decisions, and they must be prepared to do so again. They were not long in comprehending the extent of the danger in the Dred Scott usurpation. They knew that the power which had the conceded right to pass without appeal on the constitutionality of the nation's laws would soon become the nation's master. If this doctrine could have obtained, the sovereignty of the nation would, sooner or later, have been usurped by the national judiciary. Congress might have enacted laws, but the court would have annulled them at pleasure. Thanks to the intelligence and virtue of the people it required but few years to reverse the Dred Scott decision and break in pieces the ebony image of slavery which this "august tribunal" set up and demanded the nation should worship. The people of this country could not be made to put their hands on their mouths and their mouths in the dust and cry out great is the Diana of slavery; immaculate and wise is this "august tribunal;" its interpretation of the Constitution shall be a "finality," "binding upon the executive and legislative departments of the Government and all the officers and agents thereof."

This attempted usurpation on the part of the court not only failed, but ignominiously failed, and the individual members of the court were arraigned at the bar of public opinion and put into history with the men who in all ages have disgraced and dishonored the judicial office. If the proposition which I have made had from the organization of the Government been a part of the Constitution, every man will concede that no such decision as the Dred Scott decision would ever have been made. Let us, then, provide for such a reorganization of the Supreme and district courts of the United States as experience teaches to be necessary. Let us also restrict their jurisdiction to the fewest possible questions consistent with the administration of the national Government, and we may hope to see the organization of a judicial tribunal which shall command the respect of all Americans, and also the respect of intelligent men throughout the world.

THE MINORITY MUST HAVE AN EQUITABLE PERSONAL REPRESENTATION IN THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Chairman, the proposition which I now present is, in my opinion, one of more importance to the future peace and unity of this nation than any new proposition which has ever been suggested, involving as it does the whole question of representative government, and presenting the question of the right of minorities to an equitable representation in the Government in proportion to their numerical strength at each election. The Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE —.

In the election of Representatives to the Congress of the United States, whenever more than one Representative is to be elected from a State, Congress shall by law designate the manner in which such additional Representatives shall be chosen, and shall provide for securing to the qualified electors in such State an equitable personal representation in Congress as near as may be.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, under our system constituencies are often compelled to intrust to Representatives, especially to Senators, the settlement of questions of vast importance which have arisen after their election. Unless some system can be devised by which the opinions of a constituency can be obtained on any new and important question which may have arisen after the election of a Senator or Representative, the people must continue to intrust, as now, the settlement of such questions to men over whom they can have no control until the next regular election. The number of Senators and Representatives who have served in Congress since I came into public life, and have openly and defiantly betrayed or misrepresented the constituencies which elected them, is far greater than is generally supposed, and until the time came to fill their places by a new election such constituencies have been powerless in the presence of their own chosen servants. It will be conceded by all that if the voice of betrayed or misrepresented constituencies could have been authoritatively heard, great questions which have been passed upon within the memory of us all would have been disposed of otherwise than as they have been, and questions which have not yet been acted upon would have been settled otherwise than as they will be.

If in the past quarter of a century the voice of every constituency in the nation could have been authoritatively collected, and their will obeyed, there would have been less of compromising, less of patch-work in legislation, less defiance on the part of Senators and Representatives, and fewer betrayals of constituencies, either by Presidents, Cabinet ministers, or others. The people, however, are so wedded to our present system of electing Presidents and Senators and Representatives that it is hardly probable they can now be moved to adopt a plan so advanced as that which demands the right of every constituency at all times to instruct or recall their public servants and substitute others in their stead. It therefore becomes all the more important that a system should be adopted which will secure to every elector the right to vote for such persons as in his judgment will best represent his opinions on the leading questions of the day, and to whose judgment and fidelity he is willing to intrust the disposition of all new questions which may arise and on which, at the time of voting, he can have formed no opinions.

Mr. Chairman, in submitting this proposition the object I have in view is to secure to every elector, no matter where he may reside in a State, the right to vote for any citizen in the United States whom he may prefer to represent him in Congress, so that the free exercise of his individual judgment shall not be restricted to the locality of his residence or to accepting a candidate imposed upon him by local caucuses and local conventions. Experience, I think, has demonstrated the necessity of devising some improvement in our electoral system. We must adopt a system, not only for electing the President by a direct vote of the people by ballot, without the intervention of caucuses and conventions and presidential electors, but we must inaugurate a system for electing Senators and Representatives in Congress, and for State Legislatures, which will secure a more equitable representation and give greater protection to the interests and rights of minorities. The despotism and injustice of the majority has been felt with fearful power in this nation. For more than three quarters of a century in the name of Christianity and of liberty the majority enslaved millions of men. During all that time demagogues clamored for the right of the majority to enact villainy into law. Compromising with slavery was then regarded as the highest statesmanship. The right of the minority to a voice in the Government or even to a hearing was unfearedly denied, and bars and bolts and dungeons, mob law and social and political ostracism was the lot of those who in the land of Washington came pleading for the liberty of the human race. Experience warns us of the fatal consequences of such injustice and of all compromisers with wrong and of all temporary and superficial legislation. Put the propositions which I have made into the Constitution, and they will become the crowning glory of our fundamental law. We shall thus abolish the kingly prerogatives of the President, and recognize the supremacy of the people by making it the imperative duty of the Government to see that the rights of minorities are respected and protected. "The office of Government," says one of the ablest women of America, "is to represent the rights of all, not the will of all."

True representation is the corner-stone of the Republic; without it democracy surrenders to the minority, and a ruling minority in any Government will always become an aristocracy. Democracy cannot be maintained by any people simply by declaring for a Government of the majority, unless it recognizes the divine law, which commands all to "do unto others as they would that others should do unto them." The "golden rule" is the foundation-stone of true democracy, and the nation which builds upon any other foundation, though by the consent of the majority, builds upon the sand. What I want to secure in the administration of Government is not the absolute domination of the majority, but to have the enlightened "will of the majority, constituted guardian of the rights of all." My purpose is to so reorganize the Government that it shall recognize the divine law of liberty and justice and be administered by the consent of all, in the interest of all, and with representation for all. This cannot be done by concentrating so much power in the hands of the President or in the national judiciary; nor can it be done by refusing to recognize the rights of minorities to an equitable representation in State Legislatures and in the national Congress. The system which I wish to see inaugurated is based upon the fundamental idea that every legislative body should reflect the sentiments and convictions of the whole people which it is chosen to represent. Adopt this plan, and every constituency sufficiently numerous in a State to entitle them to one or more Representatives either in Congress or in a State Legislature can secure such Representatives.

Under our present system the minority in half the States are often without a voice in the national Government. The legislative power of Ohio to-day is in the hands of the minority of the electors of that State. This could never happen under the system which I hope some day to see adopted, not only by the States, but by the national Government. The system so ably presented by Mr. Hare, of Great Britain, commends itself to me because of its admirable simplicity and its absolute security to the interests and rights of minorities. It would be mathematically impossible under that system for the minority in any State to obtain control of its Legislature, or the minority of the nation to obtain a majority in Congress, while at the same time it would secure to minorities a just representation in proportion to the number of votes which they polled at each election.

I have not time to dwell, as I should be glad to do, at greater length upon the inestimable value of this most admirable system; a system which has the approval of John Stewart Mill and many of the ablest statesmen of Europe and America. With some modifications it could be adopted by every State. But if custom and the ambition of local party leaders render the adoption of Mr. Hare's plan impossible, I am confident that a discussion of the question of minority representation which it presents will result in an amendment to our present indefensible system. For the sake of illustration let me state the manner in which the voters in Ohio are clothed with unequal political power. I do not now speak of the entire disfranchisement of minorities, which is done in almost every State by gerrymandering, but the unequal apportionment of States into senatorial and legislative districts, as in Maryland and Delaware.

In addition to this I refer to the great power which in certain localities in many States is conferred upon one voter and denied to another. For instance, in Hamilton county, in my State, each elector votes for nine representatives and three senators to the State Legislature, making twelve members of the State Legislature for whom one elector votes on one ticket.

In the county in which I reside, and indeed in a majority of the counties in the State, they elect but one member of the house and one senator in each district, so that each elector outside of Hamilton county can vote for but one representative and one senator to the State Legislature, except in such years as a few of the districts or counties have one additional senator or representative, which we call a float. Every voter, therefore, in Hamilton county has nine times the political power of a voter in Lucas in the choice of members of the State Legislature. This inequality and injustice, all will agree, ought not to be maintained. The political power of the State as represented by the number of votes cast by each party can be fairly distributed and the minority secured an equitable representation without an entire abandonment of the district system to which custom and the interests of local politicians so much attach us.

To illustrate, suppose we should alter our State constitution in Ohio so that the senate should be composed of forty-eight members and the house of ninety-six members, and that in making the apportionment in the constitution as it is now, the States should be divided into eleven senatorial and twenty-two representative districts, electing four senators and four representatives in each district, each senatorial district being divided into two representative districts; and that the remaining four senators and eight representatives should be elected as we now elect floats, except that they be elected for the State at large. This would place every voter in the State on an equal footing as to the number of members of the State Legislature for whom he would be permitted to vote.

If after such an apportionment the electors were permitted—as I think they ought to be—to adopt the cumulative and alternate system of voting, the minority if they numbered a fraction above one fourth of the voters in any district could secure one senator and representative, or if they numbered a fraction above one eighth of the voters in the State they could secure one senator and two representatives for the State at large.

If the electors in any district were dissatisfied, as they often are, with one or more of the candidates nominated by their party, they ought to be permitted to cumulate and alternate their votes on any one or more candidates, either for the State at large or in their own district, designating on their ballots their first, second, third, and fourth choice, so that their votes should not be lost by a larger number being cast for any one candidate than would elect him, or for a candidate who would not receive enough to elect him. Under this system each party would be compelled to nominate its best and ablest men or suffer defeat. Each elector having the right of alternate and cumulative voting, he could vote for any one or more of the candidates presented, either for the State at large or in his district, and would do so rather than vote for an objectionable and unworthy man of his party merely because he was the caucus nominee, if in doing so he thereby increased the vote of his favorite candidate.

Let me illustrate this point, so that I shall not be misunderstood. I would provide that each elector should vote one ballot. On that ballot he should name his choice for State and county officers as now. State and county officers being ministerial and not legislative, and each voter being entitled to vote for but one of such officers, the right of alternate and cumulative voting cannot be provided for. Only where the elector has the right to vote for two or more candidates for the same office—like members of the Legislature or Congress—can the system of cumulative and alternative voting be applied. For example, every State has but one Governor, and every county but one clerk of the court, and each elector must vote for but one if he votes at all. Hence this system which I propose recognizes the supremacy of the legislative department in the Government and provides for an equitable representation of the minority, so that that minority may have a voice in prescribing by law the mode and manner in which all ministerial officers of the Government shall discharge the powers and duties of their respective offices. If any system can be devised which will give more absolute power to the people I am for it.

In voting under this system the ballots would be made up substantially as follows:

In electing Representatives to Congress I have provided that the same system should be adopted which I have suggested for electing members of State Legislatures. Every State entitled to less than eight Representatives in Congress should elect them on one ticket for the State at large. In each State entitled to eight members and over, the number to which they are entitled should be divided by four, and the State apportioned into as many districts as there are products of such division, the additional number of members to which they are entitled if there be any, to be elected for the State at large as General LOGAN is now elected by the State of Illinois. Thus in Ohio we should have, until a new apportionment was made, four congressional districts, in each of which four Representatives to Congress would be elected and the remaining three members would be elected by the State at large. Under this system every voter in Ohio would vote for seven Representatives to Congress; or, if he preferred to do so, he could, by alternative and cumulative voting, give his seven votes to any one candidate. Thus a minority in Ohio, if they numbered a fraction above one seventh of the voters of a State, by uniting on one candidate, could secure one Representative in Congress, and in no event could they elect a greater number of Representatives than they would be entitled to by the number of votes which they were able to cast.

If it be suggested that the electors in States having but one or two Representatives would not have equal political power with electors in the larger States, I answer that they are more than compensated by the two Senators which represent a small population in the Senate. It requires no argument to show that this system would do much to destroy the baneful effects of party spirit; that it would check the use of money at elections and prevent the great frauds which are yearly becoming more and more alarming. In addition to this it would tend to secure the services of the ablest men in Congress and in State Legislatures. The men who were nominated and elected to the senate and house for a State at large, as a rule, would be the ablest men each party could select in the State. So also of Representatives to Congress; the people of the whole State having a right to vote for one, or two, or three Representatives to Congress for the State at large would be careful to select gentlemen of well-known ability and fidelity. In this way able and faithful and experienced men would be retained in public life, because local factions and the local ambitions of aspirants could not be so successfully used as now to defeat them. More would be expected of a man who was nominated and elected to the Legislature for the State at large than of a local candidate from almost any county, and so of a man nominated and elected by a State at large as a Representative to the Congress of the nation.

This plan is so just and fair that it must sooner or later commend itself to the great body of thinking men in the country. Each voter should have the right to say on his ballot, "I desire to be represented by the candidate whose name I have placed opposite No. 1. I therefore cast all my votes for him. If he should obtain more than the quota of votes necessary to elect him, or if he should fail to obtain a sufficient number and thus cannot become my Representative, I direct that my vote be transferred to the candidate which I have designated as No. 2, he being my second choice;" and so on, under the same conditions, to the number of candidates for whom each elector is entitled to vote.

If the system of electing the President and Vice President by the appointment of electoral colleges is to be maintained, then they ought to be elected by districts and States as I suggest in case of Congressmen, and not in single districts as proposed by the constitutional amendment which has just passed the Senate and is now on our table. One of the amendments which I have suggested to that amendment is in my opinion far preferable, and yet I do not intend to vote for it, even if adopted as an amendment to the Senate proposition; I mean the amendment which I offered a day or two ago, which provides for the appointment of electors of President and Vice President by the Legislatures to represent the will of the voters as expressed by them at the general election. I would be very glad, however, to have the opportunity of voting for the proposition which I made at the last session and again at this, which provides for the nomination and election of the President by a direct vote of the people by ballot. If we are to have a President at all, I want him elected directly by the qualified voters of the nation. I am opposed to the single district plan because it does not secure an equitable representation to the voters of the nation. Under that system a minority of the whole people have elected a President and would be able to do so again. It is true, as my friend [Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana] suggests, that the minority have and may again elect the President under our present system. I prefer, however, to retain that system, imperfect as all admit it to be, until we can adopt a better one. The scene which transpired in this House on Wednesday, when counting the electoral vote, ought to be a warning to the statesmen of the nation. It developed in a practical manner the weak and dangerous point in our system of electing the President. If the rejection of the vote of a State by Congress should at any time happen to change the result of a presidential election the consequences would be fearful.

Suppose, when counting the vote the other day, there had been three or more candidates for President, (as there have been several times,) and that each candidate had received a number of electoral votes, and the friends of the defeated candidates had united and thrown out the vote of one or more States, so that it would defeat the person having a majority of all the certified votes returned, and thus have defeated an election by the Electoral College and brought the election into this House. Can any man contemplate such a contingency without alarm? In a full House of two hundred and thirty-three members thirty-eight men from the small States by uniting could elect the President, and if they saw fit to do so they could select of the three candidates before the House the person having the smallest number of electoral votes. Do gentlemen suppose the people of the country would submit to such injustice without a fearful struggle? Of course no sane man pretends to defend a system which invites such conspiracies, and which makes such scenes as we witnessed last Wednesday possible when counting the electoral vote. Let any Congress assume to throw out votes enough to change the result of a presidential election and they will inaugurate revolution.

I am asked by gentlemen around me if I would sit here and count the vote of a State if the certificate was a forgery, or if the election in the State had been carried by force or fraud. I answer certainly not. If compelled to vote I must vote for what I believe to be right and let consequences take care of themselves; but if I voted to reject one or more States and their rejection changed the result of the election I would be voting for that which would inaugurate revolution. And I will say, in passing, that no question of contest as to the validity of a presidential election should ever be permitted to come before Congress. If frauds are committed or force is employed in any State the question should be settled either in the district courts of the United States for the district in which the fraud or force was alleged to have been practiced, or in the courts of the county in which the fraud or force is charged. These are the courts before which such questions should be determined, and the parties contesting the validity of such election should be permitted to elect before which of these courts they would bring the case. The question of the validity of any election being thus adjudicated and passed upon by a judicial tribunal in the locality where the alleged frauds were charged, Congress would have no other duty to perform than to count the vote as returned and officially proclaim the result.

But, Mr. Chairman, all this is a digression into which I have been drawn by the suggestions and questions of gentlemen around me. Let me now go back to the question of representation which I was discussing. I was speaking of the unfairness of the plan of electing presidential electors in a single congressional or electoral district. There is hardly a State in the Union which elects four or more Representatives to Congress in which the minority party could not, if they had a majority in their State Legislatures, (as the Democratic party have today in Ohio, and the Republican party in New York,) so gerrymander the State into electoral districts as to secure a majority of presidential electors in the State to the candidate of their party. If electors should be appointed as I propose Representatives in Congress shall be elected, an equitable representation would be secured to the minority in each State in exact proportion to the number of votes cast by each party and all motive for gerrymandering would be removed. If the single district system should prevail the Republican party having a majority in the Legislature of New York could and probably would so district the State as to secure a majority of the electors of President and Vice President to their party candidates, although the State should go largely Democratic. The Democratic party in Ohio could so district the State as to secure a majority of the presidential electors to the candidate of their party, although the State might be carried largely by the Republican party.

Of course, such a plan is entirely indefensible. The fact that Mr. Lincoln and General Grant received a larger number of electoral votes than the Republican party carried congressional districts, including the senatorial electors, is no argument in favor of the district system. No system is defensible which defeats the will of the majority, or which fails to secure to the electors of the entire nation an equitable representation. No man who has given this subject proper reflection will claim that the electors of the nation have ever had an equitable representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President, from the organization of the Government to this hour. The Republican representation in this House for the past eight years has been out of all proportion to the vote cast for that party, as everybody admits. In the Senate the inequality and injustice to the minority has been far greater. In 1824 Jackson had a larger popular vote than Adams and Crawford combined, yet they secured 26 more electoral votes than Jackson, which carried the election into the House of Representatives, where Jackson was defeated. At that election Jackson had a larger popular vote than both Adams and Crawford and a greater number of electors than either, and yet was defeated. Jackson's vote was 99, Adams's was 84, and Crawford's was 41. Of course all remember that Mr. Adams was elected by the House of Representatives.

In 1832 Jackson was elected over Clay, having a majority of the popular vote, as also a majority of the Electoral College. But if any one will divide the total vote by the number of electors, he will find that Clay, who only secured 49 electors, ought to have had 119, making a difference of 70 votes, and double that number as between Jackson and Clay, as the 70 were taken from Clay and given to Jackson. In 1852 the candidates were Pierce, Scott, and Hale, and the popular vote and the number of electors which each received were as follows, (this statement also shows the ratio for each elector chosen:)

Presidential election, 1852.

	Popular vote.	Electors.	Ratios.
Pierce.....	1,555,545	254	6,242
Scott.....	1,383,537	42	32,846
Hale.....	157,296	-	-
	3,1,6,378	296

Pierce had 254 votes, Scott 42 votes, and Hale none. The injustice of this must be very apparent to every one. Divide the whole vote, 3,126,378, by 296, the whole number of electors, and the ratio necessary to elect one elector at that election was 10,562 votes, and yet the Pierce electors were elected by a ratio not exceeding 6,242, while the ratio for the Scott electors was 32,846, or more than six times the number required to elect the Pierce electors, while Hale, with 157,296 votes, did not secure one electoral vote. If the vote had been equitably divided, as I propose, Pierce would have had 150 votes, Scott 131, and Hale 15 votes. Pierce having a majority of the popular vote over both Scott and Hale would, of course, have a majority over both of the electoral vote, and would have been the President. The inequality and injustice to the electors in 1860 is so glaring that I desire to call special attention to it:

Presidential election, 1860.

	Popular vote.	Electors.	Ratios.
Lincoln.....	1,868,452	180	10,369
Douglas.....	1,375,157	12	114,596
Breckinridge.....	847,953	72	11,777
Bell.....	590,631	39	15,144
	4,680,193	303

Mr. Lincoln did not receive a majority of the popular vote, yet he had a large majority of the electoral vote. Douglas had but 12 electoral votes, with 1,375,157 votes, while Breckinridge and Bell together had 111 electoral votes, although their combined popular vote was less than 84,000 more than the popular vote for Douglas. Each of Douglas's electors had 114,596 votes, while each of Mr. Lincoln's electors had but 10,369 votes. If the electors had been apportioned according to the popular vote Lincoln would have had 121 electors, Douglas 89, Breckinridge 65, and Bell 38.

At the election for 1864 the vote was for—

	Popular vote.	Electors.	Ratios.
Lincoln.....	2,223,035	213	10,436
McClellan.....	1,811,754	21	86,274

The mean ratio is 17,224 for an elector; Lincoln therefore ought to have had but 129 electoral votes, and General McClellan should have had 105 electoral votes.

Election for President in 1868.

	Popular vote.	Electors.	Ratios.
Grant.....	3,016,353	214	14,090
Seymour.....	2,706,631	80	33,832

The mean ratio at this election is 19,499. This would have given General Grant 155 electors, Seymour 139 electors.

With these facts before us, the injustice and danger of our present system must be apparent to all. Under it the minority have and may again elect the President. The same inequality and injustice will be seen if the returns for the election of members of this House are examined. If the electors who voted for Grant and Seymour were equitably represented in the next House the Republican majority would be far less than it will be. For these reasons I oppose the proposition to elect the President by appointing presidential electors in each State by single districts. If this system should prevail the motive for gerrymandering would increase, and the Legislatures of the several States might provide, as was done in Maryland, I believe, in 1284, when they provided that the senatorial electors for that State should be elected in the third and fourth congressional districts. The Legislature of Ohio, if Democratic as now, could provide that the two senatorial electors should be elected in the two strongest Democratic districts in the State; and the Republican Legislature of New York could provide that her senatorial electors should be elected in the congressional districts in which her Senators actually resided. Any system which encourages the perpetration of such frauds upon electors must be met with prompt and unyielding opposition. If, as I have said, the Electoral College system is to be maintained, then I feel warranted in saying that the statesmen of the country will prefer the adoption of some plan which will secure to the electors of each State an equitable representation in the Electoral College. This cannot be done by electing them in single districts, nor as now by the State at large.

It is not necessary for me to repeat what I have heretofore said in this House and elsewhere, that I am utterly opposed to the present mode of electing the President, either by electoral colleges or by the House of Representatives. The honest and fair way is the one which is easiest and freest from complications, and that is to nominate the several candidates for President under the safeguards and protection of law, and elect by a direct vote of the qualified electors of the entire nation by ballot.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to see Mr. Hare's system adopted in this country, because I believe it to be the most philosophical ever presented for securing an equitable division of political power in a republican Commonwealth. John Stuart Mill, in his work on representative government, says:

"Of all modes in which the national representation can possibly be constituted, this one affords the best security for the intellectual qualifications desirable in a representative. At present, by universal admission, it is becoming more and more difficult for any one who has only talents and character to gain admission to the House of Commons. The only persons who can get elected are those who possess local influence or make their way by lavish expenditure.

"In no other way which it seems possible to suggest would Parliament be so certain of containing the very élite of the country. Not solely through the votes of minorities would this system raise the intellectual standard of the House of Commons. Majorities would be compelled to look out for members of much higher caliber. When the individuals composing the majorities would no longer be reduced to Hobson's choice of either voting for the person brought forward by the local leaders or not voting at all, when the nominee of the leaders would have to encounter not only the candidate of the minority but of all the men of established reputations in the country who were willing to serve, it would be impossible any longer to foist upon the electors the first person who presents himself with the catchwords of the party in his mouth and three or four thousand pounds in his pocket."

Mr. Chairman, nothing has been more successfully used in this country by small demagogues to defeat able representative men than the clamor of the spoils hunter for "available candidates" and for "rotation in office." These men demand party success at whatever cost of manhood or consistency. With this cry party discipline has been successfully invoked and constituencies have voted to place men in office who were known by them to be intellectually and morally unfit for any honorable public position.

Is the candidate "available," asks the time-server. If so, that is enough. No spoils hunter is so indiscreet as to inquire about the character or ability of his candidate. Every person of experience knows that as a rule the "available man" has no individuality, and that political availability is everywhere a synonym for political mediocrity, and that nothing so delights the heart of respectable conservatism as stupid mediocrity.

Let any man make careful inquiry into the character of all the men who for the past quarter of a century have been members of this House and he will find, to speak within bounds, that more than one third of the entire number have been, as Mr. Benton says, "mere birds of passage," whose entrance here was often as great an astonishment to themselves as it was to the statesmen of the nation. He will also find that a large proportion of these "birds of passage" came here by the force and power of party machinery and the cooperation of the Executive, who desired the presence of such men that they might do his bidding, after which, by common consent, they were to be "rotated out," and receive as a reward for their fidelity to the "powers that be" some petty office; or he will find that they were nominated and elected because they were the representatives of money-bags rather than the representatives of ideas, or that they were political non-descripts, without intellectual ability enough to form or express one distinct political idea, but with low cunning enough to follow the programme prescribed for them by wiley party managers.

I am sure no man who has looked into our political history will say that I overdraw the picture. Of course all know that as a class these are the men who have always deceived or betrayed constituencies; and yet in every congressional district in the United States where the party majority is small and the district doubtful stupidity with money can win the day at the next election against brains with ideas. In Great Britain at the late election John Stewart Mill, one of the ablest and most philosophical statesmen of that country, was defeated by a mere popinjay, whose only recommendation for a seat in Parliament was his money-bags. Mill was known and respected in all parts of the civilized world, while the man who defeated him was not known beyond the circle of the clique which nominated him, and undoubtedly never would have been but for his money.

In this country money is being successfully employed more and more every year to elect "political noodles" to Congress. The system I propose will, if adopted, secure the election of the ablest men in the nation and banish the baneful spirit of partisan bigotry. It will also do much to destroy the political power of the Judge Noodles with money-bags; the Captain Kid-Glove Owls of codfish brigades, and the Major Blowhards, with neither brains nor money, unless, on the new theory attempted to be inaugurated here, "brass" should be substituted for that "relic of ancient barbarism."

Mr. Chairman, defective as our representative system is admitted to be, and faithless as have been many of the people's chosen servants, I can testify to the fact that, though this is called a money-loving and a money-worshipping age, I have been associated here in the past ten years with men in the administration of Government who believed in something higher than the god of Mammon.

Since the war of the rebellion I have been associated with a party a majority of whose members have been free from all schemes of public plunder or speculation, a majority of whom have also been as true as the needle to the pole in their defense of human rights. Beset as they were on every hand by apostacy and treason, by temptation and the allurements of power, they have kept the faith and made a record which will grow bright with time.

A great battle has been fought and a complete victory won for the establishment of a real Republic. In this grand battle soldier and civilian alike have participated and are entitled to equal honor. The one was a necessity to the other. Without the unselfish heroism of the soldier and the fidelity of Abraham Lincoln and his faithful coworkers in the national Congress, defeat would have been inevitable.

During these memorable years I count it a great honor to have been intimately associated with some of the grandest men who ever represented any people. To their fidelity and the heroism of the soldier we owe our redemption as a nation. To this same class of men we shall owe in the future our progressive development in moral power and material grandeur. Much has been accomplished; much also remains to be accomplished. The history of the past is not without its encouragements. There is a place for all and labor for all. Let no effort be relaxed, and let no man grow weary or turn back in despair. He who battles unselfishly for the right, ever and always grows stronger and stronger. To-day the nation begins to realize that the divine command embodied in the "golden rule," and coming to us down the centuries, is breathing its spirit into the hearts of millions, quickening the faith and strengthening the heroic purpose of every noble man and woman. With this quickening faith the old anti-slavery guard went forth, strong in heart and brave in purpose, to battle for the rights of mankind. In that great conflict they were as true as the law of gravitation, and labored long and faithfully for the reorganization of the Government on the basis of complete justice. Free from selfishness, without concealment and without compromise, inspired with this great purpose, they patiently endured mob violence and the persecutions of maddened men. Though often assailed they assailed not again. In their lives they were as beautiful as the morning, tolerant as charity, and gentle as the spirit of peace. I can never tire in my praises of these grand men and woman. In our anti-slavery triumph and national regeneration behold the fruits of their labor, which transcends even the hopes and expectations of enthusiastic poets and philosophers. To them we owe a country redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled from the despotism of slavery, a country which to-day is presided over by the genius of universal liberty and universal peace.

National Currency.

REMARKS OF HON. J. T. DEWEESE,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1863,

On the bill to authorize the issue of a national currency, to assure its stability and elasticity, lessen the interest on the public debt, and reduce the rate of interest.

Mr. DEWEESE. Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House in favor of the bill "to authorize the issue of a national currency, to assure its stability and elasticity, lessen the interest on the public debt, and reduce the rate of interest," introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER, I may with propriety begin by quoting the language used by Sir Robert Peel, who, in introducing the bank act of 1844, said:

"There is no contract, public or private, no engagements, national or individual, which is unaffected by it. The enterprises of commerce, the profits of trade, the relations of society, the wages of labor, pecuniary transactions of the highest amount and the lowest, the payment of the national debt, the provision for the national expenditure, the command which the coin of the smallest value has over all the necessities of life are all affected by the decision to which we may come on that great question which I am now about to submit to the consideration of the committee."

I regard the passage of this bill as a measure of importance second to none that has been brought before this House since the creation of this Government; it is, in my opinion, the best, as it is the only feasible plan of relief from the excessive evils under which we are now suffering. The remedies offered so freely in both Houses will in my view serve only to aggravate, not cure the disease. I earnestly hope the gentlemen of this House have given or will now give to this bill the careful consideration it deserves. I know the apathy prevailing upon this subject. I know the difficulty of obtaining a hearing upon it, but it is a matter of too vital and universal importance to be dropped into oblivion. Strong convictions on this difficult question are not to be put down by authority; and when they happen to be right, as I feel sure mine are, I can only hope for their vindication by oft-repeated efforts to impress the reason of the people, that tribunal of last resort which tests all we do or say. Progress of opinion upon this subject is, always has been, and always will be slow; and although I cannot hope to add any weight to the argument of the gentleman who introduced this bill, I will do what I may to answer some of the objections that have been made to it. I will try to influence the opinions of the people by stating the reasons which have operated to convince me of its propriety and lead me to urge its passage.

I have been long convinced that the evil most grievous to be borne, and which is and has been making in this country, as in all others, the rich richer, the poor poorer, centralizing the wealth of the country into the hands of the few at the expense of the many, robbing the laborer to enrich the capitalist, is our unjust and unequal laws relating to money. The laboring classes of all civilized nations have always been and now are as a class poor, although wealth is the production of labor. Had there not been something then intervening to prevent the natural results the laborers would have possessed the wealth.

In our own country, where land is comparatively cheap and where labor commands a greater reward than in any other, some cause is operating with continual and continually-increasing effect to separate the production from the producer, to take the wealth from those who create it and give it to others. The wrong has for a long time been evident, and many are the schemes that have been devised to remedy it, but its true source has been but recently discovered, is now but little understood. Hence it is only recently that a plan has been proposed competent to prevent the wrong. There is a remedy, simple and effectual. It is to be found in part in the provisions of this bill. I say in part, for I think that the limitation of the issue of the currency proposed, to the payments made by the Government and to such persons as may choose to deposit therefor United States bonds bearing six per cent. coin interest, will soon have to be modified so as to permit the issue of the currency upon other securities; but with this defect, which may at any time be remedied, it is a long way in advance of any proposition relating to the currency I have yet examined, unless I may except the bill introduced last winter by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY.]

Believing, as I do, that this bill when made a law will possess great and beneficent power, I urge its passage, that we may speedily put it into operation and save the laborers, the producers of this country, from the oppression, degradation, and misery which have befallen the laboring classes of all other countries, and which is rapidly approaching them in our own. I affirm that the monetary systems of the world are a disgrace to the civilization of the nineteenth century, placing, as they do by enactment of law, power in the hands of a few capitalists to trample in the dust the rights of the laborer, on whom we depend for the food we eat, the clothes we wear, the houses we live in, and, in fact, for every comfort and luxury of life. The wealth of the United States is estimated at $20,000,000,000, and the population at thirty-seven million, and yet one half of this great wealth is owned by one hundred and eighty-three thousand men. Estimating five persons to each family these wealthy men and their families would number nine hundred and fifteen thousand persons; two and a half per cent. of the population of the United States own as much wealth as the remaining ninety-seven and a half per cent. I think that this estimate is rather under the actual figures than above them; that in fact one half of the wealth of the country is owned by less than two and a half per cent. of the population.

If there be any who doubt that this small percentage of the population own half the wealth of the country let them single out the wealthiest men of their own neighborhood and see if half of the wealth is not owned by two and a half per cent. of its population. Now, unless this two and a half per cent. of the population have contributed as much labor physically, intellectually, or morally for the common benefit as the remaining ninety-seven and a half per cent. have, some wrong is done to this large majority. It is quite clear that they have not contributed an equal amount, and a grievous wrong is committed in diverting to the few the products of the many. The wrong is that a national standard of value like money, forming as it does the foundation of contracts, regulating the award of property, limiting all minor rights of freedom of contract, location, and occupation, and which a whole nation is compelled to use, must, if it be variable and uncertain, as that of every country of which I have any knowledge now is, affect injuriously the interests of every individual, except the great capitalists, as far as the money circulates. Our money has thus operated to the prejudice of the laboring man and the advantage of the capitalist; and now when, as an example of our prosperity, I am requested to observe the palaces of the wealthy, filled as they are with every luxury that art can create, I reply that a luxurious upper class, however elegant, if enriched at the cost of the poor laborer, is not an evidence of national prosperity; on the contrary, it is the surest evidence of national decay.

The present rates of interest on money enable the owners of property to demand an undue proportion of the products of labor for the use of property, and laborers are compelled to make agreements under these circumstances, and a very large proportion of the people are really wronged out of the earnings of their labor by the unjust operation of the laws. The laborers who produce present products should receive a large proportion of them; capitalists who do not labor, who produce nothing, should receive only a small proportion of reward. The reverse of this is now true, and the unfair distribution is caused by an unjust legal standard of distribution. Distribution is regulated by the standard of value, the medium of exchange, which is money.

The Special Commissioner of the Revenue, for whose industry and abilities I have due respect, tells us that among the agencies now operating adverse to our national development is an irredeemable paper currency. If by an irredeemable paper currency the Special Commissioner means a currency not convertible into gold or silver at the pleasure of the holder, then must I differ from the gentleman, for I stand here an advocate of an inconvertible paper currency, believing that it will, if fixed upon the basis provided for in this bill, prove a stimulus and not a hindrance to our national development and progress.

I hear but I do not heed the clamor of those who insist upon a return to a specie basis, who tell us that we must have respect to the laws and customs of the past, and who predict ruin from innovation. All improvement is an innovation, and unless we make innovations we had far better go home to our constituents, for it was to make innovations that we were sent here. One half of my constituents owe not alone their right to vote but their right to liberty, or rather its possession, to an innovation, and one that eight years ago found fewer advocates upon this floor than it now finds assailants. The abolition of slavery and the recognition of the rights of the negroes is one of the most important innovations ever known in this country, and we all recollect the ruin we were told was to follow this innovation; but as yet it has not come, and instead of the evils predicted we have found only blessings. The antiquity of laws and customs is no proof of their excellence. In all ages and in all countries the producing classes have been ill paid for their labor. Shall we recur to ancient laws and usages for precedents to perpetuate the evil, to uphold our unequal and unjust standard of distribution? We cannot alter the evils of the past; we can remedy those of the present and prevent them from recurring in the future.

If past Legislatures have enacted laws giving a part of their constituents great advantages over the remainder it is our duty, having discovered the error, to amend the law so that it shall operate equally upon all; the alteration is not an infringement of the rights of those who received undue advantages from the former law; it only renders justice to those previously injured. The moral and social evils which have resulted from our unjust standard of distribution are incalculable, the wrong is enormous and universal. Money is the national standard of distribution; the evils inevitable upon its present institution are national evils, and can only be removed by the action of Congress. We can so regulate the standard that the general distribution will be in accordance with actual earnings. Shall we hesitate to do right when we see that the remedy will prove gentle, immediate, gradual, and sure; that it makes no retaliations for past injuries; that it simply though completely protects the laborer in his rights by securing to him the fruits of his toil without in any way wronging the capitalist whose wealth has been accumulated by gigantic wrongs? Year after year the greater number of my constituents were held in a degrading and cruel slavery. It was thought to be a great and dangerous innovation to set them free, but it was at last accomplished, not peacefully as this other great innovation may be, but by a long, devastating war. Having done these colored laborers this tardy justice let us crown our labors by doing full justice to workingmen and women of all colors by setting them free from our unjust laws relating to money. I believe that if this bill becomes a law the question of repudiation will cease to be talked of; the payment of the public debt, both principal and interest according to the terms of the contract, will then be as easy as it now seems difficult.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY,] in his argument in favor of an American monetary system, very truly said that "whatever is endowed by the sovereign power of the nation with the qualities of representing, measuring, exchanging, and accumulating value by interest is money; and any circulating medium not endowed by Congress with all these powers is not money, though its material be the finest gold." These qualities are coessential to a medium of exchange. It is impossible that any one of them should exist in any medium independently of the others. The material of money is the legalized agent employed to express these powers and render them available in commerce, and it matters not what that material is so long as it is endowed by the legislative power to represent, measure, exchange, and accumulate value by interest. The powers of money, which alone render it useful, are created by legislation; hence money can possess none but a legal value. Legal value depends upon actual value which it represents or holds, that is, the value of property or labor. Money must be a legal representative of property, for there is no portable material possessing the requisite inherent value to equal the value of the property to be exchanged. The property possesses the real value; the money is only the legal medium by which this value is represented and exchanged. The power to represent is always independent of the natural and inherent powers of the representative; it is superadded and delegated; it cannot alter the original capabilities and qualities of the agent. The representative is quite distinct from the thing represented. Gold and silver are property, and in proportion to their bulk valuable property; but these metals when coined into money become the representatives of property, although not more so than does the paper which is made into a note and endowed by Congress, as is our greenback, with the powers of money. A piece of paper legally representing ten dollars is just as valuable for all the purposes for which money is used as is a piece of gold representing the same value. The ten dollars made of gold and the ten dollars made of paper may each pass in payment for products, in exchanging values through the hands of fifty persons in a single day, and are alike ready to perform the same service upon each succeeding day. Every debt paid by the paper ten dollars is as completely paid as those paid by the gold ten dollars.

That this representative, this legal value is quite distinct from the intrinsic or real value will clearly appear if you attempt to use these materials for any other purpose than that of money. If, for example, you wish to make spoons, you can use the gold but not the paper, although, if your paper dollars are issued under just and proper laws, as many gold spoons can be purchased with the paper ten dollars as with the gold ten dollars. The value of gold and silver coins when not used as money consists in the worth of these materials for spoons, forks, ornaments, &c., and are a very small part of our actual wealth, and not indispensable to our existence; the gold and silver coins when used for these purposes cease to be money and lose all the powers of money—we call them not money spoons, forks, brooches, rings, &c., but silver forks, silver spoons, gold brooches, gold rings, &c.

The metals may be recovered by the Government and again become money. So if the paper has been ground to pulp, its value as money ceases; but it may be made into paper and by the Government again be made into money, receiving its former value. The laws have professed to establish the value of money in its material substance; the groundwork being false, they have practically failed to establish it on this basis although they have succeeded so far as to grossly deceive the public. To expose the fallacy of the assertion that the value of money is in its material substance, I need only repeat the illustration of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY:]

"The yard-stick is a measure of length, and it is of no moment what its material is if it is three feet long."

A yard of cloth measured by a gold yard-stick is neither longer nor shorter than if measured by a wooden one, and property purchased with gold and silver money is neither more nor less valuable than if bought with paper money. If the value of money be in the worth of its material it cannot be representative; if its value be not representative it would be as impossible to make paper money fulfill as it now does the functions of coin as to make a paper promise to pay a loaf of bread on demand as nutritious as the bread, or to make paper representatives of locomotives promising to pay real locomotives on demand capable of drawing heavy trains of cars. The advocates of a specie basis—for I think there are few who hope ever to have a purely metallic currency, or who suppose it possible to carry on the business of this country, much less that of the world, without the use of paper money—tell us that a return to a specie basis will give us the same standard of value as that of the other civilized nations of the world. Grant that the assertion be true, we have gained nothing; the standard is still a fluctuating one, no standard of value at all, a measure that contracts one day and expands the next—one which places our laborers not only at the mercy of our own capitalists, but of those of Europe as well.

If a bank with $1,000 in coin issue $5,000 in notes the amount of money is as much increased as if $5,000 in coin had been issued. Each dollar of the bank notes will pay for as many of the necessities of life, as much labor, as any dollar of specie, and so long as the bank notes circulate on a par with specie they hold the same power as specie; hence, if the value of money is inherent it must inhere as much in the paper money as in the gold money, in bank notes or greenbacks as well as in coins. Another property of money is the power to measure value. The length, weight, quantity, and value of all articles are settled by certain measures fixed upon by Government. The length of the yard-stick measures and defines a before undefined length of cloth; the size of the bushel measures and defines a before undetermined quantity of grain; the dollar measures and determines a before undefined value of labor, land, or products; the value of the land, labor, or products does not measure and determine the already defined value of the dollar. All these measures are determined by the laws which instituted them and gave them power to measure length, value, or size. If the yard be variable the measure of length will commit frauds when it is used, and if its value be fluctuating the measure of value will, whenever it is used to measure the value of labor, land, or products, commit frauds. If the measure of value be equitable, unvarying, it will measure values equitably and without variation. The Government very properly reserves the right to fix the length of the yard, the weight of the pound, the size of the bushel, and the value of the dollar, that they may be fitted for public use. Money is the public measure of value, and the Government is bound to make it just and uniform, that it may correctly measure and determine the value of all commodities. And this the Government has not done; for the value of the dollar fluctuates from day to day, even from hour to hour, is as false a measure of value as a yard-stick would be of length which at one time contracted until it was but one foot long and at another stretched out until it was six feet long.

I shall but briefly notice the two other properties of money, one of which is to accumulate value by interest; this power is essential to the existence of money as no one will exchange productive property for money that does not represent production. The legal power of money to accumulate by interest compels the borrower in a given period, determined by the rate of interest, to procure by the sale of his labor or products an equal amount of money as great as the amount borrowed, and give it together with the amount borrowed to the lender. If he pay interest at the rate of six per cent. half yearly he must double the amount in less than twelve years; at three per cent., in less than twenty-four years; at one per cent., in about seventy years. The worth and amount of the interest on the dollar determines the value of the dollar as much as the amount and kind of labor that a man can perform determines his value as a workman. The value of the workman is, however, natural, consisting in his power to produce; the value of money is artificial, and consists in its arbitrary power to represent actual value and accumulate by interest. A dollar which can be loaned for twelve per cent.

interest is worth twice as much as one that can be loaned for but six per cent, just as stock that yields annually a revenue of twelve per cent. is worth twice as much as one that yields a dividend of but six per cent. The value of money as much depends upon its legal power to be loaned for an income as the value of a farm upon its natural power to produce or as the value of a horse upon his ability to perform useful labor for his possessor. Another power of money is to exchange value; it is made by law the public representative of value, and when the interest is fixed at a just rate it is fitted to perform the duty of money; that is, the equitable exchange of property. Money is not merchandise, and it differs in this: articles of value are designed to be actually used or consumed; money, the medium of exchange, is designed to be continually exchanged for articles for use and consumption. If the material of money is used as a commodity, if coins be converted into spoons, the owner must keep them to make them useful; they no longer represent value, measure value, accumulate value by interest, nor are they capable of exchanging value. Having now considered what money is, and having, as I hope, clearly shown that it is but a combination of legal powers expressed upon metal, paper, or any other substance; that its value is the standard determining the value of all other things, while it serves as a medium of exchange for land, labor, and all merchandise, I hope I have at the same time made it plain that the natural powers or intrinsic value of any material do not make it money; that be the material what it may its powers as money are all legal and delegated. Some material is necessary to which shall be delegated by law the powers I have named as belonging to money. Gold and silver were early selected, because they were, in proportion to their bulk, possessed of great intrinsic value by reason of the quantity being small. I object to the use of these metals as the material of money, because the quantity is so limited and because it is so expensive. The material of money should be plenty, cheap, and easily portable. All these requisites are found in paper.

The claims made for gold and silver, as the materials for money, that their value is inherent and that it always remains the same, have no foundation in fact. Gold fell in value about seventy-five per cent. upon the discovery of America; it has fallen nearly twenty-five per cent. since the discovery of the rich mines of California and Australia, and as these mines are more fully developed and more economically worked it must continue to fall; but if it should become as cheap as iron it would not then be so valuable as paper for the purposes of money, paper being so much more portable and so much more cheaply made into money. The quantity of gold and silver being limited and made the agent of these legal powers, it becomes necessary to acquire its possession to discharge debts and to make purchases; hence, its owners are enabled to extort from the necessitous a very high price for its use. If gold were not used as money it would find its level as a commodity; its abundance would not cause an inflation of business, or its scarcity produce distress. Should we continue to use gold as a currency its increased quantity would only render more bulky and abundant an instrument of exchange the chief merit of which has always been thought to consist in its scarcity and its portability.

The Governments of the world have endeavored to fix by law the rate of interest as well as the nominal value of the dollar, but their measures have always been but half measures and have accomplished little or nothing. The Government has fixed a value upon coins, prescribed their weight and fineness, denounced severe penalties upon those who should coin money even of the same weight and fineness. If money be not the creation of law, if it be but a commodity as many contend that it is, why have Governments taken so much care to reserve the right to make it, and why is it that it can be at all times exchanged for all other products and property, and that all other more necessary commodities are at certain times esteemed almost worthless compared with it? It is answered that it is because it is made by law the legal tender for debts that it has this superiority over every other commodity. The answer proves that it is not a commodity, for a legal tender is a creation by law of certain properties which do not belong to any substance, but which are made to represent all substances. Human reason is useless, given to man only to juggle and confuse him, or the proposition that money is the creation of law, its value not depending upon the material of which it is made, is true. Resumption of specie payment, even were it possible to-day, would not take the power out of the hands of the moneyed despots. A low rate of interest, one that corresponds to the accumulation of value of other property, is the only means to prevent the tyranny of the moneyed men of the country. I will not say more upon the various schemes for changing the value of our present currency to put it upon a specie basis than that in my opinion none of them are possible, and an attempt to enforce either or any of them would create such wide-spread ruin as to speedily convince the members of this House that they had attempted to force upon the people a measure more disastrous in its consequences than would be an attempt to reenslave the colored people of this country.

To secure a low and uniform rate of interest we must provide for the funding of the currency in bonds bearing a low rate of interest, which are again exchangeable for currency at a slightly increased rate of interest. Let us pass this bill, provide a cheap currency, reduce at once the rate of interest we are paying the public creditors, and so take a weight off the shoulders of the tax-payers. Let us reduce the public expenditure wherever it is economical so to do. If the Army and Navy are superfluously large, as I think they are, let us reduce them, for every dollar unnecessarily spent upon either is dissipated, destroyed, and wasted. So far as it is necessary for the peace and prosperity of the nation I favor the support of armed men and ships, but every dollar spent beyond that necessity is stolen from the laboring men of the country, and it shall not be done with my consent. We must take care that what we get in the way of security is worth all it costs. We have no right to spend the people's money except it be clearly for the good of the whole people. Reduce the Army and Navy, providing liberally for our wounded and disabled officers and soldiers; cut down the civil list to the lowest limit consistent with the proper discharge of the public business, and with the prosperity of the laborers we shall see a true prosperity of the whole people.

Destruction of Territorial Governments.

SPEECH OF HON. W. A. BURLEIGH,

OF DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1869,

In opposition to the bill (H. R. No. 1625) providing for the destruction of the territorial governments of Dakota and Utah.

MR. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, in presenting the memorials and remonstrances of the citizens of Dakota against the passage of the bill reported to this House by the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, which provides for the immediate destruction of the territorial government of Dakota and contemplates the annihilation of Utah at an early day, I will say that, in my judgment, it is one of the most unjust and impolitic measures that has ever been reported by a committee for the consideration of Congress. Unwise in its inception, as it will be found cruel and oppressive in its operation toward the people of the Territories, I think this House cannot fail to see—that I know to be true—that its inevitable tendency will be the destruction of all confidence in the future action of Congress, by rendering insecure the rights and privileges of our citizens after having been guaranteed by organic laws.

None of the rights and immunities which Congress guaranteed to the people of Dakota when it gave to them a territorial organization, none of the privileges which they acquired under their organic law, or which have been conferred upon them by local legislation had in conformity to that law, are by this bill respected in the slightest degree; on the contrary, they are utterly ignored, while the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Territories, for himself and his colleagues, in the blandest and most deliberate manner proposes to reduce to a state of vassalage the whole population of a great Territory, in extent four times as large as the State of Ohio, by this most extraordinary and despotic act. Has it really come to this, that Congress will allow any one man to arrogate to himself and exercise the high prerogative of devising schemes for changing the boundaries of sovereign States and annihilating the great territorial organizations of the country at his own imperious will and pleasure? When before in the history of our national legislation has anything of this character been undertaken or thought of even? Never. So far from it, the boast of the American citizen has ever been that the safeguards of liberty are the common inheritance of all; the weak as well as the strong, the poor as well as the rich.

In 1861 the Territory of Dakota was organized by a solemn act of Congress. Emigration was invited there by that act. From almost every State of the Union people flocked to that new Territory, settled upon its fertile lands, established their homes, and became law-abiding citizens. The Government guaranteed them protection, they in return rendered to the Government a loyal obedience. Owing to the distracted condition of the country and to the almost continuous Indian wars which raged within our borders our growth was slow, but steady and permanent. Our Legislature met, and in strict conformity with the organic law which Congress gave us we established our courts of justice, located our capital, and erected our public buildings by private enterprise, for Congress refused to build them for us, as had been done for other Territories, we believing that the plighted faith of this Government was a reality, and not a mere myth. But, sir, how great is our disappointment. We are met here to-day, after having removed to these Territories with our families and property, after having spent years of toil there and suffered privation and want, and are stunned by the heartless proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, which proposes nothing less than the utter annihilation of our territorial organizations, the bankruptcy of our most enterprising citizens, and the blasting of all our bright hopes of the future. These, sir, will be the inevitable consequences of the passage of this bill so far as Dakota is concerned.

By the organic act of March 2, 1861, creating the territorial government of Dakota, (see Statutes-at-Large, volume 12, pp. 239 to 244,) Congress provided for a republican form of government, having all of the guarantees of the Federal Constitution and of said organic act. (See section sixteen, page 244.)

The Legislative Assembly had power under the twelfth section of said act "to locate and establish the seat of government for said Territory," and it was located and established at Yankton in the autumn of 1861—a point most eligible for such purpose. The government for the Territory thus authorized became fully organized in the year 1861, and the citizens of other States emigrated to the new Territory in large numbers upon the faith of the organic act. Then they purchased lands and erected buildings, imported flocks and herds, put up large and valuable improvements at Yankton, the capital, for the use of the Federal officers and the Legislative Assembly. The people who came into the Territory established their homes and made improvements with especial reference to the location of the capital, the establishment of the territorial roads and highways, and the location of a railroad from Yankton to Sioux City, connecting with all of the lines north of the Ohio river leading to the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. The population of Dakota has now reached more than twenty thousand souls, and the value of their improvements and property of all kinds amounts to many millions of dollars. The value of the buildings and much of the real estate depends upon the continuance and preservation of the territorial government under its organic act until the people shall apply to become a State; and all the improvements in the Territory were made upon the faith of the express declaration and promise on the part of the Federal Government that the people should be guaranteed a republican form of government, with a fixed capital, established roads, highways, schools, and other advantages arising from a government of the people under said organic act and the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Whether it be considered by this House good law or not, I accept as good common sense the principle that this organic act, connected with the settlement of a considerable portion of the Territory and the full organization of the government under it, creates a solemn compact between the United States and the people of Dakota, that they shall be protected in the peaceful enjoyment of that government so established until Dakota becomes a State of this Union. To destroy that government and annihilate Dakota by attaching a portion of its lands and people to Nebraska, and another portion of its lands and people to Minnesota, would be as great a political outrage as was the partition of Poland.

Pass this bill, and at one blow fifty per cent. in value of all their improvements would be lost, and the people would be subjected to State taxation by two States for debts which they had no voice in contracting. To what end had these pioneers on the outposts of civilization fought the savages, the wild beasts, and endured all the hardships of such a life, if the plighted faith of the Government is to be broken, as this bill proposes, and they are to be transferred as vassals or serfs to other State governments without their consent?

When Congress passed that organic act and opened up Dakota's broad prairies to settlement it extended a free and general invitation to the people of all the States and Territories "to go in and possess the land." With that invitation the Federal Government guaranteed full and ample protection of life, liberty, and property to every law-abiding citizen who should go there. There was an implied and an express contract entered into on the part of the United States with the citizens of Dakota that they should be protected in the enjoyment of every privilege, in the free exercise of every civil and political right, among the chief of which was the form of government created by the organic law. The people of Dakota have performed and fulfilled all the duties and conditions imposed upon them by this organic act; their rights have become vested and perfected under the common assent of all departments of the Government; and ever since the creation of the Federal Constitution there is not to be found a single instance of the destruction of an organized territorial government by act of Congress. From these territorial governments all of our States, except the original thirteen, have sprung and the assent of all administrations for eighty-five years past, and of every Congress since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in this uniform process of creating territorial governments, that afterward became States, is conclusive against the nefarious object and design of this bill, to inaugurate a plan for the destruction of governments without the consent of the people, who are the only true source of political power. What necessity is there for this assault upon the people of Dakota? Who asks for it? No one except the Committee on the Territories in this House. No one is to be benefited by it. Why, then, is the national faith to be broken, this Congress to be dishonored, and the people of that Territory to be beggared, as will be the case if this bill becomes a law?

The people of the Territories which this bill seeks to destroy do not ask for this unprecedented legislation; nor do the States to which the dismembered and mutilated fragments are to be attached ask for it. It comes in here upon the sole motion of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Territories, who insists that the sins of the inhabitants of Utah, like the blood of murdered Abel, "crieth unto him from the ground" for vengeance; and that Utah must be wiped out from the map of the nation on account of the sinful practices of its people and the anti-republican teachings of its prophets. But, sir, the destruction of Utah is not a sufficient sacrifice; it is too small a sin-offering for the cause and the occasion. The close of the gentleman's term of most valuable and meritorious service in this House is too important an event to be allowed to pass unnoticed and unchronicled. With Utah, Dakota also is marked for destruction, for annihilation. This great Territory, of more than one hundred and seventy thousand square miles, is to be blotted from the map of the nation. Not, however, for sins committed or sins conceived; not for anti-republican teachings or anti-republican tendencies, but for the all-important and vital purpose of making a prettier national map, just to please the scholars, and perhaps for the further purpose of turning over to Nebraska that portion of the Territory lying south of the Missouri river which has recently been set apart for the use of the Sioux Indians, whose presence will require large supplies and heavy disbursements of money. It is not to be suspected that the remote prospect of a seat in the United States Senate from an adjacent Territory has had anything to do with this plan to destroy Dakota and enlarge the boundaries of Montana and Wyoming.

But wherein is the beauty of the national map improved even? Look at it and you will find its boundary lines extended, with all the angles, triangles, and distortions that the science of geometry can devise. The sutures of a monkey's cranium are symmetrical when compared with them, while its improvement is as difficult to comprehend as is the wisdom or justice of the measure here proposed. What a luminous idea! How pregnant with every principle of profound statesmanship is this wonderful conception of territorial reform! Does any person regard the necessity of a pretty map with beautiful lines and multitudinous angles as paramount to the maintenance of national faith in standing by the guarantees of protection to life, liberty, and property which this Government has pledged to its citizens, or for a moment suppose that by congressional action vice can be eradicated from the nation, or from a State or a Territory even? As well might you attempt to legislate the sun from the heavens or banish from the hearts of men by legislative power their natural fondness for the fair sex—a slight excess of which appears to be the sole cause of Utah's present discomfiture. There must be some other cause for this extraordinary proceeding, although I am compelled to admit that I have failed to discover it. It cannot be supposed that political combinations are being made by which new capitals are to supersede old ones, regardless of the interests and without a word of consultation with the parties to whom Congress has already conceded this right.

But if my conclusions have been at fault, if the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Territories be sincere, and is really weeping over the sins of Utah and is struggling with more than prophetic zeal to purify the moral condition of its people and protect the fair daughters of that Territory from the practices of the patriarchal age, I mean no disrespect when I say, in my judgment, he has displayed less than his usual legislative acumen on this occasion by failing to intrust the management of this bill to some older and more infirm member of the House, whose silvery locks, attenuated form, and furrowed cheeks—in striking contradistinction to his own—requires no special plea to convince this body beyond all question of his sincerity, and that the contemplation even of polygamy is abhorrent to every feeling of his virtuous nature.

However much we may desire moral reformation, both individual and national, we cannot forget the fact that the only power by which it is to be effected is a moral power, and that for some wise and inscrutable purpose the Almighty has withheld it in a great degree from legislative bodies, while He has reserved it as His own special prerogative, to be exercised in His own time and at His own good will and pleasure.

But, sir, if the reasons which have been urged by the gentleman for the dismemberment of Dakota are valid and worthy the consideration of this Congress, why, I ask, have they been allowed to slumber so long? Why were they not urged at the time of its territorial organization? If they really exist now, with our rapidly increasing population, accumulating wealth, and multitudinous interests, how much more did they exist then; with how much more force and propriety might they have been pressed before the Congress of the nation breathed into its organization the breath of political life. Why this strange and unparalleled neglect in the discharge of this great public duty, by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Territories? Has it not been his especial province for many years past rather to care for the feeble, uphold the weak, and wait upon the great mother of Territories and States; to sit by her bedside during the tedious hours of travail and administer to her his own favorite "maternal relief" as she brought forth these children of promise, two of whom the venerable accoucheur now desires Congress to slaughter, cut up, and throw their mutilated remains to two elder and two younger members of the same family? Is there any good reason for the extraordinary action here proposed? Is there anything unnatural, is there any deformity in the case of these two offspring of one common parent, both of whom have grown up under the scrutinizing eye and nursing care of the gentleman from Ohio? Does their vigorous youth in any way threaten the safety of our national family, its prosperity, or the extension of its power? Nothing of the kind is pretended, and I entreat him to exercise those parental virtues, patience, forbearance, and nursing care, which will do much toward removing the evils complained of, to abandon his rash design, to stay his "uplifted hand and outstretched arm," and not strike the murderous blow which he has so deliberately aimed at these two children of the great mother of States, both of whom were conceived and born in lawful wedlock, beneath the Dome of the nation's Capitol and the "star spangled banner," and were baptized in the creed of our national faith in the presence of both Houses of Congress, every department of the Government acting as sponsors, and received the certificate of birth and baptism under the great seal of the Republic.

But, sir, if the inhabitants of Utah have sinned by adopting the patriarchal custom of polygamy, which is in opposition to the civilized and Christian system of monogamy, and if this alleged sin can only be expiated by depriving that Territory of political life, I must solemnly protest, in the name of the loyal and free people of Dakota, in the name of my country, whose honor it seeks to destroy, against the right of this Congress or any other power beneath God's shining sun to impute to them the crimes of the polygamists of which they are not guilty, or to punish them for transgressions which they have never committed. A more loyal, patriotic, and law-abiding people than my constituents of Dakota cannot be found in the Union. During the late war they gave as large a proportion of their male population to the Union cause as any other Territory. They organized their own troops to protect the inhabitants of Dakota and the frontiers of Iowa, Nebraska, and Minnesota from Indian depredations. They pursued a policy so wise and conciliatory toward the Indian tribes as to enable them to organize and equip a considerable Indian force that has always proved faithful and efficient in defense of the inhabitants of that Territory against the hostile Indian tribes surrounding it. They challenge the scrutiny of the Committee on the Territories in regard to the faithful manner in which the territorial government of Dakota has been administered. For economy, efficiency, and just policy, I know of no better example in the Republic. While the whole southwestern and southern portion of our territorial domain is in a blaze of Indian war, that is costing the nation at the rate of more than forty million dollars a year, peace and tranquillity reign uninterruptedly throughout Dakota under the wise and conciliatory policy pursued by her people in their dealings with the savages.

And now, sir, I appeal to this honorable body, and ask if you will sanction, by your approval, a measure so fraught with injustice, bad faith, illegal and unconstitutional oppression and wrong as this bill? If the principles of justice and equity yet linger within this legislative Hall, where the Representatives of the people meet and exercise the sovereign power of this nation; if the binding force of the official oath still retains its solemn obligations; if, while so much time is spent in reconstructing States, it would be unwise to inaugurate a system for the destruction of organized Territories, I ask that you will withhold your approval from this measure, so fraught with ruin, disaster, and oppression to the loyal people of Dakota, whose vested rights and political existence it aims to destroy.

Resumption of Specie Payment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. V. L. PRUYN,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 5, 1869.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. PRUYN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I propose to submit some thoughts on this subject which now occur to me without any of the thoroughness of arrangement and detail which has characterized the remarks of many who have preceded me, leaving it to some other occasion, if need be, to elaborate them. I have no new theory to propound in regard to the payment of our Government debt. I have no method to propose by which it is to be liquidated or got rid of in some mysterious way, by some funding or other process, or by some fanciful scheme of an overwrought or enthusiastic brain without the pressure of taxation upon the people. I have no plan of that kind to advance. My views on the subject are very simple and I think perfectly practical, and I will submit them as briefly as I well can.

Gold by the common consent of mankind at all times and by all nations has been considered as the standard of value. We hear of it in the second chapter of Genesis, where the land of "Havilah" is spoken of, "where there is gold, and the gold of that land is good." It is useless to question this standard. Whoever has attempted it has failed in the attempt, and the common judgment of mankind has settled down upon it as the most reliable. There are those who say that gold is to be looked upon only as an article of merchandise and not as a standard of value. I shall not now attempt to controvert such views, because I look upon the matter as settled by a sentiment so universal that it is useless to question it.

The evils attendant upon paper money, which were experienced during the revolutionary war, were so great that when the founders of the Government met in Convention to prepare our Constitution this subject arrested their most earnest attention, and there can be no doubt that they supposed when that instrument was completed that they had established gold and silver coin to be the standard of value, as well for the States as for the Federal Government. Let us test this by an inquiry: had the Federal Constitution, which inhibits States from making "anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts," contained an express provision that the General Government might make Government notes or bank notes a legal tender, does any person believe that it would have been ratified by the people? No candid man acquainted with the history of the times will venture to say yes to this inquiry. Notwithstanding all the troubles the country passed through for more than seventy years this principle was adhered to until the legal-tender act of February, 1862, was passed. I believe the gentleman who last addressed the committee was a member of the Congress of 1862.

Mr. BROOMALL. No; I was not a member until 1863.

Mr. PRUYN. I feel sure from the current of his remarks this evening that had he been here he would have voted against that act.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have always voted against expansion.

Mr. PRUYN. Many of the gentleman's views on this subject are so sound that I feel quite certain had he been here he would have opposed the adoption of that law. It was in my judgment a great error, increasing our debt unduly, leading to extravagance and wasteful expenditure, while our interest was payable in gold on the enormous amount of our obligations in like manner as if the act had not been passed. But I do not propose now to discuss this point. We are incumbered with a vast debt, for the payment of which the faith of the nation is pledged, and the question is, what are the best means to pay that debt, and what system of finance should be established which by its wise provisions will bring us back to specie payments and consequently to the extinguishment of the debt in coin, the common standard of the world.

There has, it is true, been very much discussion about the legal-tender act, especially with reference to the question whether the principal of the debt was by the terms of the act payable in coin or not. And notwithstanding all that I have read and heard in regard to it it appears to me that there is a view of the act which has never been sufficiently considered. It is one which I have always entertained from the first time I carefully read it, and which I think affords the true solution of its provisions. I will refer to it presently.

In the late political canvass neither party did justice to itself as to this great question of the public debt. The Republican party at the Chicago convention passed a resolution in regard to it, which was understood one way in one part of the country and another way in another part. It was a very clever political device, and it had its full effect. It declared in substance that the public debt ought to be paid according to the true spirit and intent of the acts of Congress creating it. What that true intent was presented the question in dispute. At the West both political parties, to a great extent, claimed that the debt might be paid in paper. At the East, however, a different view prevailed largely, and therefore this resolution did not fairly meet the question or put the party upon the unquestioned ground which it ought to have occupied on so grave a question.

On the other side the resolution passed by the Democratic party at the New York convention was supposed to insist upon the payment of the debt in paper under all circumstances, an inference quite unwarranted, however, by its terms. The view I take of the act of 1862 is this: its first section authorized the issuing of legal-tender notes, which the statute says—

"Shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever except for interest upon bonds and notes which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

The statute also provides that—

"Such United States notes shall be received the same as coin at their par value in payment for any loans that may be hereafter sold or negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and may be reissued from time to time as the exigencies of the public interests shall require."

The next section of the act—and that its provisions follow those already referred to is not to be overlooked—authorizes the issue of what are called five-twenty bonds, on which interest was to be paid in coin as already stated; but nothing is specially said as to the manner in which the principal is to be paid, clearly leaving that matter to the operation of the first section of the act.

The statute is one virtually declaring the Government to be unable to carry on the war on a sound financial basis, and the proposition it made was simply this: that finding itself in this situation, having undertaken a task to pay for which it had to draw on posterity, it said to the lender, "If you choose to lend us money, and we will take our own paper money from you, we promise to pay a large rate of interest in gold, but as to the principal you must take your risk." That is, if we come out successfully from this great contest in which we are engaged, if we retrieve our position and put down the rebellion so that we can resume our career of prosperity, then these obligations will be worth par, and as a matter of course be paid in gold.

If, on the other hand, we are defeated in our attempt to put down the rebellion, if our indebtedness becomes so great that we can only pay in paper, you must then take paper and hold it till we can pay gold; that is all we can do, all you can ask us to do; in other words, you must, if you choose to buy our loan on the liberal terms on which we offer it, share our fate—coin at the time named if we succeed, but if not, then paper, to be redeemed in coin whenever we resume specie payments.

Mr. POLAND. I would like to ask my friend from New York if any such construction as he now puts upon that statute was put before the people at the time these bonds were offered in the market? Does he not know that the question was put directly to the Secretary of the Treasury whether the principal of these bonds was to be paid in coin, and that the Secretary of the Treasury and every official from the Secretary down declared that that was the true construction of the law? Does he not know that every public place throughout the country was perfectly blazing with advertisements of the Secretary of the Treasury and of all the Government officials and agents that these bonds, principal and interest, were payable in coin?

Mr. PRUYN. My friend from Vermont states his facts, I think, too broadly; but I am well aware that there is some foundation for the questions which he has propounded to me and I am prepared to meet them, and while advertisements of the kind referred to were put forth in many quarters it must be recollected that the act of Congress referred to was published in every considerable newspaper of the country, I may almost say of the world, and that a publicity was given to it almost before unknown in our history. The gentleman from Vermont is too good a lawyer and a statesman to claim that any official of the Government, high or low, can undertake to give a construction to an act of Congress in the extra-judicial, unauthorized manner he has stated, or to give it any construction by which he can override the clear language of the statute. If so, our statutes amount to nothing. I am aware that the Secretary of the Treasury wrote a letter to a gentleman in answer to an inquiry which he propounded stating that the principal of the five-twenty bonds was payable in gold. I observe that the gentleman from Vermont wishes to make some additional remarks. Has he any other point to present?

Mr. POLAND. I desire to put another question to my friend from New York. I believe I am lawyer enough to know this principle that every man is bound to know the law. But when the Government of the United States has allowed all its officials to put forth to the people in every possible form that these bonds were to be paid, principal and interest, in coin, and when the people of the United States generally never saw the law and had no means of seeing it, I would like to ask my friend whether he would have the Government shelter itself under this principle that every man, woman, and child who took one of these bonds was bound to know the law, and that all the Government officials had misinterpreted it?

Mr. PRUYN. As to the point of publicity of the law, I have already met it. The gentleman, however, clearly yields the legal question, and I will meet my friend's criticism and the view which he suggests. The gentleman is not only enough of a lawyer to know just what this statute means, but he is so good a lawyer that I am sure when he comes to look at it thoroughly he will not misconstrue it. I am dealing with the statute. I am not dealing with what the Secretary of the Treasury or any one else chose to say.

Mr. POLAND. I am not, in the inquiries I make of my friend, questioning that he may be right in the technical construction of the statute. I think I could prove he is wrong. But conceding that he is right, when the Government in every form put forth to the people and induced everybody throughout the country to take the bonds on the pledge of all their officers that they were payable principal and interest in coin, would he have the Government shelter itself behind the plea that everybody is bound to know the law?

Mr. PRUYN. I must again say that the gentleman states his case too strongly. But passing this by I hope to show, or shall try to show, that the Government, although as the gentleman admits it may have the legal right to pay by new obligations, need not, if it be wisely administered, take any such course. Now, in regard to the consideration which the gentleman has made so prominent in his inquiries, I will remind him of a fact of very great significance in regard to this matter which occurred in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

It was said on the floor of the House, in substance, that the Secretary of the Treasury had stated that the principal of the five-twenty bonds was by the act of February, 1862, made payable in gold, and a letter from him to that effect was then read.

The late Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, who was then the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the leader of this House and the exponent of the Government, from whose hands in fact the statute came, at once most warmly denied that any such statement by the Secretary of the Treasury was in any way authorized, and maintained that there was no engagement whatever to pay the debt in coin. He went quite beyond the views I have expressed as to the character and effect of the act. This denial went at once to all parts of the country from the person best authorized to speak upon the subject, utterly contradicting the position taken by the Secretary of the Treasury.

This construction of the law derives strength from the fact that subsequently the ten-forty act expressly declared that not only the interest, but the principal also of that loan should be paid in gold; and the gentleman from Vermont and others will recollect that very special prominence was given to this fact throughout the country as well by Government officials as by the public press.

There is a clause of the act of 1862, providing among other things for a sinking fund, which it is a great misfortune was not complied with. It was enacted that the duties on imported goods should be paid in coin, and such coin be set apart as a special fund and applied, first, to the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States; and secondly, to the purchase and payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which was to be set apart as a sinking fund, the interest of which should in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury should from time to time direct.

The advantages and benefits resulting from a sinking fund, fairly and honestly applied for a series of years toward the payment of a great debt, has been so thoroughly proved in the financial history of some of our States, municipalities, and large corporations that it cannot be questioned. I know of nothing which will give greater confidence to the public as to the eventual redemption of the public debt than to find that year after year the Government has actually and in good faith laid aside something toward its payment. Had this sinking fund been instituted at the time the act directed and faithfully accumulated and applied, it would now probably have held $250,000,000 of the public debt. The effect of this upon our credit would have been most beneficial and decided.

This subject came up in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, when it was proposed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the coin in the Treasury vaults. I then called the attention of this House to the sinking fund provision, for the reason that if that fund had been properly kept up, or if the coin then due to the sinking fund had been taken from the coin on hand, there would, after reserving a proper margin, have been very little or none left for sale. The answer suggested to that was that if the sinking fund had been created the Government debt would simply have been so much larger, and therefore it was useless to create it.

To a person who reflects carefully on the subject that answer, although plausible, is to a very great extent unsound. We all understand the effect upon every community, upon every family of the obligation to lay aside a certain amount of money for a certain purpose during a month, a year, or any fixed period of time. It leads to care, to thrift, to economy; and I will venture to say that had this sinking fund been kept up as it should have been in good faith to the public creditor we would not have borrowed one half the sum to which it would now amount.

I have no time within the limits allowed to me to go into a detailed discussion of the various and conflicting views which have been placed before the community in reference to the act of 1862. The only plausible ground which I have heard in favor of construing it as promising the payment of the principal of the bonds in coin is that to which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] alluded; that is, that the Secretary of the Treasury and his agents stated publicly that such was its meaning; and this, it is argued, created an obligation upon the part of the country to pay it accordingly. After what I have already said I do not propose any further discussion on this point, nor in the conclusions to which I have come do I consider it to be material. The question is how is the debt to be paid? And I aver that with a wise system of finance, with judicious taxation on the one side and proper economy in public expenditures on the other, it will all in due time be paid in coin and the most punctilious public creditor be most amply satisfied in his expectations.

It was said long since that "there is no royal road to learning" and "no new way to pay old debts." Our national debt must be paid by the labor and the industry of the country. There is no other way to pay it. You cannot distinguish it by any mysterious financial process. The duty stares us in the face, and must be met boldly. How is it to be discharged? My time will only allow me to present a few considerations on the subject.

In the first place it is asked what can Congress do with reference to what is called the financial question; that is, the resumption of specie payments? The moment we resume, the bond question is at once disposed of. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] that it can do very little about the matter—certainly not directly, but it may do much indirectly. We cannot by any act of Congress fixing a day for the resumption of specie payments bring about that event unless the country is in a proper condition for the purpose. The idea that the fiat of Congress can compel resumption is somewhat like the proposition made in England to abolish original sin by act of Parliament. No; Congress cannot do it. Congress can help in the work, but the burden of it must continue to rest where it now rests, upon the shoulders of the people; their labor, their industry, must accomplish it. Legislation can do much to help along and still more to embarrass it. And in considering what it can do one of the first things that presents itself is the matter of the currency.

Now, I do not agree with many persons that there is a very great excess in the currency. I cannot go into the reasons for this belief further than to say that since the opening of the war in 1861 the country has largely increased in population, in business, in wealth; that much more money is carried in the pockets of the people than formerly, and that to a certain extent every man has now become his own banker. Formerly every person having money beyond his immediate wants would at once carry it to his bank of deposit for the purpose of getting rid of the responsibility of taking care of it. The bank would immediately use the money, and in that way the circulation of the country, looking at its amount, was formerly very much more active than at present. But now we find that almost every business man in every quarter of the country has his own strong-box in which he will accumulate his funds for the purpose of meeting his obligations. So that of $700,000,000, which is about the total of the circulation at this time, I think it may be safely estimated that fully $150,000,000 are actually locked up in the way I have mentioned.

Before the war we had about four times as much currency in circulation as we had gold and silver in the country to redeem it, but still our bank notes passed from hand to hand as the equivalent of coin. Why was it? Why did all of us with the admitted inability of the banks to redeem their circulation take bank notes as an equivalent for so much gold and silver? Simply, and here is the whole point of the matter, because we had "faith" in the labor, in the business—in the integrity, if you please—of the country to pay its debts, public and private. In short, we believed that the country was able to meet its obligations honorably, and the banks were just as able to meet theirs. But the legal-tender act of 1862 changed all this; we declared our inability to sustain ourselves on a sound financial basis and that we must draw on the future to help us, and our drafts were so numerous and so large that our own people lost confidence in our Government securities, and of course the world did so also. Confidence, "faith" has as yet but measurably returned. By wise financial management it will be restored, and when that comes, and not till then, we will resume specie payments. When this shall be depends upon ourselves. But it never will come until our financial system is put on a sound basis, and the world understands, not only that we are willing, but that we are able to pay our debts without imposing undue and excessive burdens upon the people. This last consideration is important in every view we may take of financial matters. We have met taxation—excessive taxation—liberally, nobly. The history of civilization affords no parallel to it. But this cannot continue without limit. History teaches us very plainly that no people will consent to the indefinite prolongation of such a state of things.

As soon as we are satisfied that the legislation of the country is wise and just, that our system of finance is what it ought to be, that revenue judiciously raised at the smallest possible cost (the reverse of our whole course thus far) is adjusted to judicious expenditure, our securities will rapidly appreciate in value, and we will soon reach the point of specie payments. I have not now the time, nor will it be expected of me that I should enter upon detail and mark out an entire scheme of taxation on the one side and of expenditure on the other. It is a great point gained if it be distinctly understood that those in power will insist upon and enforce proper economy in all departments of the Government. Let a beginning be made here in this Capitol, with this House, with the Senate, with all the arrangements about us. Here let reform and retrenchment begin; there is ample room for it. Let it be carried into your Executive Departments, into the Army, the Navy, and above all into your revenue service, where frauds so glaring and so great have been committed that the country has been shocked by the exposures made in regard to them. Simplify your scheme of taxation, impose burdens on a small number of articles instead of the present endless catalogue, and thus effect a vast saving in the expense of collection.

Let the Government do these things, others will necessarily follow; and with the results which a few years of wise financial administration will give our credit will be established, our securities will command not their present reduced rates as compared with even those of third-class Powers in Europe and elsewhere, but a value correspondent with our resources, and we will soon reach the result which all so much desire—a return to specie payments. I repeat, no fanciful schemes will do this; no plans or resolutions of boards of trade, of commercial associations, of State Legislatures, of congressional authority, can accomplish it. Labor—that of the mechanic in his workshop, that of the farmer blessed by the bountiful returns of Providence—labor in all its varieties must and will, with a wise Government, work it out if not baffled in its attempts by careless or corrupt legislation.

Aspect of our Country.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE F. MILLER,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 25, 1869,

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, during the last eight years our country has passed through a critical period. When Mr. Lincoln took the presidential chair and assumed the reigns of Government we were upon the eve of a rebellion which arose to a magnitude that surprised not only this but all other nations. No other President had ever been placed in such an embarrassing position. But it seems that an all-wise Providence destined him for the great work of saving this Republic. Mr. Lincoln on assuming the Presidency was anxious to avert the catastrophe of a war, and did not desire to interfere with slavery in States where it then existed, but was decidedly opposed to its extension. Its advocates, however, were determined to have their favorite system extended and placed upon what they denominated a "more permanent foundation," and were, as they thought, prepared for the mighty contest between freedom and slavery. The slaveholding States claimed one after another to secede until they amounted to eleven. They organized armies, and the first rebel gun was fired on the 12th of April, 1861, which stimulated the northern patriots to action, and there was a mighty rising of the people, who flew to arms, and, after a long and bloody contest of the contending armies, which cost hundreds of thousands of lives and millions of treasure, the armed rebellion was subdued, and resulted in the overthrow of that system which for so many years had caused a bitter feeling between the northern and southern States.

Slavery, as a war measure, met with its first check by the proclamation of President Lincoln under date of September 22, 1862, and that followed by the one of January 1, 1863, and received its final blow by the adoption of the constitutional amendment known as article thirteen, which provides that—

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

The firm and undaunted courage of President Lincoln during the existence of that terrible war will never be forgotten by the American people. His name will go down in history as one of the greatest patriots that ever lived. Though he lived to see the open rebellion subdued he was not spared to participate in the reconstruction of the rebellious States, but was deprived of that by the hands of an assassin, leaving the chair of state which he filled with so much honor to be occupied by another. Of his immediate successor I need say nothing, for his course has been condemned by all the true, loyal people of the country, and the retirement of Andrew Johnson from office will be hailed as a harbinger of better and more peaceful times.

The reconstruction of the late rebellious States was undertaken by Congress, and notwithstanding the opposition of President Johnson it succeeded in having all those States placed on a firm basis so as to insure the citizens therein a republican form of government and the protection of life and property, except Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas. Those three States have not as yet come up to the requirements of the reconstruction laws, but I trust it may not be long until they do. It may be said that the conduct of the State of Georgia shows that the reconstruction laws had not the desired effect so far as that State is concerned. My answer, Mr. Chairman, is, that is not the fault of the reconstruction laws, but for the want of a suitable man at the head of our national affairs to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." When the so-called rebel States are properly reconstructed there will be little danger of another rebellion being ever inaugurated therein, and as the great bone of contention, slavery, has been abolished, legislation, with a representation from all the States, can proceed in harmony, having in view the prosperity of the entire country.

This, Mr. Chairman, will increase emigration to the southern States, and encourage the improvement of that section of country in agriculture, development of mineral resources and manufactures, which will render them more prosperous than they ever were or would have been under slave labor. Free labor infuses into the people new life and vigor; consequently prosperity follows. The late slave States by pursuing a judicious course will in a few years be among the most prosperous of this Republic, and the devastations of war therein, so far as relates to prosperity, will be forgotten, and the blessings of freedom duly appreciated.

The reconstruction being nearly consummated, which, aside from the late war growing out of the rebellion, was the most momentous question that ever devolved upon Congress to adjust, there are other questions raised calculated to agitate the public mind, the most prominent of which is in relation to the financial condition of the country. The late war entailed upon us a heavy debt which our national honor compels us to hold sacred. In the late presidential campaign the mode and manner of its liquidation was introduced by the two great political parties into the contest, and the people decided in a most emphatic manner that the national debt shall be paid in good faith, and that there shall be no shrinking from our obligations, thus showing to the world that the United States discards repudiation in any form that may be devised, and the man or party that attempts it is sure to meet with a merited rebuke.

I shall, Mr. Chairman, first remark upon the policy of resumption of specie payment before speaking of the condition of our national debt. Many schemes are proposed for bringing about the resumption, and members in both Houses of Congress are eager to present a plan by which the desired object may be accomplished. Some are for having the paper currency reduced before a resumption takes place; some for fixing upon a certain period when it is to occur without any reduction, and others for grasping at the golden egg at once. The question, Mr. Chairman, is, are either of these projects practicable? Suppose we should determine, as some desire, to try resumption either at once or at a certain period, say a year or two hence; have we coin in the country sufficient for that purpose? According to the last statement furnished us by the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears the coin in the United States Treasury amounts to $88,732,716 44. How much more there is in the country that can be made available it is impossible to say. Mr. McCulloch, in his report for the year 1868, estimates the gold and silver product of California and the Territories since the year 1848 at upward of thirteen hundred million dollars. He also estimates that upward of eleven hundred million dollars have gone to other countries in exchange for their productions. It is also well known that a large amount of gold is used in manufactures.

In the able report of the Director of the United States Mint at Philadelphia for the year ending June 30, 1865, he estimates the production of precious metals in the United States for the previous fifteen years at $700,681,566 75, of which $630,681,566 75 was deposited for coinage. And it is estimated in the valuable report of Joseph S. Wilson, esq., Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the aggregate amount of gold and silver remaining on hand on the 1st of January, 1848, among the nations of Europe and America in the various forms of money, bullion, and manufactured articles, was $8,122,000,000, of which $4,136,000,000 was gold, and $3,986,000,000 was in silver. This, however, like all such estimates, is but a mere conjecture. As we cannot come to anything like an accurate estimate of the coin in the United States, there is one thing we do know, and that is, there is very little in use as a circulating medium—in some States none; so that it would be very unsafe to attempt a resumption with the large amount of paper money we have in circulation, and a failure would be most disastrous. It would tend to depreciate our paper money to an alarming extent.

Then, on the other hand, will it do under existing circumstances to diminish the amount of paper money in circulation? That, in my opinion, is the only safe road toward an early resumption, (and in that I agree with the views expressed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report,) provided it can be done without injury to the business of the country. We must be careful to do no act that will bring upon us a repetition of the financial crisis of 1857, which swept over the country like a tornado. Let us next examine as to the amount of our currency under State banks prior to the passage of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of the United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," and what it now is under the national banking system.

First, as to the State banks, it is difficult to ascertain the amount of circulating medium under their operation, as they were local institutions and in many instances the circulation confined within narrow limits; but as near as I have been able to approximate to it from such information as I could obtain it appears that in 1860 the capital of such banks amounted to $421,880,095, and their circulation to $207,102,477, and the specie to $83,594,537, making the total of notes and specie amount to $290,697,014. In 1861 the capital was $429,592,713; notes in circulation $202,005,767, and specie $87,674,507, making for that year notes and specie amounting to $289,680,274; and in 1862 capital $419,761,812; notes in circulation $183,938,945; specie $102,207,559, making in notes and specie for that year under the State bank system $286,146,504; and their deposits during the same year were $297,127,226. In October, 1868, there were 1645 banks organized under the national banking system, with a capital of $420,634,511, having national bank notes outstanding to the amount of $295,769,489, and at the same time there were State bank notes outstanding to the amount of $2,006,352; individual deposits, $579,686,549 60; specie belonging to said national banks, $11,749,642 14. In order to show the amount of our present circulating medium we must add to the above the United States notes (or legal tenders as they are called) and fractional currency and the result will stand thus:

National bank notes outstanding.....	$295,769,489 00
United States notes.....	356,021,073 00
Fractional currency.....	35,511,127 54

Thus it will be seen that our present paper currency amounts to $687,301,689 54. It may be proper to state that I have not included in the above gold certificates amounting to $32,659,520. This, however, is not all in circulation, but what is we must depend upon for our circulating medium. In 1867 the Secretary of the Treasury had authority under the then existing laws to cancel $4,000,000 per month of the United States notes, and by thus withdrawing from the circulation a stagnation in business, and more especially in the western States, began to be severely felt, and Congress was memorialized from every quarter to put a stop to such cancellation, and consequently Congress felt constrained to pass an act suspending the authority that had been given to the Secretary of the Treasury to make a reduction of the currency except so far as relates to mutilated notes and the issue of others to fill their place, which act became a law on the 4th of February, 1868, without the President's signature.

By estimating our population at forty millions we would have about seventeen dollars and eighteen cents of paper money to each individual. Then, Mr. Chairman, if we have not more paper currency than the exigencies of the times demand, of course it will not do for Congress to permit a reduction which would be sure to bring upon us another financial crisis. Our paper currency is good; it passes in every section of our country without discount. It is equal to if not better than the old United States Bank notes and the people are satisfied with it. It has answered a good purpose; it served us in carrying on with success one of the most terrible wars that any country ever endured. Then why such a clamor for resumption? Clamor by whom? Not by the people at large, but by politicians, speculators, and some statesmen who seem anxious to show to the country that they have hit upon the favorite plan by which what is deemed by some a desirable object may be obtained; but, strange to say, we seldom find two agreeing upon a similar theory, which makes it evident to any reflecting mind that we are not in a condition to experiment upon such a grave question.

Our country is in a prosperous condition and has been so ever since the close of the war, with a slight exception, which is a remarkable circumstance in history, as financial disasters generally follow in the wake of a great war. Then, why agitate this question now? Why not be content in leaving "well enough alone?" We have not enough of the precious metals to answer for a circulating medium throughout the commercial world. That which is annually taken from the bowels of the earth does not keep pace with the increase of population and business wants. Since paper money must necessarily be resorted to, bank notes are issued in all European Governments, except it may be in Russia, where the entire circulating medium is issued directly by the Government. I am aware that it has been said that the Secretary of the Treasury keeps too large an amount of coin on hand; that it might be placed in circulation or, in other words, used in aiding to bring about specie resumption. As I have heretofore remarked the February statement of the Secretary shows on hand $88,732,716 44. This, it is true, is a large amount, but it must be borne in mind that we have a very large amount of outstanding Government bonds, the interest on which falls due semi-annually and must be paid in gold, and paid promptly, too. A large amount of these bonds are held in Europe, and if we had not a sufficient supply of the precious metals on hand to meet this demand we would be disgraced as a nation in the eyes of the civilized world. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I approve of keeping sufficient specie on hand to meet any contingency that might arise.

Before leaving this part of the subject I will notice one of the main grounds urged by the advocates of an early resumption, which is that it would have a tendency to reduce prices and consequently render living much cheaper. It is true that prices have very much increased, compared to what they were prior to the war, but so likewise have wages, and in a much greater proportion, and, beside, employment has been afforded to the industrious which never would have been the case if business were prostrated by a contraction of the currency. Never was there a time since the organization of our Government that business of all kinds—except for lawyers and sheriffs—was so prosperous as at the close of the late war. Those who, judging from the past, anticipated an awful crisis about to overtake us have been astounded, and well they might, for our success as a nation is unparalleled.

I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to be understood as opposing a specie resumption, provided it can be brought about without injury to the industry of the country; but I am satisfied that if it were now attempted we would have a repetition of that fatal disaster of 1857 and of prior financial crises. I would ask of what advantage would low prices be to the laboring man if his wages were reduced in proportion or to a greater extent, and worse than all, if he could get no employment; and it must be remembered that we have a large national debt upon us, of which I will speak more fully hereafter; that it now requires about one hundred and twenty-five million dollars annually to pay the interest thereon; that this and other expenses of the Government, aside from duties and sale of public domain, must be raised by taxation, and if prices are reduced by contraction, the products of the farmer, for instance, say one third or one half, and the manufactures in proportion, how are the taxes to be raised? I say let us be cautious before we take such a leap in the dark.

I will now notice briefly another subject connected with our circulating medium on which considerable feeling is manifested, and that is there is not a fair distribution among the several States and Territories of our national banking capital. It is true that many of our cities have considerably more than might be deemed a fair proportion, while the country has nothing like what was had under the State banking system, and not nearly as much as the business of the country requires. Some of the late rebellious States have little or none, and the reason is because, when this system of banking was inaugurated, they were in open rebellion against the Government and waging a war to destroy it, and now they complain that they have not a fair share. I admit that as far as practicable and the requirement of business demand there ought to be banking facilities afforded to every section of our country, but the question is how is this to be brought about? One proposition is to take from States having over a certain amount per capita and divide it among those that have less or none. If this rule should be applied indiscriminately to all the banks in such States as are alleged to have more than their proportion great injustice would be done to many of the country banks in those States that have not now anything like the capital that the business in such localities requires, nor what was afforded under the old system of State banking.

This, it seems to me, could be remedied without increasing our paper currency or working injustice to any locality, and that is by withdrawing from circulation United States notes or legal tenders to the extent of such banking capital as might be needed in the States having none or too little and issuing in lieu thereof to such banks as might be organized in such localities a banking circulation to be secured by United States bonds, as in case of banks now in existence. This would afford the relief sought for and in no way expand the currency, for I do not desire an expansion and trust it will not be attempted, notwithstanding I deem it impracticable at this time to contract the circulation. It may be said that by this mode the United States will have to pay such newly-created banks a large amount of interest on the bonds they will have on deposit as security. My answer is there will be no increase of national debt, for the banks will have to go into market and purchase the bonds, and it certainly can make no difference to the Government whether the accruing interest is paid to such banks or to an individual or whether a portion of our bonds are held by our own banking institutions or by foreigners. For my part I would prefer having them in our own country. If a plan could be devised by which our bonds could be made to bear a lower interest than at present it would be desirable. The mode I propose would, I have no doubt, be sustained by the country. I have not indicated, Mr. Chairman, in what I have said what plan I would recommend in order to hasten a specie resumption other than by contraction of our paper currency in case it was deemed expedient. I have carefully read many of the plans proposed, and have become thoroughly convinced that any attempt of the kind would under existing circumstances be disastrous to the country.

Aspect of our Country—Mr. Miller.

Ho. OF REPS.

The next great absorbing question is in regard to the national debt and how it is to be liquidated. The last statement furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury is as follows:

From which it will be seen that our national debt on the 1st day of February, 1869, is put down at $2,556,205,658 08; but that includes $52,017,000 six per cent. bonds issued to the Pacific Railroad Company, in which the United States are made secure and the company punctually pays the interest thereon. Deducting the amount of these bonds, our national debt at that date was $2,504,188,658 08. This, though large, is not discouraging when we take into consideration the vast extent of our country, immense resources and population, compared with that of other countries.

The following tabular statement will show the square miles, population, national debt, and per capita share of the debt in the European Governments in the year 1867, (which is the latest date I have found,) and our own in 1869:

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that our population is greater than that of either Great Britain or France; that our national debt is considerably less than that of France, and some twelve hundred millions below that of Great Britain, while the extent of our country leaves them both in the shade, as it is seen we have a country containing four million square miles. It is estimated by a French gentleman, who has made it his study, that the financial losses of our late war was as follows:

The northern States.....23,500,000,000 francs
which, in the aggregate, is equal to about seven thousand million dollars. In addition to the destruction of values by the war nearly a million able-bodied men were killed or permanently incapacitated for industrial pursuits, and hundreds of thousands of dollars in value were consumed by the armies, while they produced nothing in an economical sense. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the wealth of our country is great. It is difficult to estimate its actual value at this time. It is said, however, that it may be safely put down at $14,000,000,000; and according to the estimate of Commissioner Wells it should double itself every ten years. We have in the United States upward of forty thousand miles of railroads, among which is the great line from Omaha to San Francisco on the Pacific coast of some two thousand miles in length, and over sixty thousand miles of telegraph, besides a line of communication conveying intelligence with the speed of lightning across the Atlantic ocean to and from the Old World.

We can pay the interest on our public debt and the ordinary expenses of Government besides applying something toward the extinguishment of the principal without excessive taxation. It appears by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the disbursements by the War and Navy Departments between the 1st day of April, 1865, and the 1st day of November, 1868, amounted to $630,481,125 90 for indebtedness growing out of the war. These war claims are now pretty well paid, which will very much limit our expenses. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, our receipts from customs amounted to $164,464,599 56. During the same year the receipts from internal revenue amounted to $191,087,589 41, making in the aggregate $355,552,188 97. Mr. McCulloch, the Secretary, has estimated that hereafter the receipts from customs and internal revenue will amount to not less than $300,000,000 per annum, and that our expenditures ought not to exceed the following figures:

For the civil service.....	$40,000,000
For the War Department.....	35,000,000
For the Navy Department.....	20,000,000
For pensions and Indians.....	30,000,000
For interest on the public debt.....	125,000,000

Making a total of.....$250,000,000 which will leave an excess of receipts over expenditures of $50,000,000 to be applied to the payment of the principal of the national debt. This would be reducing the debt fast enough, for it ought not to be required of the present generation, that has done so much for the preservation of the country, to discharge the entire war debt; but those who come after us should be allowed to bear a share of the burden, as the entire war debt was about four thousand million dollars, of which $1,500,000,000 has already been paid besides immense sums paid by corporations and individuals in the way of bounties and contributions, thus leaving, as I have before said, a balance of Government debt of about twenty-five hundred million dollars. This can easily be borne by a country of the extent and resources of ours. If the growth of the country should cause an increase of taxation to meet the expenditures of the Government our wealth would in a corresponding manner increase the resources on which the same rate of taxation can be imposed.

I trust the time is not far distant when what is denominated "income tax," which is looked upon by many as odious, may be removed, and that sufficient revenue can be raised from customs and a reasonable taxation upon luxuries. It is said that the debt of the nation is upon the increase. It is true that there has been some increase during the last year, but it must be remembered that we had a large number of old claims to liquidate, besides $7,200,000 paid for Alaska, and a large amount of bonds were issued to the Pacific railroad. The latter, although it tends to swell the debt on paper, ought hardly to be counted in our indebtedness, inasmuch as the company is amply able to pay it, and it is not at all likely that the United States will ever be called upon to pay any part of that liability. The mode of discharging the national debt, as suggested by President Johnson in his last annual message, is too absurd to be noticed. It is nothing more nor less than encouraging repudiation, and shows but a limited knowledge in finance. What we want, Mr. Chairman, in order to make our debt easily borne, is an economical management of our national affairs, and the collection of the revenues strictly enforced.

There is another subject that I deem of vital importance to the country, and that is a judicious tariff for protecting and fostering American industry, and in some measure to prevent the balance of trade from being against us, and thus put a stop to such a large exportation of our gold to foreign countries. I will not undertake, Mr. Chairman, on this occasion to discuss the importance of the tariff nor point out the defects of the one now in operation, as my views are well known and my State a unit upon this question. I will therefore drop this important subject with this passing remark, referring to what I have said in relation to it on other occasions.

The Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Congresses have had arduous duties to perform, among which were the great reconstruction measures that were deemed so vital to the life of the nation, and which have been so vehemently opposed by President Johnson, who lavishly interposed the veto power. Happily, however, for the country, both branches of Congress, having more than two thirds of a Republican majority, had the power under the Constitution, which they promptly exercised in passing what they deemed wholesome laws over the vetoes, which, as I have heretofore remarked, when faithfully carried out, will afford peace and security to those residing in the late rebellious States, and add to the permanency of our Government. The labors of Congress during the last four years will not soon be forgotten, especially by its members, having been kept in almost constant session, owing to the refractory course of the President. It will be an epoch in our national history. Though some of our body differed in regard to important measures, and excited debates ensued, yet our associations in many respects were pleasant, and will ever be remembered with kind feelings.

In a few days a new Administration will be inaugurated and another Congress assembled, in whose hands our governmental affairs will be placed. It is fortunate for the American people that General Ulysses S. Grant has been chosen to fill the presidential chair. His strict integrity and orthodox views of the great national questions of the day give confidence, both at home and abroad, that the affairs of the Government will, in his hands, be judiciously administered, and that he will "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." And in SCHUYLER COLFAX, our Vice President, the nation has also implicit confidence. The financial question, so far as relates to our Government bonds, which caused so much excitement during the last presidential campaign, and led many to doubt as to their ultimate payment in good faith, may now be considered as settled, and confidence restored not only in this country but also in Europe, where not less than six hundred millions of United States bonds are held, and an attempt from any quarter to bring them into dispute will be rebuked at the ballot-box.

We have, Mr. Chairman, a country that we can well be proud of, containing an area of about four million square miles, with a variety of climate suitable to the various productions that add to a nation's wealth and comfort, and interspersed with great lakes and navigable rivers on which extensive commerce flows, and checkered over with railroads aiding in expediting travel and transportation of commerce; and, besides, we have telegraph lines extending in every direction conveying intelligence with the rapidity of thought; and we are increasing rapidly in all that makes a nation great and powerful.

The emigration to the United States from various foreign countries is estimated at about four hundred thousand annually, who are adopting this as their future home and augmenting our population rapidly.

We have added to our Constitution two important amendments, one abolishing slavery and the other regulating citizenship. Neither slavery nor internal war any longer exists in any part of our Republic, and we to-day stand before the world without a blemish resting upon us. Though as a Republic young, yet we are a great nation. Our commerce whitens every sea and ocean and our flag is respected by all nations. Here the oppressed of all countries can find a home, and if true to our Government will receive its protection. Here education is extended to all classes and our institutions of learning are of the highest order. May God grant that this Republic, founded upon truth and justice, may continue to prosper and its benign influence be felt throughout the entire world, and that other nations may be induced to adopt our form of government, where manhood alone is the test.

Military and Postal Railroad from Washington to New York.

SPEECH OF HON. C. HAIGHT,
OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 621) to authorize the building of a military and postal railway from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York.

Mr. HAIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the remarkable character and provisions of the bill now under consideration by this House and its probable effect in case it becomes a law upon the interests of the State of New Jersey, which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, seem to require that I should ask the attention and indulgence of the House for a short time, which I propose to devote to the discussion and examination of the legislation proposed by this bill. It must be apparent to the mind of every one whose attention has been directed to the object and purposes of this bill that there are principles involved in it of the most vital importance to all of the States of this Union, because it is declared that certain powers belong to and are invested in Congress which may be exercised in every State, subject only to such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe.

If this bill becomes a law it will be referred to as a precedent for future legislation of this kind and urged as being conclusive in regard to the principles upon which it is predicated. It is true the theater of its immediate operations is confined to three or four States, but the principles involved are applicable to all the States. Among the States to be affected by the operation and provisions of this bill is the State of New Jersey; and ever since the right or power of Congress under the Constitution to invade the territory of a State without her consent for such purposes as are claimed in this bill has been pending before or been agitated in Congress the people of New Jersey have manifested a great deal of anxiety and interest in the final action of Congress upon the subject. The geographical position of the State of New Jersey, lying between the two great cities of New York and Philadelphia, renders her more liable to be affected by legislation of this kind than probably any other State, and consequently enhances the interest her people feel in the rights and powers that belonged to her as a sovereign State and which she did not surrender upon the adoption of the Constitution; and her people will not willingly and without protest surrender the reserved rights retained by them when the State entered into the original compact, for such relinquishment would involve the practical surrender of all her powers of government.

I have no doubt, and never have had any in regard to the passage of this bill by the House. I have been in Congress long enough to be prepared for the passage of any bill, however doubtful its character or questionable its provisions, if it can be shown that it will advance the interests of the party in power or confer privileges upon those who contribute to its success. The objection to the exercise of power not conferred upon Congress by the Constitution was sufficient in the early and better days of the Republic to prevent legislation of even a doubtful character; but those days are past. A sufficient warrant by modern constructionists can be found in the Constitution for the exercise of any and all power if it is necessary in order to accomplish any cherished or fixed purpose. If the end to be attained is desirable the means are always at hand; and unless this idea of the omnipotence of Congress which has taken possession of gentlemen on the other side of the House is repudiated by the people of this country the destruction of the Republic seems to me to be inevitable.

The history of the legislation of Congress for the past few years must satisfy every reasonable mind that we have been rapidly advancing toward the consolidation of all power in the General Government, contrary to the express provisions of the Constitution as interpreted and understood by the framers of that matchless instrument, and in violation of the reserved rights of the States. It is surprising to me that the people of this country have not become alarmed at the wonderful strides that have been and are every day being made toward centralization. It certainly should give rise to the most serious apprehensions. Yet Congress proceeds from one step to another, while the people seem indifferent or careless of the result. This bill is another step in that direction, for if Congress has the right under the Constitution to pass a bill of this kind it is difficult to conceive what limits there can be to its power. The effect of such legislation will be to render the States mere dependencies upon Congress, without any sovereign rights which cannot be invaded by Federal authority at its pleasure.

It is to be regretted that the powers conferred upon the General Government by the framers of the Constitution are no longer the limits of congressional action, although they are few, well-defined, and easy to be understood. And it ought to be remembered in the consideration of this measure what are the boundaries between the General Government and the State governments, for the preservation of the public liberty requires that these boundaries should be observed. The powers of the General Government are principally confined to peace and war, negotiation, foreign commerce, taxation, and the disposition of the public lands. The powers reserved to the States are indefinite, and extend to all objects "which in the ordinary course of affairs concern the lives, liberty, and prosperities of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State. The operations of the Federal Government will be most extensive and important in times of war and danger: those of the State governments in times of peace and security.

But, Mr. Speaker, before examining the question whether Congress has the right or power under the Constitution to enter upon the soil of the different States for the purpose of constructing railroads, or can create corporations or take control and possession of those already created and in successful operation through State legislation, and by enlarging and increasing the privileges and franchises already conferred upon such corporations virtually destroy the domestic policy of the States, as is proposed by the bill now under consideration, I desire to call the attention of the House to some questions of fact which have been strenuously urged as reasons why this bill should become a law. It is alleged that upon examination it will be found that the facts relied upon by the friends of this measure do not exist except in the imagination of gentlemen who are anxious to seize upon every circumstance and magnify it in order to fortify themselves as well as they can against this great assumption of power. We are told by the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, who reported this bill to the House, that additional railroad communication is required between New York and Washington to accommodate the traveling public, and that is one of the reasons why this bill should be passed; but on the contrary it is claimed that this statement is not true in point of fact.

The fact is known by every one that a double track of railway has been constructed and is now in use from Jersey City to Washington. It is claimed that any number of trains can pass over the roads forming this line every day, affording ample accommodations for the transportation of passengers, freight, and merchandise; that by the expenditure of large sums of money the existing companies are prepared to do all and a great deal more than they are called upon to do; that they make the time between New York and Washington as quick as it is wise or prudent for them to do; and that their cars and accommodations will compare favorably with any railroads in the country. But it is urged that if they do now they did not during the war answer all the purposes for which they were needed. When the war broke out a sudden and unusual demand was made upon them, yet at that time the existing companies were sufficient to carry regiments of soldiers from some ten States, which were compelled to pass and repass almost every day during the war; but since that time it is claimed that they have increased their facilities and are now prepared to meet any emergency that can possibly arise.

But admitting the fact that during the war the communication between New York and Washington was not adequate to the demands of the Government and the public, the force of an argument at that time for additional facilities would not apply in the present condition of the country. We are not now at war, and the exercise of this power cannot be sustained upon the plea of military necessity. Whatever reasons existed at that time, if any, do not exist now, and in all human probability never will again. I do not understand that this additional line is asked for or desired to accommodate the citizens of the States of Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, or New Jersey, whose interests are mainly affected by the legislation contemplated in this bill. I will not stop to inquire into the fact contended for by some of the advocates and supporters of this measure that the companies forming the line between New York and Washington have not been faithful servants of the people. This may or may not be the case; their interest would seem to require that they should be, and my observation and experience has confirmed the belief that corporations like individuals in matters of business generally consult their interests; but there is one fact in this connection that will not be denied or disputed, that these companies, or at least some of them, incurred risks when it required courage to create these conveniences. Such facts require that we should at least deal fairly with them. But, Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as if this bill and this proposed legislation was an effort to break down and absorb the present railroad companies between Washington and New York to advance the interest of other parties for private gain, and to make the States of New Jersey, Maryland, and Delaware tributary to the gold kings of Wall street and eastern stock-jobbers.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. McCARTHY,] in speaking of the State of New Jersey, used the following language:

"The State of New Jersey, in which the Camden and Amboy incorporation and railroad exist, lays across the great highway running from the commercial and financial center of the country to many States and millions of people; laying an obstruction to an immense foreign and inland commerce, and which is soon to flow in increased volume from ocean to ocean, from India to Europe, across our vast domain; standing in the way of easy, cheap, and time-saving channels for the vast travel and traffic between the metropolis of trade, of commerce, and of finance and that of other States and cities and this capital, the center of the political power of our country."

Now, sir, I do not propose nor do I deem it necessary to defend the State of New Jersey. The wisdom of her policy in regard to internal improvements is a question for her people to settle in their own way without the interference of Congress. But I do deny that the State has been or is now an obstruction to foreign or inland commerce. The gentleman probably does not know that the State of New Jersey was the pioneer in the railroad system of this country. The first rail of iron for railroad purposes was laid in the State of New Jersey by one of her citizens. I am fully aware of the fact that the State of New Jersey possesses advantages over many of the other States of this Union, and that her geographical position confers upon her citizens privileges which few, if any, of the citizens of other States enjoy. I am also aware of the fact that she has always fulfilled her obligations to the General Government, and that now a great wrong will be committed if a railroad is constructed across her territory without the consent of the State. I am satisfied the cause of much that has been urged against the railroad policy of the State has come from a misconception of the system adopted by her, and from the fact that her legislation could not be influenced by stock-jobbers in their interests. I would not be understood as saying that I approve altogether of the policy that has been pursued, for I would have had it different in some respects if it had been under my control.

But again, the same gentleman in referring to the Camden and Amboy railroad says:

"A monopoly of the carrying trade, conferred upon a corporation and road by that State, thus preventing that healthy competition which insures to the public safety, speed, comfort, and cheap fare, all of which the advocates of special privileges and powers, yes, technical interpreters of the Constitution, forbid to the people at large."

Mr. Speaker, I know very little about railroads; I am not here in the interest of any railroad corporation; I am not a railroad man and never have been one; but I am surprised at the language of the gentleman from New York which I have just quoted. If I correctly understand it, it would seem to convey the idea that there is but one railroad across the State of New Jersey, and in fact but one railroad corporation in the State, and that corporation the Camden and Amboy railroad. Why, sir, he cannot be advised of the fact that there are to-day some six or seven railroads across the State, and that a great portion of the State itself is belted with railroads. According to her population and territory I believe her enterprise in railroads is behind no State in this Union. I have not the actual figures before me, but if my recollection is correct, and I know I cannot be far out of the way, the amount that has been expended in the construction of railroads in the State of New Jersey will reach in the aggregate the sum of $70,000,000, and the number of miles of railroad already built and in successful operation cannot fall far short of a thousand miles. There is nothing now to prevent the construction of competing roads; the special privileges that were granted have expired, and there is no restriction whatever upon the people, for the Legislature can charter as many railroads across the State as they see fit or proper.

It is stated that the object of this bill is to authorize the construction of a military and postal railroad from Washington, through the States of Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, to the city of New York. It does seem to me that the very title of the bill is intended to deceive and mislead, for the condition of the country at the present time is such as to show conclusively that there is no need whatever for a military road between Washington and New York nor anywhere else; and I cannot believe that the committee are serious when they give it that title any more than they are when they designate it as an "air-line road," for I do not understand that any one favoring the bill contends that it will be an "air line," because from the very nature of the country between Washington and New York that that would be impossible; besides, it clearly appears from the express provisions of the bill that such is not the purpose or intention of the parties who are interested in this measure. It has been said on the floor during this debate, and not contradicted, that—

"The road, if built, will be an 'air-line' running in a zig-zag, and will avoid the great centers of trade between Washington and New York. It is a job. It is a provision for the incorporation of a number of unprofitable roads into one and a sacrifice of the interests and rights of all save the stockholders of these roads; and it is to be enacted just when the great want which we have always felt is being supplied."

But it is claimed that the present route between New York and Washington is monopolized. Suppose we admit that to be the case and that it is as bad as it is alleged by those who are hostile to the existing companies, what do we gain by exchanging a lesser for a greater monopoly, for it does seem to me that no corporation was ever created or attempted to be created with greater or even so great powers as are conferred by this bill. Why, sir, by a careful examination of the provisions of the bill it will be seen that there is no limitation to the powers of this corporation; it proposes to run through New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, or any of them, and is in fact absolute over them; its route through the different States is not defined, but it can be located anywhere within the States named. The second section of the bill provides for the construction of a railway between the cities of Washington and New York, upon a route to be surveyed and designated by a competent engineer appointed by them and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, commencing at some point in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and running thence through the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, or any of them, to the Hudson river; and shall have power to construct a railway, which shall have a double track, from a point in the city of Washington to the Hudson river, opposite the city of New York, and to cross the Hudson river by ferry from such point in the State of New Jersey into the city of New York.

The fifth section of the bill provides that the National New York and Washington Railway Company shall have power to connect with and use, as a part of their said line or lines, any railroad or railroads now constructed leading in the general direction of the line specified in this act, by consolidation or transfer of the stock of said railroad or railroads with or to the said National New York and Washington Railway Company or otherwise, as may be mutually agreed upon; and thereupon the said railway hereby authorized shall be empowered to so change the grade, curvature, and location of such railroad or railroads as to conform to the requirements of the seventh section of this act.

This section confers great powers of consolidation, and it is the first step in the history of this country by congressional action to place under the jurisdiction of Congress the vast railroad interest of the country which has heretofore been under the control of the States as subjects of internal improvement. This assumption of power becomes the more alarming when we call to mind the fact that there are already constructed in this country over forty-two thousand miles of railroad, with many more thousand miles under process of construction at a cost of over three million dollars.

Mr. Speaker, suppose we admit that all the facts are true as stated by those who are favorable to and are urging the passage of this bill in regard to the necessity for additional railroad facilities between Washington and New York, and for the creation of this corporation as the means and instrument to effect it, still there remains a question of paramount importance to be decided, and that is: has Congress the power, without a violation of the Constitution, to pass a measure of this kind? There should exist no doubt upon this question, for this is not a time nor is this a subject which will justify the exercise of doubtful powers. It is proposed by an act of Congress to create a corporation for the purpose of constructing a railroad in some three or four States without the consent of those States. It cannot be claimed that any such power is expressly conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. The history of the formation of the Constitution furnishes abundant evidence that such is not the case.

The proceedings of the Convention that framed the Constitution are a matter of record, and the interpretations placed upon the different provisions of the Constitution, both at the time of its formation and since by the most eminent men this country has ever produced, are preserved to us; yet, in the face of the evidence thus furnished, we do find defenders of principles and constitutional interpretations that inflict the deadliest stab upon the whole State-rights doctrine. But after the clear views of Monroe, Madison, and Jackson upon the powers of Congress in reference to this matter it is no longer a disputed or doubtful question. We not only have the opinions of the ablest statesmen of this country that no such powers were given to the Federal Government, but, on the contrary, were expressly denied to it. All the decisions of the courts have been to the same effect. The best judicial minds of the country have always held that Congress could not create corporations, except in those cases in which they became necessary instruments for carrying into effect some expressly granted powers. But I do not propose to go any further in this question, for I do not see how there can very well be any doubt about it, except to refer in this connection to the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Osborn vs. United States Bank, (9 Wheaton, p. 860.) In reference to the creation of corporations by Congress he said:

"It has never been supposed that Congress could create such corporations. The whole opinion of the court in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland is founded on and sustained by the idea that the bank is an instrument which is necessary and proper for carrying into effect the powers vested in the Government of the United States."

The power claimed by Congress under the provisions contained in this bill will not stand the test of the rule laid down by the same jurist in a celebrated case, when he said:

"Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the Constitution; and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."—McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 421.

Mr. Speaker, Congress certainly has not the power to enter upon the soil of the States and create private corporations or take control of those already created by State legislation. That would be an assumption of power which would extend to the claim of eminent domain over the soil of every State, and the appropriation of the land and property of the citizens of the State deemed necessary for the construction of lines of communication between different points of the country. This should not be attempted by Congress for the purpose of constructing railroads or for any other purpose. Corporations have been created by the States under their constitutions and laws with such restrictions and limitations as were considered necessary to promote their domestic policy. But Congress, by this assumption of power, proposes to annul and destroy the solemn compacts entered into between the citizens and the State, impairs the obligation of contracts, and, in short, tramples upon the lawful enactments of a sovereign State. But it does even more than this; it takes from the States the right to control their internal affairs, for the corporations created by Congress will be under its control and subject to its jurisdiction; and the vast interests of the States, built up by their local care and local superintendence, will be absorbed by the General Government, and the people will feel the effects of these extraordinary powers in the increase of taxation to raise revenue to support and provide for the expenses of their governments which are now in a great measure supported by the income received from the privileges and franchises conferred upon corporations chartered by the States. A writer lately, referring to the fascination of the internal improvement system, has well said:

"The objects of the General Government and the nature of its powers are calculated to give it a preponderating influence over those of the States. It is our shield in war; its offices have more attraction for talent and ambition than those of the States, and its public expenditures embrace a wider range and are more diffusive in their benefits. The character of the public expenditures facilitates the transition from legitimate objects to such as are of a more doubtful character. It adds to the means of the citizens; it relieves their burdens; it multiplies their accommodations; it facilitates their means of intercourse; it stimulates their industry and enterprise, and enhances the value of their property. Its influence is seductive, its beneficent character silences inquiry, paralyzes resistance, and obliterates the memory of State rights and State obligations."

"Roads, bridges, canals, and telegraph lines are the subjects of internal improvement. Their use is to facilitate intercourse and transportation from one place to another. If any subjects whatever require simple municipal regulation more than others these are those subjects. Roads and bridges are a part of the 'triviale necessitates,' to which every citizen was bound to contribute by the ancient laws. They are altogether of a local nature. They require local taxation, local superintendence, and local protection. Internal improvements were not among the purposes for which the General Government was instituted, nor is it the object of any one of its enumerated powers. If the General Government has any power over the subject, pray what are the limits?"

"It appears to us the general subject clearly belongs to the States, and that the cases in which it may possibly become necessary to the execution of the enumerated powers of the General Government are exceptions to the rule and in confirmation of it. Yet such is the fascinating influence of the power that it is much to be apprehended that now it has gone so far that it is likely to obtain as common an operation as if it was among the enumerated powers of the Constitution. Look at the legislation in Congress to-day."

"It becomes those who still value State rights, and yet advocate the extension of the powers of the General Government to the subject of internal improvement, to review the subject and inquire whether they have not mistaken the exception for the rule, and whether the beneficent character of the power or the magnificence of a system of national improvement may not have beguiled them of their political vigilance and influenced their conclusions."

It is stated in the title of the bill that one of its objects is to authorize the construction of a postal railroad between Washington and New York. Congress by an express provision of the Constitution has the power "to establish post offices and post roads," and it is contended that the construction of this railroad for the transmission of the mails is an incident of that express power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. I am not aware that any authority has been produced in this discussion to support that position, nor do I believe that it has or can be successfully maintained. It was not so understood at the time the provision was incorporated in the Constitution, and the whole practice of the Government from its foundation up to this hour is a complete refutation of this implied power. The preservation of the institutions of this country and the liberties of the people forbid the exercise of implied power except to aid in the execution of expressly granted powers. The practice has always been to carry the mails over the railroads constructed under State auspices; they have proved amply sufficient; but it has been urged in this discussion that it is in the power of one of the corporations between Washington and New York to cut off all railroad postal communication between Washington and New York. This strikes me as an argument, if an argument at all, with very little force. The railroad companies of the country have always been willing and anxious to carry the mails, and it is natural they should be, for it adds to their receipts and emoluments. It is hardly within the range of probability to suppose such a thing will ever occur; it is very certain that presumptions or probabilities of that kind will not justify Congress to enter the territory of any State and create mammoth corporations, or take control of those already in operation under State legislation, in order to insure the pretended interest of the postal service. It is well settled that the meaning of the provision of the Constitution "to establish roads" confers the power to select the roads over which the mails shall be carried, but extends no further. Justice McLean says:

"If Congress can construct a bridge over a navigable water under the power to regulate commerce or to establish post roads, on the same principle it may make turnpikes or railroads throughout the country. The latter power has generally been considered as exhausted in the designation of roads on which the mails are to be transported, and the former by the regulation of commerce upon the high seas and upon our rivers and lakes. If these limitations are to be departed from there can be no others except at the discretion of Congress."

The practice having always been to carry the mails over the highways of the States I have failed to see any good reason why the policy should be changed now.

Mr. Speaker, when the Constitution of the United States was adopted the States surrendered to the General Government the power to regulate commerce, for the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution declares—

"That Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce among the several States."

And under this provision of the Constitution it is contended that Congress has the power to authorize the construction of railroads, turnpikes, and telegraph lines. If Congress has the power under this provision of the Constitution to enact the legislation contemplated by this bill I can see no limits to its power. The constitutional power to regulate river and ocean commerce is very different from the power here assumed. Does the power to regulate commerce among the States extend to the creation of instruments of commerce? I am satisfied that it does not, and was never so intended. The power to regulate refers to the control of what already exists. The creation of corporations by Congress in the States and without their consent, as instruments of commerce, was never dreamed of by the framers of the Constitution. It is true that railroads were unknown at the time the Constitution was formed, but the legitimate power to regulate commerce has no connection with the construction of railroads as instruments of commerce.

I know it has been contended that the power to regulate also confers the power to create, and, when necessary, to execute. When that necessity exists, I suppose, depends altogether upon the will of Congress. But it is not my purpose to occupy any time upon this question, for it has been so often the subject of judicial decision, and the distinction between the proper regulation of commerce and the attempt to create, construct, and exercise jurisdiction over the means and instruments by which commerce is carried on has been so clearly shown that I only refer to it for the purpose of calling attention to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in reference to the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The court delivered the following unanimous opinion:

"The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal, between citizens of the same community, or to a polity and laws whose ends and purposes and operations are restricted to the territory and soil and jurisdiction of such community. Nor can it be properly concluded that because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase foreign commerce, or fairly implied in any investiture of the power to regulate such commerce. A pretension as far reaching as this would extend to contracts between citizen and citizen of the same State, would control the pursuits of the planter, the grazier, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the immense operations of the collieries and mines and furnaces of the country; for there is not one of these avocations the results of which may not become the subjects of foreign commerce, and be borne either by turnpikes, canals, or railroads from point to point within the several States, toward an ultimate destination, like the one above mentioned. Such a pretension would effectually prevent or paralyze every effort at internal improvement by the several States; for it cannot be supposed that the States would exhaust their capital and their credit in the construction of turnpikes, canals, and railroads, the remuneration derivable from which, and all control over which, might be immediately wrested from them, because such public works would be facilities for a commerce which, while availing itself of these facilities, was unquestionably internal, although immediately or ultimately it might become foreign."

"The rule here given with respect to the regulation of foreign commerce equally excludes from the regulation of commerce between the States and the Indian tribes the control over turnpikes, canals, railroads, or the clearing and deepening of water-courses, exclusively within the States, or the management of the transportation upon and by means of such improvements. The design and object of that power, as evinced in the history of the Constitution, was to establish a perfect equality among the several States as to commercial rights, and to prevent unjust and invidious distinctions which local jealousies or local and partial interests might be disposed to introduce and maintain. These were the views pressed upon the public attention by the advocates for the adoption of the Constitution, and in accordance therewith have been the expositions of this instrument propounded by this court."

The effect of this legislation upon the States must be evident, for if Congress has the power to create corporations it has the power to control and manage them when created, and therefore all jurisdiction and control, including the right to tax these corporations and their property, is wrongfully taken from the States. It has been settled by the courts that—

"All subjects over which the sovereign power of a State extends are objects of taxation; but those over which it does not extend are upon the soundest principles exempt from taxation. This proposition may almost be pronounced self-evident." * * *

"The sovereignty of a State extends to everything which exists by its own authority or is introduced by its permission; but does it extend to those means which are employed by Congress to carry into execution powers conferred on that body by the people of the United States? We think it demonstrable that it does not."

It is not only claimed that Congress has the power to create corporations, but also to enlarge and increase and confer new privileges on those already created by the States. This certainly would be conceding to Congress a power unauthorized by the Constitution, for any attempt to take from the States the reserved right to regulate their own internal affairs is a flagrant usurpation. Suppose we take for example the State of New Jersey; how will her interests be affected? It will utterly destroy the large income now derived from the railroads already incorporated and leave the taxpayers to foot up a heavy deficiency.

I find by reference to the report of the comptroller of the State of New Jersey that the railroad revenues of the State during the past year were as follows:

Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company.....	$140,985 91
Delaware and Raritan Canal and Transportation Company.....	78,185 80
New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company.....	50,350 88
Belvidere Delaware Railroad Company.....	79 06
Freehold and Jamesburg Railroad Company.....	11 81
	269,613 46
In 1867 these duties, including a receipt of $26,724 41, which belonged to the year 1866, were.....	268,269 96
Excess of 1868.....	$1,353 50

The tax on capital was paid by the corporations mentioned below and in the amounts there given, to wit:

Central Railroad Company.....	$38,540 50
Morris and Essex Railroad Company.....	34,869 66
New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company.....	28,437 50
Paterson and Ramapo Railroad Company.....	1,240 00
Warren Railroad Company.....	10,295 25
	113,382 81
In 1867.....	99,971 15
Excess of 1868.....	$13,411 66

If to these amounts be added $20,410 95 paid in by the Morris Canal and Banking Company as rent, the gross sum received from these corporations during the past year was $404,407 22, which is a fraction beyond four fifths or eighty per cent. of the entire receipts of the State fund.

I do not believe the people of that State belonging to any political party are willing to give up the right so long maintained by the government of the State to control, regulate, and tax the railroad and other corporations within her limits.

The growing power and influence of the corporations in the States is dangerous enough, but it will be a great deal worse to have these institutions wielding millions of money as national centers of influence, controlling Congress by their power and exerting an influence not bounded by the limits of the State.

REMARKS OF HON. A. G. BURR,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. BURR. Mr. Speaker, in the brief moment allowed me I can only indicate my dissent from the bill in question and denounce the spirit urging its passage. In this bill it is specially declared that "the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver."

Sir, there is no equivocation in this language. It is plain, direct, and positive. It is intended to "remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government" on the public debt question. How very different this language from that in the Chicago platform of last fall which declared that the bonds should be paid "according to their letter and spirit!" There is no "letter and spirit" here; it is plain language, "gold or its equivalent." Why this difference? Because, sir, a grand conspiracy between parties holding Government bonds forced the Radical party to assume the position of servitude to bankers and bondholders during the canvass of last fall.

To secure public support loyalty was the battle cry, and to allay public suspicion by those who held that the five-twenty bonds were payable to the banker just as the pension was payable to the crippled soldier it was agreed that the platform should not specifically pledge gold payment lest it should be repudiated. Therefore the "letter and spirit" dodge was invented, and during the canvass "the letter and spirit" meant gold in one region and greenbacks in another. But so soon as a victory is won by the party on the loyalty line this bill defines what is meant by letter and spirit, and says to the tax-payers, "You thought you would be allowed to pay these bonds as you do other debts, in greenbacks, which constitute the 'lawful money of the United States'; but we now declare that you shall pay the same in coin or its equivalent!" All will agree that these bonds will not be paid in coin, for the whole civilized world does not contain coin equal in amount to the bonds of our Government now outstanding and constituting part of our indebtedness. Then it follows that the promised payment will be in the "equivalent" of coin. What will that "equivalent" be in lawful money?

Assuming as a safe estimate that gold is worth thirty-three per cent. more than paper, it adds one third to the amount of our public debt represented by the bonds in question. The result of this increase is to add one third to the taxation of the country, one third more to the burdens now resting upon labor, and as a result depress correspondingly the industrial interests of all our people. And for what? To convince bondholders that the Radical party will perform its undertakings toward them at all hazard, or in other words to remove all doubts from the minds of those who own the labor of the country by controlling its capital. And it is said, sir, that this bill is necessary to repel the implied charge of repudiation. That assertion assumes that a proposition to pay the bonds outstanding in the same money which pays for labor and produce is repudiation.

Sir, those who perform labor and raise produce and pay taxes have been and still are in favor of just such repudiation as will bring labor up to its proper level and make the rights of the producer equal to the rights of the capitalist. But it is charged that we who favor what is popularly termed "greenback payments" propose to violate the implied terms of a contract. That charge has been often refuted, both here and before the people; both in the canvass and by the press. But suppose for the moment that we were liable to that charge, it is urged against us with poor grace by those who propose to reduce the interest on the bonds from six to four per cent., when by the express stipulations of the law as well as by the plain recitals of the bonds the holder is entitled to demand and receive six per cent. interest, payable semi-annually in gold. They repudiate one third of a gold debt which we would pay, and charge us with repudiation because we will not pay an ordinary debt in an extraordinary manner.

But, sir, I have no time now to argue. The period for argument has gone by. The same party which carried a canvass by asserting that the States should regulate suffrage, and then construed its victory into a demand for universal suffrage by act of Congress, can only be consistent in now construing the letter and spirit of their own laws to mean gold for bondholders, bankers, and capitalists, and paper for mechanics, farmers, laborers, and producers of substantial wealth. Will the followers of that party continue to be blinded and led captive by eastern capitalists who use in turn the cry of loyalty and the charge of repudiation as arguments to induce western laborers to submit to legalized robbery and plunder? If so, they are worthy only of the slavery which they invite.

But, sir, we are told that all kinds of produce commands a good price, and that the people are in good condition to pay taxation. Still, sir, it is true now as when uttered by Mr. Lincoln, "A large debt is easier paid than a larger one;" and before our laborers will have paid our bonds in "coin or its equivalent" they will find taxation no joke, and slavery to capital no mere party luxury. Even now, with heavy taxes and scarcity of money, if all national, State, and local taxes were due in one day the money of the whole Union would not be sufficient to pay the taxes. Let but one failure of the staple products of the great West occur and those who have supported the Radical ticket and laughed at predictions of hard times because their pockets were filled with greenbacks will find that with small crops and heavy taxes, with greenbacks outlawed and capitalists demanding gold, poverty will stare them in the face and grim want invade the threshold over which for years gone by have passed only the velvet-slipped guests of luxury.

Then, sir, labor will scarcely bring enough to sustain life. Then staple articles of manufacture will be without profitable markets. Then capital, having overreached itself by crushing industry, will itself lack profitable return. Then repudiation will be more than an idle term—it will become a fixed fact; a stern, unavoidable necessity. When it comes, let it be known that radicalism produced it by its lack of candor in dealing with the people. The owner of the goose which daily laid a golden egg, moved by avarice, slayed the fowl to obtain all its wealth at once; and by his folly lost all his income. So, too, capitalists now realizing golden treasures from the labor of the country may, by trying to obtain all the coveted wealth at once, overreach themselves and destroy the source of all their gains.

I, sir, am in favor of paying our debt just as we agreed to; but before I will consent to crush the laboring masses for the benefit of bondholders may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth and my right hand forget its cunning.

REMARKS OF HON. G. F. MILLER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill may properly be deemed one of importance. It embraces two sections. The first provides—

"That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting

HO. OF REPS.

Public Credit—Mr. Beatty.

40TH CONG...3D SESS.

questions and interpretations of the laws, by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver: Provided, however, That before any of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature or be paid before maturity, the obligations not bearing interest known as United States notes shall be made convertible into coin at the option of the holder."

And the second section provides—

"That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin, or sale of property, or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which is carried into the contract, may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or of the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract, proof of the real consideration may be given."

The first section, with the exception of the proviso, I fully indorse. In the early part of this session I presented to the House a joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, embodying in substance the same as contained in the first section preceding the proviso. This part of the section, if adopted by Congress, will quiet all doubt in regard to our national debt both at home and abroad, showing to the world that our Government intend to act in good faith with its creditors, and that those who in our country's peril parted with their money to save the life of the nation shall be paid according to the pledge and understanding at the time they gave our Government their money in exchange for its bonds.

The people of the United States at the late presidential election decided by a large majority that our Government bonds should be met in good faith and with the kind of money that it was pledged they should be paid in or its equivalent, and by the passage of this section only carries out the original understanding and desire of the American people as expressed in an emphatic manner at the recent presidential election. I am aware that some doubt the propriety of Congress thus pledging the faith of the Government at this time in regard to our obligations, but I see no good reason why this exciting topic in regard to the national indebtedness should not be met promptly and decided, so that there shall be no more doubt as to what course our Government intend taking in regard to its obligations. I therefore trust that this section may pass; but as to the proviso, I object. It proposes to pay in coin obligations not bearing interest in preference to those that do. It is certainly a benefit to the Government to pay off interest-bearing obligations prior to those that do not and save that much, and I think the committee ought to consent to have this proviso stricken out.

This brings me to consider briefly the second section of the bill, which I think ought also to be stricken out, for if retained it may work great hardships upon some unfortunate creditors by allowing the shrewd money-lender to take advantage of their pecuniary situation. A debtor that is hard up will not be able to borrow money, let it be ever so much depreciated, without giving obligations payable in gold, at least dollar for dollar, besides the highest rate of interest, and money now loaned out will be called in to enable the lender to reinvest by taking obligations payable in coin. But it may be said that contracts to be enforced must be based on coin value; that is, the creditor shall receive coin value for the obligation that he gives for money borrowed. Admitting for argument sake that to be so, I would ask that in case the shrewd money-lender would so manage as to have no person but him and the debtor present when the contract is made and obligation signed, how could it be proven that it was anything different than expressed on the face of the obligation? For, according to the rules of the common law, the party injured could not be a witness in a suit where he is a party except in the United States courts, where we have a statute allowing either party to be a witness, leaving the jury to judge of the credibility, but it is not so in many of the States. We have seen what great injustice has been done unfortunate creditors by exacting from them exemption notes and agreements by which every vestige of property has been taken from them and their families. It has been said that some courts have held that gold contracts can be enforced; then if they can be so enforced without any statute on the subject, what is the necessity of this second section? I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, where a man borrows coin or its equivalent, and agrees to pay the same kind in return, throwing the burden of proof upon him who undertakes to enforce such contract. This section, however, is not couched in such language as to sufficiently guard the unwary against imposition.

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN BEATTY,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. BEATTY. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is called an act to strengthen the public credit. It might have been more appropriately termed an act to transfer money from the tax-payer to the pockets of the bondholder and to place the debtor class of this country under the heel of the money-lender. It is in reality a proposition to add $600,000,000 to the burden of our national debt, and I for one desire to record my solemn protest against it.

If the law under which $1,700,000,000 of our indebtedness was created makes the five-twenty bonds payable in coin, then there is clearly no necessity for the first section of this bill, which declares "that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to their payment in coin or its equivalent." If by the law these bonds may be paid in greenbacks, then this bill is a perversion of the original contract for the benefit of the bondholder and to the disadvantage of the tax-payer. If, on the other hand, the law is of doubtful construction, then the determination of the doubt should be left to the courts, where the interests alike of the tax-payer and the bondholder will be dispassionately considered and fairly and properly guarded.

Gentlemen talk in glowing terms about maintaining the faith of the nation, as if, forsooth, the fulfillment of the law of the nation was not a maintenance of the faith of the nation, and as if the bondholder on the one hand and the tax-payer on the other had not recourse alike to the courts for the settlement of questions arising under the law. Six years after the contract was made, with a full knowledge that honest men deeply interested differ widely as to their rights under the contract, this House proposes in the closing hours of a session to decide hastily against the weaker party and add one fourth to a burden already almost insupportable. This may be an effort to maintain the faith of the nation and strengthen the public credit, but it seems to me more like a proposition to destroy our national credit and drive an honest people unwillingly to repudiation. Had this act been passed in 1862 or 1863, before the bonds were sold, it might have strengthened the public credit to some purpose by adding to the value of the public securities and to the receipts of the public Treasury. If the intention was to pay in coin it should have been so stated. You stipulated then simply that the interest should be paid in gold, leaving the purchaser to the inevitable conclusion that the principal might be paid in the notes you had made "a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." You subsequently issued another bond stipulating that both its principal and interest should be paid in coin, thus virtually reiterating that the principal of the five-twenties might be paid in greenbacks. Now after you have sold the last dollar of these bonds at an average of not more than sixty cents, and while they may still be bought in any European market for seventy-five cents, you come forward with a proposition to strengthen the public credit by running these bonds up to a hundred cents, absurdly imagining that by increasing your own burden you will in some way increase your ability to bear it.

The fact that one German in Frankfort buys our bonds from us at sixty cents and resells them to his neighbor at seventy is not a matter over which I propose to grieve, and I have no pride that would be gratified by adding fifty per cent. to his profits out of my own income. So long as he gets an exorbitant profit on his investment he should be satisfied, and I have no doubt is. The proposition to give $200,000,000 to the capitalists of Europe for their good opinion, and $400,000,000 to the bondholders of our own country for theirs, is monstrous, absurd, and iniquitous. The loyal people of this country propose to pay the debt according to the letter and spirit of existing law, and will indignantly denounce this endeavor to put into the law at this late day a new letter and a new spirit. It is claimed in justification of this measure that it will enable us to substitute four per cent. bonds for those bearing six per cent. In my humble judgment the passage of this bill will no more enhance the value of a four per cent. bond to be issued hereafter than an editorial or a stump speech. The four per cent. bond cannot thus be made better; it will in fact be made worse, for the simple reason that by this foolish and unnecessary addition to the real burden of our debt we diminish our ability to carry it successfully, and our attempt to buy ourselves into credit with the capitalists of Europe will be justly regarded by sensible men as the last resort of a tottering house that endeavors to bolster up its waning fortunes by an extravagant display which adds to its liabilities without increasing its assets. If we can so easily and hastily put such a construction upon a contract as will take millions from the pockets of our tax-payers, it will be readily inferred that we may with equal haste and ease so construe another law as to defraud our creditors of twice as much.

The second section of the bill legalizes coin contracts. I object to it, because its effect will be damaging to the currency of the people. It will give to the greenback the character of a discredited note, which must at every change of owners submit to a discount. This will embarrass trade in communities where the greenback is the only currency known, by giving rise to interminable alterations as to the precise value of the dishonored note, and by lessening the confidence of the people in its ultimate payment. If worth seventy cents at the money centers, it will in the West be estimated at such a "margin" below as the prudence or the avarice of the money dealer may see fit to exact, to cover fluctuations, either fancied or real, and cost of transportation. Those who remember the endless embarrassments which grew out of the uncurrent money in circulation prior to the war can readily understand how sharpers may play upon the fears or ignorance of those who have little knowledge of money, except what they derive from the fact that it passes unquestioned, and does apparently, if not in reality, go currently at its face value. A thousand dollars in gold in the hands of the shrewd banker will be made the basis of $1,000,000 of gold contracts, the borrower loaning the coin, giving his gold note, receiving the gold over the counter, and immediately reselling it at whatever premium in paper money the lender may see fit to give. Renewals will be managed in a similar way, and all efforts under this bill to prevent the substitution of gold in the renewal of currency contracts will be futile.

The proposed law will practically force all the evils of immediate resumption upon those who have no specie and give to those who have coin all the advantages of a depreciated currency. It will stamp as "uncurrent" the money of the people, and make gold the apparent as well as the real standard. It will open up a thousand and one ways for sharpers to fleece the unsuspecting or the distressed in the little transactions of every-day life. Men will be forced or wheedled into making gold contracts and be ultimately compelled to adjust the same on the basis of the value of a metal which they never see, estimated at a price far beyond its worth.

Who demands either the first or second section of this bill? Certainly not the farmers, not the mechanics, not the laborers, not the great body of the people. No petitions have come up from them; they are contentedly and wisely adjusting their business affairs to the present condition of the currency, and desire simply that it be let alone. The cry for the payment of the five-twenties in gold and for the legalizing of gold contracts proceeds only from the capitalists, the value of whose bonds will be increased fifty per cent. by the one, and whose opportunities to fleece the people fifty per cent. by the other.

REMARKS OF HON. S. F. CARY, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 25, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) declaring that all the bonds of the United States shall be paid in coin.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the title of this bill is a misnomer. Instead of a measure to strengthen the public credit, it should be termed a bill to render repudiation of the public debt a necessity. There is a possibility and even a strong probability that our national debt, large as it is, can be paid according to the letter and spirit of the laws under which it was created. While the tax-payers of the country will make any reasonable sacrifices to meet in good faith the obligations of the Government they will not so readily consent to have their burden made heavier to gratify the rapacity of bondholders.

The introduction of this bill by the Committee of Ways and Means is a tacit acknowledgment on their part that the laws providing for the issue of five-twenty bonds, and the bonds themselves, do not positively provide for coin payment. If by a fair construction of the law coin payment is required, then this bill is a simple declaration on the part of this Congress that the public debt shall not be repudiated. If, on the other hand, it is clear that the five-twenty bonds are payable in the money of the people, then this is a proposition to disregard the law creating these bonds, repudiation in behalf of bondholders, and impose new and additional burdens upon the productive industries of the country.

But it is said that the mode of payment of the five-twenties is a mooted question, and the passage of this bill will settle it and give assurance to the holders of Government securities that they will be paid in coin. If doubts exist on this subject, then I maintain that these doubts should be resolved in favor of the debtor and not the creditor class. This construction should be given for the additional reason that the bonds were purchased at a discount of fifty per cent. in coin, and have been yielding a gold interest of twelve per cent. on cost price. Upon what principle of law, justice, morality, or fair dealing should the producers of wealth, now staggering under a load of debt, have one third more added to the burden solely for the benefit of a privileged, non-tax-paying, moneyed aristocracy? This outrage assumes a greater magnitude when we remember that the very class of men who must pay the bonds is the only class who made sacrifices during the war. We are told that this measure will strengthen the public credit and inspire the holders of our securities with confidence that they will get their pay. Much is said of the sacredness of our obligations and the imperative duty resting upon us to pay the war debt in such manner that no taint or stain of dishonor shall attach. I believe, sir, in the full payment of the nation's debt according to the fair construction of the law and the bond; but there are obligations more sacred, there are duties more imperative resting upon this people than even the payment of Government bonds. The people owe it to themselves first to support their families and see that their earnings are first appropriated to secure food, shelter, and education to those dependent upon them. The right to possess and enjoy the fruits of one's labor is a divine right older than civil government and paramount to all other claims. Government may exact from the poor man such share of his daily earnings as will enable it to give him and his full and adequate protection. When Government demands more than this, when it leaves him only rags and an empty cupboard, taking all else to fill the coffers of an untaxed, moneyed aristocracy, it becomes a robber rather than a protector. That Government which beggars me by its exactions and takes the bread from the mouths of my children to give it to the bondholder I am under no moral obligation to maintain.

When Congress assumes to bind the people to a money contract, the payment of which would result in degradation, bankruptcy, and ruin, and make the producers of all wealth, the laboring classes, the mere vassals of a privileged class, they have a right by the laws of God and man to repudiate it. If this or any other Congress shall attempt to subject the laboring whites and the enfranchised blacks to a common slavery in order to keep faith with the public creditor, and pay bonds in a money not known to the people, the power behind the throne will make bare its almighty arm. Chief Justice Marshall said:

"That every man has a natural right to the fruits of his own labor is generally admitted; and that no other person can rightfully deprive him of these fruits and appropriate them against his will seems to be the necessary result of this admission."

Another distinguished authority says that every man's earnings belong to himself exclusively as against the whole world; and that the taking away of any portion of them on any pretense whatever, except a small share for the use of the Government which protects him, is robbery.

It will be said that the people have a right to do what they please with their earnings; that we are the Representatives of the people, and are here to do their bidding. Admitting this proposition in its full force, I deny that they have given us any instructions, either express or implied, to pass this bill. On the contrary, its passage would be an imposition, a fraud, and a deception. The Republican national convention at Chicago declared that the public debt should be paid according to the letter and spirit of the laws under which it was contracted; but it did not and dared not say that the letter and spirit of the law required payment of the five-twenty bonds in coin; nor did the leaders of that party in their discussions before the people intimate that these bonds were to be thus paid. The Republican city council of my own city with great unanimity passed a resolution, and the Republican State conventions of Ohio and Indiana by their platforms declared that these bonds were payable and should be paid in greenbacks. Hundreds of thousands of voters in the West were misled and deceived by these pretenses. They may quietly submit to the frauds practiced upon them, but I do not believe they will. The same great convention of the dominant party solemnly declared that the question of suffrage in all loyal States properly and rightfully belonged to those States respectively. Here, again, the people have been deceived; for the very men on this floor who received their votes on this assurance now propose that negro suffrage shall be forced upon a loyal State against the will of its people. I rejoice, sir, that neither of these flagrant abuses of public confidence are without remedy.

The passage of this bill may temporarily enhance the price of Government securities and give the "bulls" an advantage over the "bears;" but it does not follow that the bonds will be paid in coin. This law can be repealed by a subsequent Congress without in the slightest measure affecting the good faith of the nation. The laws under which the debt was contracted are to be interpreted according to their own terms without regard to the opinion of a majority of this Congress. Our constituents will have something to say about the proper interpretation of these laws and of these bonds before the bondholder gets his gold. I warn gentlemen not to presume too much upon the forbearance of a betrayed, an overtaxed, and an unequally taxed people. The maintenance of the public faith, the sacredness of the nation's honor, are patriotic themes and will induce the producers of wealth, the tax-payers, to endure much and suffer long, but endurance and long suffering have their limits; and I mistake the character of the American people if there will not be a limit to the taxing power of this Government.

The people have been, and they are still, patriotic. They cheerfully poured out their blood to preserve the integrity of the Union, and there is no reasonable sacrifice which they will not make to preserve the public faith and pay the debts of the war. But such a war debt never was paid in coin by any Government under heaven. With our immense resources we can pay this debt according to the fair construction of the law, be magnanimous to the bondholder and just to the tax-payer. The Shylocks took every advantage of the Government's extremity when it was struggling for life. They demanded exorbitant rates of interest for their money, and now ask the payment of currency bonds in gold at more than twice their cost price. To make this swindle upon the people effective every effort has been made by the Secretary of the Treasury and bankers and bondholders to contract the circulation, call in and cancel the legal tenders, that there might be no lawful money except gold and silver. There has been a studied, persistent, and combined effort to deprive the people of the only means they had of making exchanges and payments. They have been insulted by the miserable pretense that there was a plethora of money when they have scarcely had enough to satisfy the inexorable demands of the tax-gatherer, much less to supply the necessary wants of their families. I concede that the money-lender, when he gave fifty per cent. in gold for his bond, believed that at its maturity he would receive one hundred per cent. in gold; that then there would be no lawful money but coin. It was with him (with honorable exceptions) a matter of pure speculation, and this bill proposes that his hopes shall be realized. Greenbacks are still the money of the people, and although insufficient in quantity to answer the legitimate requirements of business they are satisfied with them as a safe and reliable measure of value. The people comprehend the situation. They perfectly understand that if gold payment of bonds is assured the commercial value of all other property depreciates, that labor and its products fall in price, that their taxes are increased while their ability to pay them is diminished. The only persons to be benefited by the passage of this bill are bondholders, bankers, and brokers, while every other man, woman, and child must suffer. I am aware, sir, that the national banks are ably and fully represented on this floor by over sixty stockholders, directors, and presidents, and that the money power is a terrible one to resist, but I appeal from its despotic edicts to the people. The interest of the people requires that the national bank notes should be called in and canceled, their places supplied with legal tenders, and that the amount should be increased sufficiently to pay off the $516,000,000 of fifty-two bonds now redeemable. This action would only require $200,000,000 more of currency than we now have, and we should then have $100,000,000 less than we had when the insane and wicked policy of contraction was inaugurated in the interest of bondholders and national bankers. This would not only furnish money for the transaction of business, but would relieve the people from more than thirty millions annually of taxes.

This policy would open a way out of our difficulties, give relief to an overtaxed people, encourage manufactures, give full and remunerative employment to labor, develop our agricultural and mineral resources, enable a desolated and impoverished South to contribute her share toward the payment of the public debt. Give the people an absolute paper money sufficient in volume to answer all the requirements of business, made a legal tender for all payments, prohibit all banks of issue, let gold and silver remain as now, commercial commodities, and your war debt can be paid. When other bonds are redeemable pay them in the same manner, or if preferred by the holders give them other bonds at three per cent. convertible at pleasure into lawful money. Let the Government borrow all surplus money at three per cent. and there never can be an excessive issue of legal tenders. On the other hand, pass this bill, make it irrevocable, if you can, that all the bonds of the Government shall be paid in coin, and repudiation will be a necessity and a blessing. Whenever Government becomes an oppressor instead of a protector the time will have come for the exercise of the divine right of revolution.

Reconstruction in Georgia.

REMARKS OF HON. P. M. B. YOUNG,
OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the reconstruction of Georgia, proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I shall not weary the patience of this House by any attempt of mine to discuss the measure now before us in the light of the Constitution, of law, or of justice.

But, sir, we should not forget self-interest, profit, gain, or any of the inducements or lures of material advantage, even if we should determine to disregard the august authority of justice or law. If we cannot be a good and noble people; if we, in all matters of public morality, declare for the expedient if it suits us, let us at least secure the praise of being a thrifty people, whose judgment in all matters of more temporal concern is entitled to high respect. This would be something. What that something in the future would amount to perhaps the conscience or casuistry of the present day would not be able to decide.

But, Mr. Speaker, I can assure this House that, if I am not a stranger to my own home and its resources and utterly ignorant of the temper and spirit of my people, then I can say in all solemnity that a little more pressure of such torment as this bill inflicts and its legion of kindred measures have already inflicted will result in the utter ruin of the South. Would to God, sir, that the truth, the whole truth, as regards my afflicted section could be seen and felt here this hour. The effort to portray its true condition I will not be guilty of the presumption to make. The tongue of an angel could not do it; and if by some miracle an adequate description of the suffering of my people could be given it would overwhelm you. I see around me to-day stern and unrelenting faces, men with uplifted hands, ready for another stab at the heart of my poor country, which this narrative would soften.

But it is useless to hope for the truth. A theory must be sustained at all hazards. A party erected on sectional enmity must not be allowed to die at the hands of fraternal unity and love, and in our politics it has come to be regarded as a vital principle that a sectional war must be waged by one portion of our country against another. Indeed, this startling assumption has been formally made in a public speech by one of the foremost leaders of our political world.

Is this exaggerated language? Let him who says so read the very first section of the bill now before us. By that section all enactments and proceedings of the last Legislature of Georgia are declared to be inoperative, void, and of none effect. What is there throughout the whole scope of this bill to soften the terrible effect upon more than a million of Americans of such savage legislation? If the "enactments and proceedings" of the last Legislature of my State are "void" of course they must also be of "none effect," and the franchise already vested must be withdrawn, the prison must give up its criminals, the gibbet its felon, and for a space, let it be long or short, society must be in a state of chaos.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no paraphrase for such a state of society as is here threatened. The bare recital of this section sets forth all that can be conveyed, and shows that this measure is charged and surcharged with superlative wretchedness. What excuse will gentlemen give for all this fresh violence and this ferocious prosecution of a helpless and downtrodden people? In what one solitary case has Georgia offended and merited such intervention as this? Was it in the vote she gave for Seymour and Blair? These men are "bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh," and if we can trust them you might. Or was it not rather in the expulsion of colored men from her Legislature that gentlemen seek for an excuse to afflict with renewed humiliation a State whose bitter cup of trial is already overflowing? Ah, sir, here is the rub!

But what will gentlemen on the Republican side of the House have to say when they are told, and told truthfully, that they themselves by the act of some of their own number, are responsible for this expulsion. The father of the doctrine that negroes could not hold office under the last constitution of Georgia was no less a man than ex-Governor Joseph E. Brown. The Governor laid down the doctrine that, by the constitution of the State and the laws consistent therewith, the negro was not eligible to hold office. Then, who indorsed and gave practical effect to this Radical doctrine? A Legislature notoriously packed in the interests of the majority in this House were the perpetrators of this heinous offense against liberty and human rights, for which a whole State, an empire within itself, is to be summarily punished.

But, Mr. Speaker, I pause a moment in these allusions to facts affecting the question now before us which occur at home, and turn my face northward. Gentlemen of the North, defenders of the faith, exponents of Republican liberty, Representatives of American social and moral progress, are you guiltless? How are you to face the public opinion of this world and this age after such an issue as you are here forcing upon us of the South with the bayonet at our throats?

In Massachusetts, while it may be law for the negro to sit in your Legislature, it can hardly be said to be a fact. I have never heard that more than two colored men, mulattoes at that, were ever so promoted; but how is it in any other State controlled by freemen of America? What says Connecticut with her opposing voice of six thousand? What do we hear from Ohio with her fifty thousand dissenters; from Michigan, from everywhere but the slave States yet of the South, now doubly enslaved under this new dispensation, which spends its mighty energies day and night in guarantying a republican form of government?

The day is coming, it is now dawning, when the unsparring verdict of heaven and earth will demand from you what excuse you may have to give for placing on the backs of others loads that crushed them to the dust, while you would not lift even with your little fingers. How much more magnanimous it would be for the majority here, claiming to be the Government, if it would explicitly declare its ultimatum! Why all this circumlocution and softening phrase? Why not at once speak out and say that the law of might is the true American Constitution and that if the South will not bend she shall break? For this is what you mean.

Your precedents you will not be suffered to recall when your need so to do will be sore indeed. The usurper or agrarian who is now watching you in eager silence delights to hear you talk so convincingly of the "law of necessity," of the "life of the nation," of the "powers and rights of the majority," and last, but how far from least, of the "right of the conqueror." Presently there is coming a pressing necessity for your rights, your peace, your substance, your self-respect, to give way before the opposing might of some other man; when, shrinking from a sense of secret sin, you will be speechless in the presence of your oppressor. You are teaching the coming man or the gathering mob what utter cobwebs clever men and sharp men may make of law and conscience; how to hush the voice of mercy, and how to look upon the ruin of a brother with philosophy and satisfaction. Alas! there is no state of wretchedness on this sad earth from which some comfort may not be gathered.

Mr. Speaker, I pass on with a bare reference to the second section of the bill before us. That section provides that the present acting Governor of Georgia—

Is empowered and authorized to suspend or remove from office any civil officer, either executive, administrative, or judicial, claiming to hold or exercise the duties of any office under any authority derived from or granted heretofore by the provisional government of the State of Georgia, or any portion of the people thereof; and to appoint such other officers in their stead who are authorized to perform the duties and invested with the powers of such officers so removed, and to fill all vacancies otherwise occurring in said offices.

The power thus delegated by this bill to a single individual amounts to a monstrous tyranny, and is a scandal to a people professing to be republican. It would be an outrage on human nature unless this individual had been nominated by a voice from heaven and divinely appointed head of a theocracy. Were Mr. Bullock a prophet or inspired priest; had he lived a life absolutely without sin to this last hour of his existence; had he the self-command and purity of Washington, the wisdom of Solomon, and the public integrity of Aristides, it would even then be a crying shame in this land to exalt such a human being by the grant of such fearful powers.

May I ask, Mr. Speaker, what safeguards do we have in this bill against the appointment to any or every office in the State of the most truculent and ignorant negroes to be found in or out of Georgia?

Public Credit—Mr. Coburn and Mr. Boyden.

HO. OF REPS.

But, sir, I weary of the subject, and in complete hopelessness make this last appeal to the honor and patriotism of Congress. If I had the faintest hope of a candid hearing I would plead with the honorable member from Massachusetts, who presses this bill, to call for a fair commission, with the fullest powers, who upon the soil of my State should investigate for themselves and the whole country the charges, whatever they may be, calling for these extreme and cruel measures. I here declare upon my honor and in my place that I believe them to be uncalled for and the suggestions of private and party interests or revenge. The day has not yet come to write the chapter of our wrongs and our endurance of them. The honor of our achievements has been nothing in comparison with the sublime courage and resolution under afflictions and wrongs; and this day the universal wish of our people is to live in peace with all men, and asking favor of none but the poor privilege of being let alone to work out our fortunes as we may be able. We are willing to accept the terms, and under them to live if we can or die if we must.

But, sir, one thing we have a right to ask; nay, the voice of human nature makes the demand of you in our behalf. We demand to know your ultimatum. This just expectation has to this very hour been denied us, and we have for three weary years been steadily meeting the harshest and most unsparing treatment with concession after concession, and to-day we seem to be as far from a solution of our troubles as ever, and the country as much vexed with the great problem, "what shall be done with the South?"

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to pass to the milder forms of wrong and injury to my State which are embodied in the remainder of the bill before you. We hail with satisfaction the branch of the alternative which in a certain contingency might place us in the power of the chief now in command of our military district. A thousand times sooner let us fall into the hands of a gentleman of honor whose fame must be dear to him than into the fangs of a human monster like him of Tennessee or Arkansas.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, and I have done. Will gentlemen on the other side of the House not reflect a moment upon the effect for good or evil which our action is to produce upon the material interests of our common country. Our industry throughout the South is sadly discouraged. The shortness of crops in the two first years after the war and that cruel, merciless tax on cotton have ruined thousands of my people.

Could you let us alone, in five years of ordinary good fortune the crop of Georgia would reach more than half a million of bales. But we hardly have the hopeful energy necessary to drop a seed into the ground under all our aggravated discouragements.

Will you lose even in a party view by the wisdom of moderation and justice? Why, sir, you cannot disguise the fact that even now the Radical party is split in twain on the rock of finance, and I must admit as much for my own party. Upon a protective tariff the parties are not much more united; and could your politics cease to be predicated on sectional issues and animosities we would in a very short time find the mass of our people, North and South, divided no longer by sectional lines, but upon general issues, as of yore. Now, I can see no possible issue excepting always the one alluded to, which would leave the South a unit.

Then, sir, why cannot the majority here declare in heart and soul a general peace, and if you choose to call it so a general amnesty? What earthly good can result to the fortunes of white or black from continual exacerbations and this eternal calling for inquisitorial and punitive legislation?

Public Credit.

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN COBURN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. COBURN. The bill before the House in its title seems to admit the fact that our national credit is bad and needs strengthening. This I am not willing to admit. Our credit is good and growing better every day. We have paid $802,000,000 of our war debt and $438,000,000 of interest. We have the ability to pay all we owe, and need only time to husband our resources. Who doubts or dare question our ability to pay every cent honestly? The interest on our public debt is promptly paid as it falls due, and there is no reason to doubt that our bonds will be paid as they fall due, or will be renewed if that is desired. No measures to strengthen our national credit are needed just now except those coming out of an economical management of our affairs and an equitable adjustment of our paper currency. To pass a law declaratory of our honesty and ability is not worth the paper on which it is printed; is empty and idle. Mere assertions of integrity and pecuniary ability are contemptible.

The law providing for the issue of the five-twenty bonds and the law providing for the issue of greenbacks should be construed together. It will not do to look alone at the law authorizing the issue of these bonds, and shut our eyes to the law which provides that greenbacks shall be a legal tender for all debts public and private within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt. And although the law providing for the issue of these bonds may be silent as to their payment in legal-tender currency, yet the provisions for that currency are in force and become part of the contract and cannot be separated from it. I hold the position to be clear that unless the law providing for the bond and the language of the bond calls for gold or coin that it is payable in legal-tender currency. It would be a strange inconsistency to say that the phrase "debts, public and private," did not cover bonds of the Government. These bonds are bonds of the "public;" these bonds are evidences of "debt." This is all there is of it. In fact these bonds brought us very much less than their present value in legal-tender currency. No one can complain of a loss if they are paid off in such currency. The holder might lament the loss of a speculation, only this and nothing more. Our business is not just now with speculators. The credit of the Government is not in them or of them.

Our five-twenty bonds being payable as to principal in legal tenders, with six per cent. interest in gold, may readily be funded at a lower rate of interest, for our creditors, especially in foreign countries, prefer a long bond with a low rate of interest, principal and interest payable in gold. The possibility of the payment of the bonds in legal tenders will facilitate the exchange, and our debt be thus funded at a rate of interest somewhat near that paid by the other great nations of the world, while the project of returning to specie payment before funding the debt, if such a thing were possible, effectually destroys the possibility of accomplishing that end. The return to specie payment and a funding measure just now are antipodes. The funding measure should come first; the bulk of the debt should be disposed of at a low rate of interest and put out of the question for a long period, and then the enhancement of the legal tenders will be a light task. It is the unsettled condition of the vast bonded debt that keeps legal tenders below par. Settle that matter and they will come up.

The second section of this bill provides for gold contracts. This will enhance the price of gold, will enormously increase the demand, will fill Wall street with buyers on private contracts from all parts of the land, and, added to the already exhaustive demand for duties on imports and interest on the public debt, will inevitably increase its price. This measure is in direct and flagrant opposition to a return to all measures of specie payment, will be oppressive, will create fluctuations in our currency, which is and must be paper for some time to come, will put paper under ban till gold gets beyond reach, and then will come a collapse in business, followed by bankruptcy and ruin. Gold is too scarce for such an experiment; we can hardly get enough for our interest, much less double that amount yearly on private contracts. We should wait and work some time before we attempt such a measure. The production of our mines, the balances of trade, economy, and good management will bring us to it, but the passage of a law will be as empty and idle as the wind to effect good, get up confidence, or create gold where there is none. This bill begins with an imputation on the public credit, and I fear ends with a scheme which will effectually destroy it.

Public Credit.

REMARKS OF HON. N. BOYDEN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. BOYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am decidedly in favor of both sections of the bill, and I trust that the bill will be passed by an overwhelming majority. As to the first section, it merely declares, what every statesman and constitutional lawyer must know, the United States are bound by every principle of law and fair dealing to do. Nothing can be clearer to any legal mind than that a promise of the Government to pay a certain number of dollars, ex vi termini, means a payment in coin, the currency of the world. What can be more absurd than the proposition that when the Government of the United States has promised to pay ten years from date the sum of $1,000, with six per cent. interest to be paid semi-annually, and when the bond falls due the United States has a right to say to the creditor when he demands it, "I will not pay the debt, but I will do this: I will give the note or bond of the Government without interest payable at no particular time." Let me illustrate: A borrows of his neighbor B $1,000, payable at the end of ten years, with six per cent. interest payable semi-annually. The ten years having expired B calls upon A for his $1,000, and A replies, "I have not the money to pay the debt, but I tell you what I will do: I will give my note or bond without interest and payable at no particular time or place." What do you think B would say to A, his neighbor? Would he not order him out of his house and denounce him as an unprincipled scoundrel? And is there an honest man in the country who would not approve of the conduct of B, and who would not himself feel indignant should such a proposition be made to him? And yet gentlemen would put this great Government of the United States in this most disgraceful position and ruin and destroy its credit and good faith. I can have no patience with men who can maintain such absurd positions.

As to the second section, I desire the passage of this section notwithstanding the opinion of the Supreme Court recently delivered. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that there is no power in the General Government to prohibit the making of contracts between the citizens of the several States payable in specie, nor does the Government possess the power to prohibit the enforcement of these contracts in letter and spirit in the State courts, and nothing could be more absurd and ridiculous than the passage of such a law even if Congress possessed the power. Coin, Mr. Speaker, is the currency of the world, and every executory contract payable in dollars means coin unless otherwise specified in the contract. Dollars, ex vi termini, means coin, and must always be so declared by the courts, unless the contract which contains this word dollars also contains some other definition of the term than its well-known and legal meaning throughout all commercial countries of the world. I deem it important that this section should be passed in order that the people should know that there is no longer any difficulty in making or enforcing specie contracts.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Party Platforms and the Public Debt.

REMARKS OF HON. P. VAN TRUMP,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make any very extended remarks upon the bill now before the House as reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I am impelled to say what I shall say mainly from the fact that this side of the House seems to be somewhat divided, if not demoralized, upon the very important question presented in the first section of the bill; a question which has heretofore been made a distinct party issue, if I properly understand the principle contained in that section, when applied to the late platforms of the two great parties of the country in national conventions assembled.

Sir, I consider this bill not only as an initial movement to declare authoritatively the entire public debt a coin obligation without regard to time or circumstances, but also as a shrewd and artful effort to divide and distract this side of the House in relation to the whole scheme of the public debt. Whatever its success may be here in the halls of legislation, I feel quite sure it will fall very wide of the mark among the great mass of the people, who are strong in their convictions that this immense amount of debt, incurred with so much extravagance and corruption, should be adjusted upon fair and equitable principles. They have not forgotten, nor will they soon forget, that this vast amount of public liability was the result of civil commotion among our own people, of a struggle to sustain a Government common to all and for the benefit of all, and that it is unjust to hold that its burden should rest unequally upon the great interests of the country or that it should be the source of enormous profit to one class of citizens and of intolerable and crushing expense to another.

Sir, they will recollect all this none the less keenly and strongly with the broad and impartial spirit of the Constitution impressed upon their minds. They know that that Constitution, while it confers its benefits like the dews of heaven alike upon all, also imposes an equal obligation upon all to sustain by arms or means the integrity and existence of the Government. They know and feel that there is just as much power in that Constitution to draft money or property as there is to draft men to sustain, support, and defend the Government under which they live. They know and feel that there is just as much power in the Government under a rightful interpretation of the Constitution to break open the strong boxes of the capitalist and seize upon his money-bags to aid the Government in its struggle with the power which assails it as there is to enter the lowly cabin of the poor man and drag him by a provost marshal from his frightened, helpless, and dependent family and compel him to risk life and limb in the defense of that Government. They know that this political equilibrium existing by virtue of the Constitution between the rights and the obligations of the citizen to the Government, this "equality before the law," to use the phrase of our friends across the way, though applied to a subject not recognized by the Constitution of our Fathers, this theory that there can be no aristocracy of personal rights or privileges by enactment of law, is the great American idea which underlies the whole structure of our Government; and any material or permanent departure from this great fundamental principle of our institutions will be the dirge of our liberties and sound the knell of the Republic. All this they know and feel.

The bondholder is blind to all things but his own interest. Fanaticism in political organizations, favoritism in the administration of public affairs, injustice and wrong to political opponents in legislation, always come as the after-birth of civil war; but, sir, there is no party feeling however intensified, no power of money however great, even in an age of loose morals and mercenary principles, which can long maintain with safety to existing institutions a system of class legislation which panders to the sordid selfishness of a moneyed oligarchy against the interests and the welfare of the people. Sir, I tremble for the consequences which lie behind such unwise and unjust legislation. I can well understand why a Republican should be in favor of a bill like this; but why a Democrat should vote for it is past my comprehension. The honorable gentleman from New York on this side of the House, [Mr. Brooks,] in the brief colloquy between him and myself snatched from the organized debate, confidently claimed that there was and could be no possible conflict between the Democratic platform made in council at New York and the principles contained in the first section of the bill now before the House. In that I differ from my honorable friend toto celo.

Sir, I think I shall be able to show, either as a legal proposition or as a question of construction, that the first section of this bill exactly reverses or transposes the financial proposition as to the mode of payment of the Government bonds declared in solemn convention by the national Democracy at New York in July last as the true and only equitable construction of the several loan laws creating the public debt. And in doing this I shall neither claim or feel any personal triumph over my distinguished friend from New York. I know it is the fact, and I have as much pleasure as pride in acknowledging it, that there is no better informed or abler man on this floor upon any of the great subjects of human knowledge, whether in science, in art, or in literature, than the gentleman who so ardently and so ably represents the great money center of the country; but he is not and does not claim to be a lawyer conversant with the technical rules of legal construction or interpretation.

Now, sir, what is the issue between us? I am sorry to say, I profoundly regret that I am compelled to say, that the honorable gentleman in his remarks upon and in advocacy of this bill said as much and went as far as the greatest bondholding Shylock in the land could have desired him to say or go. All his dazzling rhetoric about the hard-money history of the Democratic party in other conditions of the country, when it was prosperous and out of debt and when both the gentleman and myself were found in opposition to all its leading measures, will not blind any one to the remarkable position he has now assumed upon the great and vital question of the liquidation of the public debt. Sir, it is no time now to cover up differences of opinion, even among political friends, when that discordance is manifested here in open debate in this House, and I warn those of my Democratic brethren on this floor who are disposed to follow in the lead of a Wall-street exposition of Democracy that it is a false light, an ignis fatuus which will allure them into the bogs and quagmires of a delusive political philosophy, to be denounced and repudiated hereafter by the great mass of the yeoman Democracy.

A false blending or union of the two distinct and independent questions of a return to specie payments at the right time with full power to sustain it, and the mode and manner under a fair construction of the provisions of the loan laws of paying off the bonds of the Government as they now and shall hereafter fall due, will not and shall not, so far as I can prevent it, deceive or cheat any one. They have no dependence upon each other. They are distinct and independent propositions. The one is a mere financial question at large; the other is a question of contract to be governed solely by the law of its creation. No one, Mr. Speaker, can be more anxious for a safe and permanent return to specie payments than I am. I am for a constitutional circulating medium in such money as is recognized by the organic law of the land, whenever the change to that standard from what we now have as its illegitimate substitute can be made without suddenly plunging the country into disorder, bankruptcy, and ruin. This change in our monetary system is only a question of time. But to be done safely to the interests and great business of the people it must be done gradually, and especially must it be done honestly and without class legislation. On this general question of a return to specie payments as an ultimate but perhaps somewhat remote condition of the country the gentleman from New York and myself will not differ.

The only point or criticism which I wish to make in reply is to controvert the assumption of my friend that the principles embodied in the first section of this bill are sustained by the Democratic platform made at New York, and, in the language of the gentleman, by the "beautiful and glorious history" of the Democratic party in all its past existence. Sir, while I do not indorse all that was said and done in New York by that convention, I do most heartily and cordially sanction what they said as to the mode of liquidating the public debt, and the legal interpretation they put upon the loan acts of Congress by which that debt was created. So far from that interpretation being in harmony with the first section of this bill I shall show that they are the antipodes of each other. First as to the bill. The first section provides:

"That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver: Provided, however, That before any of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature or be paid before maturity the obligations not bearing interest, known as United States notes, shall be made convertible in coin at the option of the holder."

Now, Mr. Speaker, there can be no mistake as to the legal effect or object of this section. It is true that it recognizes the paramount force of an express stipulation in the statutes, whether in favor of or against a gold payment of the principal of the bonds of the Government created thereby. So far so good. But the vice of the section is, that in the absence of any express stipulation for or against a gold payment, no matter what the res gestæ of the contract may be, it demands that the construction of these loan laws shall be in favor of a gold liquidation, as against any or all other lawful money whatever. In other words, as a mere declaratory law, it enacts, as against the law of the contract, that all improvements, whether of law or logic or fact, shall be in favor of gold, in despite of all the equities in aid of a different construction as to other lawful money, made so by statutes equally solemn and imperative. Mr. Speaker, I assert there can be no difference of opinion among intelligent and sound lawyers that this is the true legal effect of this first section of the bill now under consideration. Now, sir, let us turn to the Democratic platform, which the gentleman from New York with so much confidence asserts is identical with the provisions of this bill, and we will see that it propounds the very converse of this proposition. The third resolution of that platform declares that:

Now, Mr. Speaker, when it is known that so large a portion as more than one half of the public debt was created under and by virtue of laws which did not specify in express terms, except as to the interest accruing thereon, how or in what species of money, as between coin and currency, such debt was to be ultimately discharged by the Government, the point of difference between the provisions of this bill and the Democratic platform, and consequently between the honorable gentleman from New York and myself, will be at once seen and appreciated. It is presented in two modes of legal construction, which, when applied to the laws creating the public debt, produce results so vast and a difference in principle so marked and decided as to be worthy of our most serious consideration, whether we are engaged in enacting laws or the erection of political platforms. That difference applies to more than fourteen hundred million dollars of the public debt! As to that immense amount of debt this bill, got up in the interest of the bondholders, declares it shall be paid in gold, through an attempted legislative construction of the contract under which the debt was made; while the Democratic party of the country, by its solemn utterance at New York, says it shall be paid in that kind of money only which is equal in value to that by which the debt was originally created, in all cases where the contract of loan does not expressly provide for a different mode of payment.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the position of the Democratic party in opposition to the provisions of this bill; and that also, I am sorry to say, is the difference between the gentleman from New York and myself upon this question of the public debt. My honorable friend will permit me to say he cannot sustain or justify his vote upon this bill by saying, as he has said, that by such vote he only pledges himself to abide by the law of the country. If this bill is to have any legislative or judicial effect at all he does something more than that by voting for its passage; he votes to change the law, and with it the contract, as both the law and the contract now stand in relation to the mode and manner of the payment of the public debt. And right here, upon this very question, I cannot refrain from quoting an authority for which the gentleman from New York, by association, by sympathy, and by the "beautiful and glorious history" of the past will have the highest respect. I quote the deliberate opinion of not only a great lawyer, but who was also one of the great leaders of that grand old Whig party which held within its conservative folds, up to the last moment of its existence, both the gentleman from New York and myself. I allude to Hon. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, who has acted with the Republican party until within the last year. In speaking of this question, which now so unpleasantly divides my honorable friend and myself, and really to some extent the Democratic delegation on this floor, Mr. Ewing remarks as follows:

"So far neither party has ventured to commit itself on the disposition of the public debt. My mind has long been made up as to the principle which should govern us in its adjustment. It is this: so far as our contracts are distinct and explicit we must abide by them, no matter how unequal or onerous. As, for example, where we have promised to pay the interest or the debt, or both, in gold, national faith requires, and we must so pay it; but where the contract is not explicit, but requires construction, we must deal with creditors and the people precisely as an enlightened court of equity would deal with debtor and creditor under like conditions. For example: the creditor borrows forty cents, or depreciated bank paper worth forty cents, which the public calls a dollar, and promises to pay interest, six per cent, on its nominal or fifteen per cent, on its actual value in gold. The promise to pay the interest in gold being explicit, the nation who owes the debt should pay it, for there is no usury law operating on contracts with sovereigns; but where a distinction is taken in the contract between the debt and the interest—the interest only made payable in gold—equity would require that the debt should be paid in that which is equal in value to the fund received. Sovereigns have not always meted out this even-handed justice. The coin of nations has been sometimes debased after a loan made, so that one pound of silver and one pound of copper would be made to pay what was two pounds of silver when the loan was made. This was a gross wrong. It is equally wrong, on the other side, to take the name for the thing, and pay an ounce of silver to the lender for four tenths of an ounce borrowed, because each in its turn was called a dollar. Equity, if called into action, would suffer neither one nor the other, but require the payment from sovereign or subject of the just amount borrowed, regardless of name. This should be the rule of payment. If currency were borrowed which was worth forty cents on the dollar, currency or bonds of equivalent value should be paid."

There, Mr. Speaker, we have not only an exposition of the true and even "plighted" faith of the nation, not only an honest mode of adjustment of the obligations existing between a sovereign debtor and its citizen creditors, but the broad-minded views of a practical statesmanship, which would settle and adjust the principles of a public debt between Government and creditor by the same rules of law and equity which govern the contract of a private debt between private individuals.

Now, sir, take the facts and circumstances under which these loans were made; the pressing necessity under which the Government labored for money to carry on the war in its gloomiest periods; the depreciated condition of the currency even after the passage of the legal-tender act; the grasping avarice and extravagant demands of the money-lenders; the "loyal" Shylocks who rushed to the rescue of the Government with such a gush of patriotism, as interpreted by their friends who now sustain them in their imperious demands for a gold payment of all the bonds—take all these facts into a fair and honest consideration, and I would like for any honorable gentleman in this House to show me the elements for an equitable construction of these loan laws in favor of the bondholders and against the Government.

Every lawyer on this floor who has read Story or Foulke knows that in a suit between private individuals in a court of chancery upon a contract involving a similar state of facts the chancellor would enter a decree setting aside the contract upon the ground of inadequacy of consideration—a decree dictated by the legal presumption that a fraud had been practiced by the lender upon the borrower. I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that the same rule ought to prevail upon a contract where the Government is a party, but I do most emphatically say this: that any law which proposes, as the first section of this act does propose, to declare that all legal implications and every canon of an equitable construction shall be distorted in favor of the bondholder and against the Government or the people is a gross outrage upon every principle of justice, and would not be worthy of the jurisprudence of a nation of Hottentots.

My political friends on this side of the House will vote for this bill under a delusion; they will indorse a mere party decree fulminated by a party caucus; controlled by the influence of the bondholders, instead of an effective legislative enactment which can reach or control the original legal status of the bonded debt of the Government, because this law will be powerless so long as we shall have an honest and independent judiciary.

The honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] in the fervor of his advocacy of this bill, disclosed the true purpose of its introduction when he openly declared that the Republican party was pledged to pay the public debt "in such money that the world regards as money."

Mr. Speaker, that is what I call coming up to the issue squarely and frankly. What was dubious in the Chicago platform is now made plain. We now have the true interpretation of the third plank in that artful piece of political carpentry: gold for the bondholders under the loan laws, and a depreciated currency for the people under the legal-tender act. That, sir, is the "good faith" so boldly vaunted in that most remarkable creed. But after the shameful trampling upon and the bold repudiation of the principle of suffrage, as declared in the second plank of that platform by the passage of the late constitutional amendments forcing negro suffrage upon the States against the expressed will of the people, why should we be surprised at this turn given to the equivocal utterances of the third plank of the Republican platform in relation to the public debt?

Sir, I am prepared to be surprised at nothing which the Republican party may do in the future. I think I see clearly some of the coming events. Still more radical changes are to be wrought in the structure of our Government. When the spirit of revolution is once let loose its course is onward until its momentum of power is exhausted. We have struggled in vain against this great tidal wave of fanaticism and wrong. The power of money and of organization has been too strong for us. The people have been fully warned of these changes, and it would be uncandid to deny that thus far they have sustained them. If they shall still indorse the changes and usurpations yet to come, then indeed is the last experiment of the capacity of man for self-government a poor, miserable failure, and the American Republic will have to take its place in history by the side of those of Greece and Rome, as another monument alike to the genius and the weakness of man.

But to come back more directly to the question now under consideration: the honorable gentleman from New York representing the Albany district [Mr. PRYOR,] put this bill upon its true ground when he said that if it was intended to be a mere declaratory law, it was deceptive; and if it was intended to mean anything more, then it undertakes to create a new obligation on the part of the Government to its creditors such as the acts under which the bonds were issued did not create. That, Mr. Speaker, is the whole point of the discussion. If this is a mere declaratory law, then it amounts to nothing; if it seeks to change the original obligation, then if it is not absolutely unconstitutional and void in consequence of the Government being a party to both acts of legislation, it is nevertheless a gross outrage and a most stupendous partisan fraud upon the rights and interests of the people.

My distinguished colleague who reported this bill [Mr. SCHENCK] has evidently been misled by the English theory of the legal effect of a simple declaratory statute. The sole ground upon which a declaratory act of Parliament in England is sustained by their courts does not at all exist in this country. The only purpose for which they are resorted to in England is to preserve the traditions of their unwritten law. They are only enacted where an old custom of the kingdom is almost fallen into disuse or has become a matter of dispute, or the recollection of some ancient prescription has become confused or uncertain, in which case the Parliament may think proper, in perpetuum rei testimonium, and for avoiding doubts and difficulties in the future to declare what the common law is and has been upon some given custom or prescription. The reason for this rule of legislative power does not pertain to this country, and Chancellor Kent settles the question by the following observation:

"It seems to be settled, as the sense of the courts of justice in this country, that the Legislature cannot pass any declaratory law or acts declaratory of what the law was before its passage so as to give it any binding weight with the courts. It is only evidence of the sense of the Legislature as to the preëxisting law. The powers of Government in this country are distributed in departments, and each department is confined within its constitutional limits. The power that makes is not the power to construe the law. That latter trust belongs to the judicial department exclusively."—1 Kent, 513, in notes.

But, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to enter into the discussion of the merits of the bill now before the House. I only wished to set myself right before the country as to the difference of views between the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] and myself as members of the same political organization. My respect for his abilities and character, both public and private, is such as will make me deeply regret any future recurrence of antagonistic opinions in relation to any of the fundamental principles of that great political party to which it is our common pride and honor to belong. But be this as it may I cannot and will not consent, so long as I shall occupy a seat on this floor, that any political heresy shall go forth from an acknowledged member of the Democratic organization, however high his position, to distract and confound the views and opinions of the party at large if any humble effort of mine can prevent it. I may regret the collision, but I cannot avoid the duty. I shall vote against this bill upon the ground that the first section seeks to change the law of the contract, and because the second section is wholly unnecessary and uncalled for, for the reason that the Supreme Court of the United States has already settled the principle which it seeks to establish.

Congressional Railroads, their Causes and Results.

SPEECH OF HON. C. SITGREAVES,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 621) to authorize the building of a military and postal railway from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York.

Mr. SITGREAVES. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that a bill of this character, a bill authorizing and exercising power not warranted by the Constitution, changing the whole policy of the country in relation to internal improvements, and calculated in its results to destroy the proceeds of a capital greater than the public debt, is not permitted a full and free discussion in Committee of the Whole House.

During my service in Congress nothing has amazed me more than the fact, patent to every member on this floor, that grave questions affecting the constitutional rights of the States and the business of the people, by the operation of the "previous question," sustained by a majority of a House calling itself "a high deliberative body," have been passed with less discussion than would be considered decent or proper in a town meeting on a question of road taxation or school laws; and this amazement is only seconded by hearing the assertions used as arguments by many honorable members in advocating the passage of bills.

I allude especially to one series of assertions made by stock-jobbers outside and members inside of this House, and used as reasons for the passage of this and similar bills:

1. "That New Jersey for thirty years has been bound hand and foot by the chains of a powerful monopoly."

2. "That New Jersey imposes an onerous tax on passengers passing through the State."

3. "That every citizen of a sister State who passes over the railroads between the cities of New York and Philadelphia must pay a tax per capita to New Jersey."

One honorable member has asked: "Look at New Jersey, have we not an illustration there of the power of a railroad corporation which controls the Legislature of the State and which holds in its vice-like grasp the political and commercial destiny of that Commonwealth?"

I propose to occupy a few moments in reply to these assertions.

1. New Jersey has not for thirty years nor for a single year of thirty "been bound hand or foot by the chains of a powerful monopoly," but on the contrary that "powerful monopoly" (the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company and Delaware and Raritan Canal Company) has been bound by the honor and faith of its contracts. The men who originated these works urged the Legislature to construct them as State works. They urged the capitalists of New York and Philadelphia to aid in their construction. Neither the Legislature nor the capitalists would embark in this then "untried experiment." The Legislature chartered these companies and contracted to protect them from competition during a limited period for the consideration of an annual tax on their business and a transfer of two thousand shares of their stock and the right to purchase the works. This contract was in the nature of a lease, binding in law. This contract was never violated either by the State or the companies. The companies never attempted by legislation or otherwise to evade it either in letter or spirit, but they offered at a subsequent time to surrender their exclusive privileges to the State and the State refused the offer. New Jersey was bound by her faith, policy, and interests to maintain the contract. Had the "monopoly" tried at any time within thirty years to break faith with the State? If it had made the attempt the State would have held it with a "vice-like grasp," and her judiciary would have meted to it that impartial justice which has ever been rendered at her bar, without distinction of poverty, wealth, position, race, or color.

2. "New Jersey does not impose an onerous tax on passengers and freight passing through the State." The tax imposed on the joint companies is ten per cent. for every passenger transported across the State, which averages about two tenths of a cent per mile. This is the onerous taxation under which we are told that the traveling public have writhed for thirty years, and over which members and a venal press have eloquently descanted as a burden too grievous to be borne by the commercial interests of the country. Strange that gentlemen who by their influence or votes have imposed unnecessary taxes under the weight of which the tax-payers of the nation now stagger do not see that in their denunciation of this transit duty "they strain at a gnat and swallow a camel."

3. "Citizens of sister States who pass over the New Jersey railroads between New York and Philadelphia do not pay a tax per capita to New Jersey."

I quote the law relative to this transit duty from the report of William K. McDonald, comptroller of the New Jersey State treasury, under a resolution of the State Senate:

"The Delaware and Raritan canal was chartered February 4, 1830, and the treasurer of the company was required thereby to report quarterly the number of passengers and tons of merchandise transported across the State, and pay into the State treasury eight cents for each passenger and eight cents for each ton of merchandise transported thereon, except coal, lumber, lime, wood, ashes, and similar low-priced articles, for which the transit duty was declared to be two cents per ton; and no other tax was to be levied.

"Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation company, chartered February 4, 1830. The twenty-third section of this act requires the treasurer of the company to make quarterly returns of the number of passengers and tons of goods transported upon said road or roads to the State treasurer, and to pay him at the rate of ten cents for each and every passenger and fifteen cents for every ton of merchandise so transported thereon, and forbids the levy of any other tax. By act of February 4, 1831, the company was required to pay ten cents for each passenger between Delaware river and Raritan bay, instead of a ratable tax as reserved in the charter. The act of March 15, 1837 imposed the same transit duties on the road to New Brunswick as on the road to Amboy; and the joint resolution of March 10, 1842, directed the State treasurer to demand of the Delaware and Raritan Canal and Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Companies the payment of a transit duty of ten cents a passenger and fifteen cents for every ton of goods thereafter to be transported on any railroad or railroads belonging to said companies from Camden, Burlington, Bordentown, the Trenton-Delaware bridge, the city of Trenton, or any point or place on the Delaware river, to South Amboy, the city of New Brunswick, or any other point, or place on the Raritan river or bay, and from South Amboy, the city of New Brunswick, or any other point, or place on the Raritan river or bay, to the city of Trenton, the Trenton-Delaware bridge, Bordentown, Burlington, Camden, or any other point or place on the Delaware river.

"New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, chartered March 7, 1832. The eighteenth section of the act provides that after the completion of the road and after the expiration of five years the said corporation shall pay yearly to the State a tax of one quarter of one per cent. upon their capital stock paid in; and after the expiration of ten years a tax of one half of one per cent. upon the true amount of the capital stock of said company, and no other tax shall be imposed; Provided, nevertheless, That if at any time hereafter any railroad shall intersect or be attached to the railroad established by this act, so as to make a continuous line of railroads carrying passengers across the State between the States of New York and Pennsylvania respectively, that then the treasurer of the company shall make quarterly returns, under oath, of the number of passengers and tons of goods transported over the whole line of the road chartered by this act, and shall thereupon pay into the State treasury eight cents for each passenger and twelve cents for each ton of goods so transported thereon in manner aforesaid. The second section of the act of April 18, 1846, makes it the duty of the treasurer of this company to make quarterly returns to the State treasurer of the whole amount of moneys received by the company from passengers for whom the said company are subject by law to pay transit duties to the State, and thereupon the company shall pay quarterly in each year eight cents for every dollar so received in payment of the transit duties chargeable for passengers on said company by their act of incorporation. This company therefore pays to the State a tax of one half of one per cent. upon the capital stocks, and a transit duty on through passengers of eight cents for each dollar of passage money, and on through freights twelve cents for each ton.

"The three companies before named constitute the united railroad and canal companies, and the aggregate of their respective capital stocks is $16,248,968 75. "But the act fixing the transit duty on low-priced articles on railroads, approved March 9, 1859, declares that the transit duty on lime, wood, stone, ashes, manure, lumber, coal, iron ore, and similar low-priced articles, shall be two cents per gross ton in lieu of the transit duty now required by law to be paid on similar property carried over any railroad in this State."

It will be perceived that no tax is imposed on the citizens of sister States. The transit duty is a tax on the companies, and the only State or local tax which can be imposed on them. Do gentlemen contend that a State has no right to impose a tax for valuable privileges granted to an incorporation? Where is the difference to the passenger whether the State had imposed an annual direct tax in gross amounting to the same sum imposed by transit duties? I should like to know by what ingenuity of argument any one can show the difference to the public between an annual tax of $100,000 levied upon a road and its franchises and a tax amounting in the aggregate to $100,000 per annum by a transit duty? Every intelligent mind must perceive that in the results to the traveling public they are essentially the same; if one is a tribute levied on passengers and the commercial interests of the country so is the other. Why, then, do not stock-jobbers invoke the aid of the national Legislature to enable them to destroy other important lines constructed under the authority of State charters and taxed by State laws? Why single out the line through New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland for their unholy work?

Mr. Speaker, this transit duty is a tax on the business of the companies, which will be increased or diminished according to the amount of that business. It is a tax on the business of the companies under a special contract for a special purpose; that purpose being now accomplished the transit duty will probably be substituted by a tax on the costs of the works. It is not a special tax on the citizens of other States. It was not so intended. The transit duty is paid by the companies whether the passenger comes from New York, Philadelphia, Trenton, or New Brunswick. Repeal this transit duty, and impose a per cent. tax on the capital invested, or in any other form, and the traveling public would not be benefited by a reduction of the fares, for let it be noted that the companies are not authorized to charge this transit duty on their fares in addition to the rates of fare which are limited by law. No one, whether a citizen of New Jersey or not, can be charged beyond a certain sum per mile, transit duty or no transit duty; nor does the fare required of a through passenger pay more in proportion to the distance traveled than a passenger to and from points in the interior of the State, even if the fares were augmented by the transit duty, for we all know that the ratio of fare per mile on all roads is graduated by the through fare.

Notwithstanding this so-called "enormous tax" of two tenths of a cent per mile, I am informed and believe, although I have not the means at hand to ascertain the fact, that upon a fair comparison of the price paid by passengers and freight over these New Jersey roads with other roads, calculating the length of the roads and cost of construction and equipments, there are few, if any, roads in the United States where the fare is lower than the transit across New Jersey. But, sir, if New Jersey has no constitutional power to impose this tax in this form why not bring the question before the proper judicial tribunals? Why right the wrong by the commission of a greater wrong? Why constitute a company of greedy, irresponsible stock-jobbers to be the ministers of your justice or your vengeance?

4. It is not true that the joint companies control or have controlled the political and commercial destinies of the Commonwealth. The men who controlled the affairs of these companies from the beginning until the present time were men of diverse political sentiments, men who belonged to the old school of politicians, now so "few and far between"—men who conscientiously believed in the dogmas of their respective political creeds; men whose honor was above price; men who could not be swerved from their political and moral status by any political position or commercial gain; they looked with loathing and abhorrence on the modern politician of the modern school, who is ready, or whose practice, if not his creed, is "To crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,

That thrift may follow fawning."

Two of these men have lately passed away—Stockton and Stevens; but their names will live in history, identified with the faith and commercial and agricultural interests of New Jersey and the glory of the Republic so long as unselfish patriotism and great services shall be cherished by the State and nation.

The bill under consideration is reported by the Committee of this House on Roads and Canals; it charters a company to construct a railway of one or more tracks between the cities of Washington and New York, commencing on some point in the city of Washington, and running thence through the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, or any part of them, to the Hudson river, crossing the Susquehanna above tide-water, with no grades greater than thirty feet per mile, nor any curvature less than three degrees. To do this the company are authorized immediately to enter upon, take possession of, and use all such real estate and property as may be necessary, with the usual directions, in case they cannot agree with the land or property owners; in addition to other powers the company is authorized to connect with any State railroad carrying the mails of the United States for the purpose of transportation, and the said line of railway authorized to be constructed, and the parts of existing railways which may become a part of the New York and Washington railway shall be deemed and considered a national public highway and post road, and no tax or transit duty shall be imposed by virtue of any State authority upon the traffic of said company, its freight, or passengers.

The questions which present themselves in the consideration of this bill are: has Congress the constitutional power to build railroads over a State without its consent, assume the right of eminent domain over the soil, and incidentally regulate its internal commerce?

I am opposed to its passage, because I believe Congress has no such constitutional powers.

The right is claimed under the first article of the Constitution, giving Congress the power—

"To provide for the common defense and general welfare.

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

"To establish post offices and post roads.

"To make all laws which shall be necessary or proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

I deny the power of Congress to charter an incorporation for the purpose of constructing a railroad for any purpose, postal, military, or commercial, or under the indefinite term of "public welfare," against the consent of the State through which it shall be laid. No such warrant is given in the letter of the Constitution; no such warrant is given by implication; and if the power is doubtful from the letter, then, by a resort to the meaning and intention of the framers of the Constitution as evidenced by their votes and subsequent opinions, we find that the incorporation of such a power in that instrument was expressly denied. The canal was then considered as the great means for the extension of our internal commerce, development of our internal resources, and promotion of the public welfare; for the railroad was then unknown. Dr. Franklin moved in the convention to add after the words "post roads" a power to provide for "cutting canals when deemed necessary."

"Mr. WILSON seconded the motion.

"Mr. SHERMAN objected. The expense in such case will fall on the United States, and the benefit accrue to the places where canals may be cut.

"Mr. WILSON. Instead of being an expense to the United States, they may be made a source of revenue.

"Mr. MADISON suggested an enlargement of the motion into a power to grant charters of incorporation where the interests of the United States might require and the legislative provisions of individual States may be incompetent.

"His primary object was, however, to secure an easy communication between the States which the free intercourse now to be opened seemed to be called for; the political objects being removed, a removal of the natural ones, as far as possible, ought to follow.

"Mr. RANDOLPH seconded the proposition.

"Mr. KING thought the power unnecessary.

"Mr. WILSON. It is necessary to prevent a State from obstructing the public welfare.

"Mr. WILSON mentioned the importance of facilitating by canals the communication with the western settlements.

"The motion being so modified as to admit a distinct question, specified and limited to the case of canals, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Georgia voted for the proposition; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, and South Carolina, voted 'No.'"

A proposition "to grant letters of incorporation for canals" was decided in the negative by the same vote, and the constitution then adopted provides that—

"The Congress shall exercise exclusive jurisdiction over all places purchased by the consent of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings."

Congress could not exercise exclusive jurisdiction even over the District of Columbia without the cession of Maryland and Virginia. The right to make a canal or railroad through a State without the consent of the State carries with it the right of exclusive jurisdiction over the land occupied by the canal or road. Surely if the Congress could not exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the territory covered by the capital, and without the consent or cession of Maryland and Virginia, they cannot over the territory occupied by railroads and canals within the limits of a State without its consent.

James Madison, in his letter to Reginald Chapman, January 6, 1831, volume four of his "Writings," page 143, expressed a regret that the Constitution "does not give the present Congress power to construct canals," &c., and recommends an amendment to the Constitution giving that power. That it was more than once proposed to the convention of 1787 and rejected, from an apprehension chiefly that it might prove an obstacle to the adoption of the Constitution. Such an addition to the Federal powers were thought to be strongly recommended by several considerations, and among these cases where "canals might be important in a national view, and not so in a local view; cases where canals might pass through sundry States and create a channel and outlet for their foreign commerce." And in a letter to Edward Livingston, volume three, page 435, he says:

"It is remarkable that Mr. Hamilton himself, the strenuous patron of an expansive meaning to the text of the Constitution, with the views of the convention fresh in his memory, and in a report contending for the most liberal rules of interpretation, was obliged by his candor to admit that they could not embrace the case of canals."

I need hardly say that the views of gentlemen who advocate the passage of this and kindred bills, in their construction of the constitutional powers of Congress, are so far in advance of that great champion of centralization, Alexander Hamilton, as to "out-Herod Herod."

The all-absorbing question in the convention was, what State rights, what portion of State sovereignty, shall be conceded to the General Government? They decided by a solemn vote that they would not yield the power to the General Government either to construct or charter companies to construct canals, although the amendment was advocated by the very reasons now urged for the passage of this bill. The members who advocate this bill say that the convention did authorize this power. It seems to me that the modern constructionist, with such evidence before him, stultifies himself in his arguments on the construction of constitutional power. What is the Constitution but a solemn compact between the States, the Federal Government, and the people? What is an infraction of the Constitution by either of the contracting parties but a breach of faith, a violation of the obligation of contracts? When will the nation learn that the most insidious foe to the rights of the States and liberties of the people is the advocate of constructive power—a foe more powerful than rebels in arms, more deadly than any other foe? When will the nation learn that laws passed by the Legislature, "outside of and above the Constitution," that a mental reservation in the oath of a member to support the Constitution is only binding when it comes in conflict with what he deems a "higher law," is perjury to God and man; and that God will hold nations as well as individuals amenable to that "higher law" in relation to covenant-breakers.

This bill not only assumes the right to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the soil occupied by its tracks, depots, and other buildings—I say assumes, for the right of eminent domain confers that jurisdiction—which is not ousted by the fact that it has a provision giving power to the State to tax (to a limited extent) its property and franchises. We all know that this bill is intended to establish a "system."

HO. OF REPS.

Congressional Railroads—Mr. Sitgreaves.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

We all know why this boon of taxation was graciously conceded in this bill. We all know that if the right of eminent domain is in the General Government this taxation would conflict with the Federal power. We all know that it will be repealed when the purpose for which it was introduced is accomplished; and we all know that it will not be embodied in any future bill after the right to construct railroads under the authority of Congress is established.

I shall, therefore, in the discussion of this bill, consider it as the inauguration of a system which gives, and is intended to give, exclusive jurisdiction to the Federal Government; and while this system assumes the right of exclusive jurisdiction over the soil occupied by the road, it is rendered more odious from the fact that it does it by means of a private corporation.

I do not know whether the advocates of this charter assume that it is a direct or incidental mode of executing the enumerated powers of Congress, but I do know that in either case the results are the same in ousting the States of their jurisdiction. I do know that this system will authorize one man to enter upon the property of another and for his own private gain and purposes wrest that property from the rightful owner, and I do know that not a single exercise of power, either legislative or territorial, will be left to the States which the Government may seize—State legislation, State judiciary, and the sacred rights of eminent domain will be trampled upon by the heel of arbitrary power, either directly by the act of the Government or through the intervention of private corporations. If Congress has power to wrest from a State a single foot of her soil without her consent for the purposes of this bill, then it has the right to seize any portion or all her territory to raise cotton or to plant tracts of oak forests or to colonize the colored man, under pretense that such seizure is necessary to promote the public welfare, to maintain a Navy, regulate commerce, or to carry out the "higher law" of right and justice and human brotherhood.

The framers of the Constitution repudiated the idea that Congress had a right to exercise this power without the consent of the States. James Madison denied the right in his veto message of March 3, 1817. James Monroe reaffirmed the denial in his special message returning to the House of Representatives the bill for repairs of the Cumberland road. Thomas Jefferson denied that power in the Federalist; and that incorruptible patriot and stern defender of the Constitution, Andrew Jackson, with a reasoning incontrovertible, denied the right in his veto of the Maysville road bill, and that veto was sustained by the nation. For almost half a century after the adoption of the Constitution, in all controversies in relation to the power of Congress to make internal improvements, the question related solely to the constitutional power, with the consent of the States—never without that consent.

In relation to the commercial power, while I admit that Congress has power to regulate commerce among the several States, and that the States are prohibited from "laying any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing their inspection laws," which was made a constitutional provision to correct the abuses which were perpetrated under the old Articles of Confederation, I deny the right of Congress to prescribe the means of commercial intercourse. Congress may make rules and laws to govern commerce, but cannot make canals and railways to transport commerce. Such a power exists not in the Constitution, but only in the brains of those men who by construction would overthrow every safeguard which the Constitution has erected to protect the States from the encroachments of Federal despotism. If you construe the word "regulate" commerce to include the means, as an inevitable sequence you can exercise the power when and where it shall be sold, nullify State laws connected with internal traffic and licensed auctioneers, and build a merchant marine for every navigable river.

The Constitution throughout all its provisions is an instrument of checks and balances; the power to regulate commerce extends to navigation of vessels carrying merchandise, coasting trade, fisheries, light-houses, buoys, beacons, ports of entry and delivery, &c., but was never intended to apply to the means of transportation either of foreign commerce or the internal commerce of the States by constructing vessels, canals, or railroads. The denial of that power by the Constitution to make a canal is conclusive proof that no such power was intended. If so, then the members of the convention stultified themselves by a grave discussion and denial of a right which existed in the enumerated powers given by the Constitution.

The road proposed by this bill is called a military and postal road. It was incubated after a lengthy sitting by the Committee on Roads and Canals, who were instructed by resolution passed April 27, 1868, "to inquire whether Congress has the power, under the Constitution, to provide by law for the regulation and control of railroads, especially those extending through several States, so as to secure, first, the safety of passengers; second, uniform and equitable rates of fare; third, uniform and equitable charges for freight or transportation of property; fourth, proper connections with each other as to transportation of passengers and freight; and if, in the opinion of the committee, Congress possesses such power, then to report a bill which will secure the foregoing objects."

In their report of seven printed pages to justify the passage of this bill the whole is devoted to the right of construction under the commercial power, except eight lines; and yet the road is stated in the preamble of the bill to be a "military and postal railway."

In discussing the power of Congress in relation to the construction of a railway directly by the Government or by the intervention of a corporation, no one I presume will assert that a commercial road can be constructed under the power (if there were such a power) to construct a military or postal road, or construct a postal road under the commercial or military power, or a military road under the postal or commercial power. To exercise the power to promote one object under the power to promote another distinct object would render the Constitution a nose of wax to be manipulated into any shape that politicians or plunderers might choose to subserve their own selfish purposes; yet this bill, in its preamble, with the report that accompanied it and the arguments of its advocates, combines all of these objects, showing conclusively that in the opinion of its framers it could not be sustained under any single enumerated power granted by the Constitution irrespective of the others. One fourth of the members might suppose that Congress has no power to construct or there is no necessity for a postal and military road, yet may vote for it as a commercial road; one fourth that Congress has no power to construct or there is no necessity for a commercial or postal road, and may vote for it as a military road; and one fourth that Congress has no power to construct or there is no necessity for a military or commercial road, and may vote for it as a postal road; and by passing it establish a system which could not singly command more than one fourth of the votes of the members. This legislative trick was first introduced into the United States Senate to condemn and disgrace President Jackson, by a resolution declaring that his recent acts in relation to the revenue "were not warranted by the Constitution and laws, but were in derogation of both."

Some Senators based their votes on official acts relating to one thing and some on another; while probably no single act if defined would have been denounced by a majority of Senators. Such a mode to obtain the requisite number of votes is unworthy fair and honorable legislation. It is a mode of legislation which for years cursed Pennsylvania with omnibus and tape-worm and plunder bills, until the system "stank in the nostrils" of every honest man, and it went down branded as a fraud upon the people and the "higher laws" of honesty, justice, and honor.

Mr. Speaker, I admit the right to construct a road by the war power, ex necessitate, and for a limited period; but that power is wielded by the Executive, and ceases with the exigency that called it into existence.

I deny that there is a military necessity for the construction of a military road now between the cities of Washington and New York. Were the directors of the present lines connecting these cities wanting in alacrity or patriotism during the rebellion; or if they were, could not these lines have been seized and used by the war power? No, sir; they were promptly volunteered to the Government in its hour of peril, and every requirement was met. With one day's notice forty thousand men, with all their arms and munition of war could be transported in two days from New York to Philadelphia on the New Jersey roads; with three days' notice the whole rolling-stock of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore railroad, and Baltimore and Ohio railroad, now occupying four hundred and seventy-seven miles of railway, could be concentrated at Philadelphia and Baltimore; with three days' notice these roads could transport troops with all their arms in three consecutive days from New York to Washington sufficient to cope with and conquer any army of invasion that could be landed on our shores. Sir, there is no necessity for a military road on that route. The necessity did not exist during the war of the rebellion. It exists now only in the cupidity of those who desire a rival road to filch from honest men the honest avails of their enterprise and capital. The necessity will never exist, not even in a renewal of the rebellion, which, while in magnitude it has no parallel in the past, will have no parallel in the future. No one believes in a renewal of the rebellion but the coward; no one proclaims it but the dastard who would trample on a fallen foe, or the enemy of a restoration of the States. With our coasts defended by iron-clads, manned by our gallant tars, no foreign invaders will ever land in force on our shores; or if they do, not in sufficient numbers to require the organization of armies equal in numbers to one fifth of the armies organized against the rebellion.

Notwithstanding the entire capacity of the present roads for the exigencies of the military service during the war, they would occupy less time now in the transportation of troops, as since then that stupendous work, the bridge at Havre-de-Grace, resting on iron-clad piers, has been erected by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad at a vast expense for the benefit of the traveling public. Nor were these the only lines of road available during the war. The Central railroad of New Jersey, running from New York to Philipsburg on the Delaware, sixty miles above Philadelphia and fifty miles above tide-water, was also used during the rebellion by order of the Secretary of War for the transportation of the troops from New York to Washington by way of Easton and Harrisburg, showing that by this Harrisburg route troops can be transported to the capital from New York without danger in time of war, which is the reason given in the bill for crossing "the river Susquehanna at some point above tide-water." Since then another railroad has been constructed in New Jersey and is now in full operation, the Morris and Essex railroad, running from New York to Philipsburg, giving additional facilities and guarantees for the safety of troops from "danger in time of war."

Mr. Speaker, a similar bill to this passed the House a year or more since, and, as a demonstration of railroad speed, it was passed under the operation of the previous question and was called an "air-line railroad;" and with this assumption on its face the people believed that it would shorten the distance by railway from New York to Washington. Strange as it may seem it was passed as an "air-line route." Now, let any member examine the maps of Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey and he will see that no line nearer an air-line could be constructed than the present line between these cities unless you tunnel through stupendous mountains and bridge for miles over the waters of the Chesapeake bay; that the shortest practicable route, with a grade less than thirty feet per mile, can be run only on the existing lines; yet for fear this falsehood would be exposed no opponent of the bill was permitted to open his mouth in the debate.

There is no necessity for this road as a postal road. All the roads in the United States, I believe, by an act of Congress, in 1853, were declared post roads; and surely one route is sufficient to transport the mails between New York and Washington. The old objection that the mails were delayed in running through Philadelphia on horse-cars has been obviated by the trains running through the suburbs of the city without change of cars.

President Monroe, in his message to Congress, on the 4th of May, 1822, gives the true construction of the power to establish post offices and post roads:

"What is the just import of these words? The word 'establish' is the ruling term; post offices and post roads are the subjects on which it acts. The question is, what power is granted by that word?"

"If we were to ask any number of our enlightened citizens who had no connection with public affairs and whose minds were unprejudiced what was the import of the word 'established' and the extent of the grant which it controls, we are satisfied that all of them would answer that a power was thereby given to Congress to fix on the towns, court-houses, and other places throughout the Union at which there should be post offices; the routes by which the mails should be carried from one post office to another, so as to diffuse intelligence extensively, and to make the institution as useful as possible; to fix the postage to be paid on every letter and packet thus carried; to support the establishment and to protect the post offices and mails from robbery. The idea of a right to lay off the roads of the United States on a general scale of improvement; to take the soil from the proprietor by force; to establish turnpikes and tolls, and to punish offenders in the manner stated above never occurred to any person.

"If the United States possessed the power contended for under this grant, might they not, in adapting the roads of the individual States for the carriage of the mails, as has been done, assume jurisdiction over them and preclude a right to interfere with or alter them? Might they not establish turnpikes, and exercise all the other acts of sovereignty above stated over such roads necessary to protect them from injury and defray the expense of repairing them? Surely if the right exists these consequences necessarily followed as soon as the road was established. The absurdity of such a pretension must be apparent to all who examine it. In this way a large portion of the territory of every State might be taken from it, for there is scarcely a road in any State which will not be used for the transportation of the mail. A new field of legislation and internal improvement would thus be opened."

Even Judge Story, in his Commentaries, section eleven hundred and forty, volume two, admits that in this case it would not be sound policy to construct a post road. He says:

"It is said that there is no reason why Congress should be invested with such a power, seeing that the State roads do furnish such routes for the mail. When State roads do furnish such routes there certainly can be no sound policy in Congress making other routes."

I oppose the system inaugurated by this bill, because it assumes the power of Congress to exonerate from State taxation every railroad, canal, and turnpike upon which goods are transported from State to State by declaring that they are instruments of interstate commerce and that no State has a right, by taxation or otherwise, to burden commerce in its passage through the territories, as they allege is now done by the joint companies. This will follow as a logical sequence of the system when established; for it has been well said that our canals and railroads are a unit, and all are concerned in transporting merchandise from State to State; or if no such sweeping act is passed, then by a "connection" with the roads constructed under the authority of Congress they become in fact the instruments of the Government to carry out its powers, and can demand immunity from State taxes on the principles, well known to every lawyer, enunciated in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, (4 Wheaton, 416,) principles which have been reaffirmed in every subsequent decision on the same subject.

"1. That the power to create implies the power to destroy.

"2. That a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to and incompatible with the power to create and preserve.

"3. That when this repugnancy exists that authority which is superior must control, not yield, to that over which it is supreme.

"4. That the power to tax involves the power to destroy.

"5. That the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create.

"If the States may tax one instrument employed by the Government in the execution of its power they may tax any; they might tax the Mint, mails, judicial process, and all means used by the Government to an excess which would defeat all the measures of the Government.

"The State has no power by taxation or otherwise to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operation of constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the General Government."

Inaugurate this system by the passage of this bill, which you know will be followed by a thousand other bills of a like character, and this exemption of State property from taxation you inflict on States where people are burdened by a taxation that bows them to the very earth, and which will rest on their children and their children's children for half a century to come, and you will require of them, as the ancient Pharaohs required of the children of Israel, to find the same amount of bricks while you take away the straw; a taxation incurred, too, by impulses of patriotism as pure as ever throbbed in the breast of man. The people will ask what party, what individuals inaugurated a scheme which lifts taxation on property and business worth more than the national debt from the shoulders of railroad owners and places it on the property and earnings of the people.

But if this freedom from taxation should not be the result of your system, then I oppose it, because it would give a fatal stab to the internal improvements of the country. When a railroad charter is granted by the State, there is an express or implied contract that the capitalists who build the road shall be protected from competition so long as they meet all the reasonable demands of the public. Upon the faith of this contract, express or implied, men invest their capital and build the works. It is a principle of sound policy for the extension of internal improvements and development of State resources as well as of fair dealing. No man would invest his capital in the construction of a railroad if he knew or believed that the moment it was completed or yielded a dividend a rival road would be chartered to compete with it in business. Under that system of State charters our land has been covered by a net-work of railroads. Whenever and wherever commerce or travel demanded, there a railroad has been or will be constructed. Under that system the energies of the people have been encouraged and fostered. Under that system we have been the means of doing more for the industry and prosperity of man than any nation under heaven. By that system the skill of our mechanics, the diffusion of knowledge, the cultivation of our soil, the energies of our sons, on lake, land, and sea, have placed our people in the van of nations. Under that policy the avenues of commerce have been opened; the most gigantic rebellion that the world ever saw has been crushed; and a net-work of railroads has been stretched over the land which commands the admiration and elicits the astonishment of the world.

I have not the means of knowing the number of miles of railroad now completed under State charters, but in 1860 the number of miles exceeded thirty thousand; a chain of railroads which, in one continuous line, would more than girdle this great globe; and of this vast construction and expenditure the States through which this proposed railroad would pass have more than performed their share; and I learn from the able speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] that now "over forty thousand miles of railways are in complete operation, at a cost in construction of about twenty-six hundred million dollars." By the inauguration of your system you paralyze these energies. No men will invest under a State charter with the certain prospect of competition whenever it will pay, under the authority of the General Government. There will be no security against competitions from other States, under the authority of Congress, by men who have no direct interest in the honor, prosperity, or soil of the State with whose roads they wish to compete. These men will only demand charters for routes which promise immediate remuneration of the outlay. On the other hand, the citizens will not construct a road on such routes under State charters with the knowledge that when the road shall become profitable a rival road will be created for the benefit of stock-jobbers, in the name of commerce, and impelled by avarice and plunder.

Sir, I am "not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet," but I predict that under your system you will not have half the number of railroads available for military, commercial, and postal service in fifty years as you would have under the State system, nor would you gain the support of the millions of citizens who have invested in railways, by declaring their roads instruments of commerce, and thus freeing them from State taxation; for your system of competition would cause them to lose in the depreciation of stock ten times the amount of State tax.

Inaugurate this system and you interfere with the energies and pockets of the people; you alienate their affection for the Union and reverence for its laws; you inaugurate a conflict of interests between the State and Federal Government. This conflict of interests will bring on a struggle for power, and in that struggle the States will triumph, by curtailing even the power now constitutionally vested in Congress by an amendment which will demand, if not indemnity for the past, at least security for the future.

Inaugurate this system and you give the earnings of the industrious and patriotic to the idle and worthless drones who feed and fatten on their country in peace and war.

Inaugurate this system and you violate the national faith. Upon the faith of the construction given to the powers of the Constitution by the framers themselves, by successive Presidents, by judicial decisions, and by the acquiescence of Congress in their construction, this vast outlay was made, these works were constructed. By the passage of this bill that faith will be violated, and the Goths will be invited to enter Rome.

Inaugurate this system and you inaugurate sectional legislation. Before many years the West and South will control Congress, and they will take the lion's share of the public plunder.

Inaugurate this system and you inaugurate a railroad bureau, with its hordes of officers throughout the whole land to harass the people and eat out their substance.

The highest dictates of morality as well as sound policy require the Federal Government to hold inviolate all constitutional contracts made under the authority of State laws and in the faith of non-interference by the Federal Government.

Who does not know that the charter of railroads through the States without their consent would be followed by subsidies? The same arrangements now used by corporations to seize upon the public lands will be used to obtain subsidies for railroads through the States. A future Congress will be told, as the Congress now is told, that the construction of the road will save in transportation of military supplies, or will add to the revenues by increasing the taxable property tenfold the amount of the subsidy; that this great saving to the Government, this great increase of the Government revenue cannot be effected without Government aid; and untold millions will be wrung from the sweat and toil of the people to enrich the stock-jobbers under the plea that the roads are of a national character. This bill is but the entering wedge of a system of public plunder. Nor will Congress resist the plunderers more than they now resist the plunderers of the public domain. But a few days since the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [HON. ELIHU B. WASHBURN] proclaimed in his place on the floor of this House:

"It is not an over-estimate to say that the value of public lands voted away by Congress in the last eighteen years has not been less than $500,000,000"—and asked the attention of the House to the quantity reported by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who says:

"It is of empire extent; in aggregate more than five million acres—the entire area of the six New England States added to the surface of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia."

These are the lands, sufficient in area to form six large States; these lands, the common inheritance of the American people as homes for their children, are given to soulless corporations.

Now, a new placer will be opened by the operation of this new system, and the work of corruption and plunder will be complete. From year to year these public robbers will besiege the Halls of Congress; will gather like the locusts of Egypt, attracted by the scent of public plunder, and held together by its cohesive power; they will come with lies on their lips and bribes in their hands to control members of future Congresses elected by their influence, and ready for gold to barter away the honor and the money of their country. Then you will have "a ring" to control legislation in comparison with which the "whisky ring" shrinks into insignificance.

Mr. Speaker, you could not devise a system better calculated to corrupt legislation, plunder the people, and destroy the Union of the States than the system you would inaugurate by this bill. You array the interest of one citizen against another; you excite hostility between the States and General Government; you offer a premium to the unprincipled stock-jobber and stimulate his greed by transferring to his pockets the honest earnings of honest men through legislative charters, and you throw around this act the mantle of public virtue by telling him that it is patriotic thus to aid the military, postal, and commercial interests of the country. Undermine the foundations of public virtue and this fair fabric of human liberty sooner or later will fall in irredeemable ruins. No republic ever was or ever will be permanent unless sustained by public virtue. We have every evidence that a fearful work of demoralization is progressing with fearful strides among our people. That demoralization must cease or the days of the Republic will soon be numbered, and the patriot of future times, while lamenting the fall of "the Great Republic," will see what every patriot should now see, that "honesty is the best policy" for nations as well as individuals.

There are doubtless many members who favor bills of this character because they suppose it will advance their darling project of a "strong Government" to have a "Government with the strength of a monarchy under the forms of a republic," and they entertain the delusive idea that this can be effected by a centralization of all power in the Federal Government at the expense of the reserved rights of the States. When will gentlemen learn that in the means used to attain this the Government is weakened, not strengthened? When will gentlemen learn that the true strength of a republic lies in the respect and love of her people; in the justice and impartiality of her laws; but, above all, in the promotion of public virtue? Whatever tends to promote sectional strife, promote corruption or avarice, the interest of the few at the expense of the many, will make the Government weak indeed. Destroy in any way the beautiful equilibrium, the harmonious workings of our State and national governments, and you hasten the destruction of both; every interference in the reserved rights of the States or business of the people, every scheme of public plunder, will weaken the attachment of the people to the Union. They will then begin to calculate its value, and when by your acts you lead them to believe that the Union is an instrument of plunder or oppression, then the end will come.

You talk about a "strong government." When this system is fully inaugurated it will inaugurate a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself. Was not the Government strong enough to marshal and equip armies greater than the world ever saw? Was it not strong enough to crush a rebellion which in numbers and arms had no parallel in history? Was it not strong enough to imprison men and women by thousands in its bastilles without charge and without trial? Was it not strong enough to keep States out of the Union and place their people under the laws of the bayonet until they altered their fundamental law according to its behests? What greater strength could you give it except to change it into an imperial government with imperial power?

Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to defend the rights of my State, trampled upon by this bill. While I maintain the just powers of the Federal Government, I believe this duty imposed upon me by my oath before high heaven in the presence of the members of this House. I should feel by voting for this bill that I would violate the Constitution and aid a system which eventually would result in a conflict of interest or of power between the national Government and the States; that I would be attempting "to do in the forum what the rebels failed to do in the field." With these views, should I vote for this bill, I should feel that I would be recreant to my State, my country, and my God.

Rights of Loyal Citizens of Alabama.

REMARKS OF HON. T. HAUGHEY,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1869,

On the resolution restricting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and providing for the payment of quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, and that it be so extended as to include the loyal citizens of Alabama.

Mr. HAUGHEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 24th of last July I introduced the following joint resolution:

Resolved, &c., That the benefits of the act of July 4, 1864, restricting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and providing for the payment of quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States be so extended as to include the loyal citizens of Alabama.

The committee to which this resolution was referred has been carefully examining the subject, and will report unanimously in favor of its adoption so soon as the floor of the House can be obtained by the committee to make such report.

Relief is sought in this resolution for such loyal citizens of Alabama as furnished to the Army of the United States quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies for which they have received no compensation. The class of men for whom relief is sought are those whose sufferings and sacrifices and whose persecutions during and since the war entitle them to the favorable consideration of Congress. They are those who opposed secession, opposed rebellion, and never did any act which could be construed as giving voluntary aid to the enemies of the Government. They are generally men of moderate or limited means, small farmers whose horses, mules, cattle, corn, and hogs constituted nearly all their wealth. Very few of them had any interest present or prospective in slaves or slavery. Though impoverished in many instances by the Union forces they never faltered in their love and attachment to the Government. Thousands of them rather than submit to rebel tyranny and despotism left their homes, their wives, children, and all that life holds dear and took refuge within the Union lines and there remained until the close of the war. While many of these brave men were fighting in the ranks of the Union Army and exposing themselves to all the dangers, privations, and hardships incident to camp life their families at home were stripped of all their means of support by that very Army which should have been their shield of protection.

For reasons satisfactory to Congress the claims of these men have hitherto been ignored. Though the justice of the claims and the loyalty of the claimants can be established by the highest and most positive evidence, and though nearly four years have elapsed since the claims originated, they have thus far failed to be recognized and still remain unsettled. The tendency of legislation in regard to such claims is to increase rather than diminish the difficulties attending their adjustment.

According to existing laws it is of no avail that a claimant from a southern State can prove by demonstrative evidence that he never voluntarily aided the rebellion. He may even prove by incontrovertible evidence that he not only gave no aid to the rebellion, but that he had served in the United States Army during the whole period of the war and aided to the full extent of his ability in suppressing the rebellion; yet from the simple fact that his property was taken by the United States forces in one of the States declared to be in rebellion the payment of his claim is prohibited by the acts of July, 1864, and that of February, 1867. Even the widows and orphans of Federal soldiers may establish the fact that they have been impoverished and brought to misery and want by the Union Army, and yet because they were residents of the South no compensation for their losses is permitted.

The law of July 4, 1864, and that of February, 1867, prohibits the settlement of all claims originating during the war in any of the rebellious States, Tennessee and West Virginia excepted. They declare in effect that the loyal citizens of these States are not, according to the Constitution of the United States, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, nor are they entitled to just compensation for their private property that had been taken for public use. The mere residence or domicile of loyal citizens during the war in any of these States is regarded as prima facie evidence of disloyalty, and is considered a sufficient reason to deprive them of their inherent and inalienable rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States.

The object of the joint resolution now under consideration is to extend the benefits of the law of July 4, 1864, to the loyal citizens of Alabama, the law of February, 1867, to the contrary notwithstanding. All that is sought in the resolution is that the loyal citizens of Alabama shall be placed upon an equal footing with loyal citizens of these States that are not excluded from the benefits of the law of 1864.

Alabama is no longer a rebellious State. Her legitimate and practical relations with the Union are now fully restored. A large majority of her people are loyal to the Government. They prefer the Government of the United States to every other Government, and in case of need an overwhelming majority of her fighting men would defend the Government against all other Governments on earth. A large majority of the Legislature and of the State and county officers are loyal, and always have been loyal. Her constitution and laws guaranty equal rights and privileges to all. They are preëminently liberal and in entire harmony with Republican principles and with the enlightened and progressive spirit of the age. Alabama, then, being a State in the Union and of the Union, it is sincerely believed that if the benefits of the law of July 4, 1864, were extended to the loyal citizens of Alabama that law would be as safely and as guardedly administered as in any other State of the Union.

The loyal citizens of Alabama have a war history very similar in many respects to that of loyal citizens in Tennessee, to whom claims originating during the war in that State are now authorized to be paid. Like the loyal citizens of Tennessee those of Alabama resisted secession and rebellion to the full extent of their ability. When resistance was found to be hopeless they yielded a reluctant acquiescence to a fate which they were powerless to avert. Like the Tennessee loyalists, thousands of the Union men of Alabama lay hidden in caves and mountain gorges, and deep ravines, awaiting their chances to escape to the Federal lines. Many thus situated were captured by rebel bloodhounds, and if not instantly shot they were carried in chains to loathsome rebel dungeons and allowed to linger and die from bad treatment, or to be taken from their prison cells by vigilance committees and either shot or hung for no other crime than that of Unionism.

Like the Unionists of East Tennessee a large number of the able-bodied Unionists in North Alabama enlisted in the Union Army and fought with it until the end of the war. Though the Tennessee Federal soldiers largely outnumbered those from Alabama this disparity in numbers is due to the greater difficulties to be overcome by the latter in reaching the Federal lines. It is fair to presume that the love of the Union was equally intense in the eastern counties of Tennessee and the northern counties of Alabama, and that the difference in the manifestation of that love was solely due to the difference in the geographical position of these two Switzerland of America. All the arguments, then, which have heretofore been urged in favor of the payment of loyal claimants in Tennessee apply with equal force to the payment of loyal claimants in Alabama.

To deny these men the small pittance which some of them claim for property taken by the Union Army upon the simple plea that these men were citizens of a rebellious State during the war does not comport with that justice and magnanimity which have hitherto been characteristic features in the conduct of the Government toward its loyal citizens. It was not the fault but the misfortune that they were citizens of these States during the war. Nor was it their fault, but their great misfortune, that their homes had been made the chosen battle-ground of a causeless and wicked rebellion. Moreover, it was not their fault but their exceedingly great calamity that the United States Government failed to extend its protecting arm to its loyal citizens in these States, and save them falling into the meshes of a rebel despotism. If there is any culpability in residing under a rebel despotism during the war the Government cannot be held blameless in permitting that rebel despotism to exist.

Allegiance and protection are reciprocal and correlative obligations between the Government and the citizen. The citizen owes allegiance to the Government and the Government owes him protection. If the citizen refuses to obey the behests of the Government and manifests a desire to overthrow or attempts to overthrow it he is a traitor and forfeits his claim upon the Government for protection. And on the other hand, if the Government is unwilling, unable, or fails from any cause to protect the citizen the allegiance which the latter owes to the Government is absolved. A Government which is unable or fails from any cause to protect its citizens can justly have no claims upon the latter for allegiance.

At the commencement of the war a majority of the people in the southern States revolted against their lawful Government, and organized in its stead a revolutionary one. A minority of the citizens of those States opposed the revolution and adhered to the lawful Government until they were overpowered by the revolutionists. The rightful Government, however, for four long years failed to protect the minority, and suffered it to be ruled and controlled by the revolutionary government. The citizens composing this minority were at all times anxiously desirous of resuming their allegiance, but during the whole of this gloomy period the protecting arm of the Government was too short to reach them. Finally, however, when the Government did succeed in conquering this revolutionary majority, and resumed its sway over the rebellious States, the citizens of the minority with joy and exultation resumed that allegiance which they for four years had held in abeyance, but had never absolutely relinquished.

Under such circumstances these Union citizens composing the minority had no right to expect that the Government in resuming its rightful authority over those States and in establishing rules and regulations for the payment of claims growing out of the rebellion would impose upon them the same disabilities as are imposed upon the revolutionary majority. By existing laws there is no distinction made in those States between the innocent and the guilty, between those who tried to destroy and those who tried to save the Government. The rebel assassin is classed with the Union man who was the victim of his assassination. The persecuted Union man is entitled to no more consideration than his rebel persecutors. No distinction is made between claims for supplies furnished to the rebel forces and those for supplies furnished to the Army of the United States. All are reduced to a common level by the laws of July 4, 1864, and that of February, 1867.

In view of the long-suffering privations and persecutions to which the loyal citizens of Alabama have been subjected it would almost appear to be a work of supererogation to ask Congress for such a recognition of the justice of their claims as has been granted to the loyal claimants of Tennessee and West Virginia. Four fifths of the loyal claimants in Alabama are small farmers of moderate or limited means. Their claims are generally small, but though small they are just and very much needed. They are small when compared with the ability of the Government to pay, but large when compared with the ability of the claimants to lose their claims. Their property that was taken for the use of the Army was such in many cases as was indispensable for the support of their families. In many cases their horses, mules, cattle, corn, and hogs were all taken, and thus their only means of making a support were entirely taken away. Even the families of Federal soldiers who were at the time fighting the battles of the Union were thus stripped and left dependent upon the charity of their more fortunate rebel neighbors.

In the latter part of March and beginning of April, 1865, United States troops under the command of General Wilson marched through the very heart of Alabama, from the Tennessee river on the north to the Alabama river on the south. They lived on the country through which they passed, giving no receipts or vouchers for any of the property taken or used by the Army. The Union people were generally the greatest sufferers because they would not conceal their property, while the rebels whenever they had timely warning would usually carry off their property to remote and secluded localities and conceal it on the approach of the Army. All that these Union men want is simple, even-handed justice. They have committed no crime, they have forfeited no rights, they firmly adhered to the Government so far as adherence was practicable through good and evil report. They were the friends of the Government before the war and during the war, and are the friends of the Government to-day; and if need be would fight in its defense.

This joint resolution is no party measure, nor is it to be considered in the light of policy or expediency merely. It is a measure which addresses itself to the justice and magnanimity and liberality of Congress. The reasons which induced Congress to extend the benefits of the laws of July 4, 1864, to the States of Tennessee and West Virginia are equally forcible in the case of Alabama. The provisions of the law have been justly and wisely extended to those States without any important losses or any serious detriment to the interests of the Government. It is believed that the aggregate amount of claims in Alabama is considerably less than in Tennessee, and that the payment of fraudulent claims can be guarded against with as much facility and efficiency in the former State as in the latter.

Congress has hitherto responded very favorably and promptly to the appeals of the loyal citizens of Alabama in matters of political reconstruction. For this the loyal citizens of that State are profoundly grateful. A few of them again appeal to Congress for some degree of financial reconstruction. Their property has been taken and used by the United States Army. They appeal to Congress for compensation. It is confidently hoped and believed that this last appeal will be met with the same promptness and with the same spirit of liberality that characterized the responses to their former appeals. The sectional and discriminating features of the law being removed the long-neglected and down-trodden Unionists of the South will thus have cause to rejoice that their sufferings and sacrifices in behalf of an imperiled Union have not been in vain; that their faith and confidence in the justice and beneficence of the Government have not been misplaced. They will thus have fully realized that this great Government of the people, for the people and by the people, knows no North, no South, no East, no West, but that the rights, interests, and welfare of all sections are equally favored and equally protected.

Tariff Bill.

REMARKS OF HON. G. F. MILLER, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1869,

The House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration House bill No. 1349, entitled "A bill to increase the revenue from duties and imports, and tending to equalize exports and imports."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the object of the bill under consideration is, as the title properly states, "to increase the revenue from duties and imports, and tending to equalize exports and imports." This bill, it is true, does not go to the extent that the friends of the tariff would desire, but it is one step in the right direction. The friends of protection did all in their power to have a judicious tariff bill passed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, but were thwarted by the enemies of the measure. The object of the bill is the protection of American industry, and unless we build up and nurture manufactures, develop our mineral resources, and encourage labor, the laborers of this country will be reduced to the same condition as the oppressed of Europe.

We, the friends of the tariff, do not want, as intimated on a former occasion by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] a prohibitory tariff, but we want it sufficient to protect American manufactures and labor, and at the same time produce a fair revenue. I am aware that it is the cry of free traders and of presses, (and I am sorry to say some American presses at that,) that it is the object of protectionists to have a tariff so high as to be prohibitory, and consequently abuse is poured out upon any man that has the independence to stand up in defense of American labor; and I wish it understood, Mr. Chairman, that we Pennsylvanians are not captious upon the subject. We want a fair protection to all interests of these United States, and will maintain that view irrespective of abuse from any quarter. I am sorry that so many members of this House representing the enterprising West should have been induced to imbibe the free-trade doctrine, which I hold is at variance with the interest and welfare of this country. They seem to have forgotten the doctrine promulgated by that mighty champion of the West, the gallant Henry Clay, who stood up on all occasions for protection of American industry, and whose name will be revered by the masses of the American people down to the latest generation.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if our friends in the West, Illinois for instance, would turn their attention to building up manufactures they could soon compete with the New England States, and would find in their own State a ready market for at least a large proportion of their agricultural products. Dr. Benjamin Franklin, writing in London on the 22d of April, 1771, to Humphrey Marshall, says:

"Every manufacturer encouraged in our country makes part of a market for provision within ourselves and saves so much money to the country as must otherwise be exported to pay for the manufactures he supplies. Here in England it is well known and understood that wherever a manufactory is established in which is employed a number of hands it raises the value of lands in the neighboring country all around it, partly by the greater demand near at hand for the produce of the land and partly from the plenty of money drawn by the manufacturers to that part of the country. It seems, therefore, the interest of all our farmers and owners of lands to encourage our young manufactures in preference to foreign ones imported among us from distant countries."

Thus it will be seen that the opinion expressed by that far-seeing philosopher at such an early period, if carried out at the present day will make these United States the most prosperous country in the world; and yet we hear Representatives on this floor advocating "free trade," which is nothing more nor less than favoring foreign manufactures and prostrating our own, and discriminating against all the great industrial interests of the country, and a strike at the laboring man. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] seem to be ardent admirers and advocates of what I deem anti-American doctrine. The latter gentleman, who is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, on all occasions opposes the protective policy, and if I am not mistaken, he will in a few years regret the course taken. Pennsylvania long since has taken a firm stand and will support no man who discriminates against American industry. We find that in 1866 after absorbing $82,000,000 in gold there was left upon us a debt of no less than $200,000,000 which was settled by transferring $280,000,000 in bonds to foreign countries; and with this I would refer to the statistics read by the honorable gentleman [Mr. MOORHEAD] who has charge of this bill. The aspect presented, Mr. Chairman, is alarming, and unless something is done to check the enormous importations I fear our country will eventually be brought to a precarious condition.

Mr. Chairman, I have a word to say about another system adopted which ought to be done away with, and that is what is denominated the warehouse system. It allows a large influx of foreign goods without payment of duty thereon. The only true mode, in my opinion, is to abolish that system entirely, and require the duty on all foreign commodities to be paid when they are landed on our shore. This would be a preventive of immense frauds and greatly increase the revenue to the Government.

As the time allotted for the discussion of this bill is short I cannot go fully into the subject of the tariff, but can only make a few cursory remarks. This last session of the Fortieth Congress is now rapidly drawing to a close, and I regret that we will not have time to take any decisive action on this important subject. I will, however, refer specially to one item of imports that if adequate protection were afforded could be manufactured in our own country, and that is linen cloth. In 1866 England exported to the United States 119,343,207 yards of linen cloth, valued at £3,680,000 sterling, and for which the wholesale merchants of America paid at least $40,000,000 in currency.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that the thanks of this nation are due to the gentleman from the Pittsburgh district [Mr. MOORHEAD] for the industry and perseverance he manifested in having this tariff bill brought before this House; and it is unfortunate for the country that in a few days it will be deprived of his valuable services on this floor.

Death of Hon. James Mann.

EULOGY OF HON. W. J. BLACKBURN, OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 2, 1869,

On the death of Hon. JAMES MANN, member from the second congressional district of Louisiana.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House while I perform a sad duty. It falls upon me to announce the death of Hon. JAMES MANN, who took his seat as a member of this House from the second congressional district of Louisiana on the 18th of July last, and died in the city of New Orleans on the 18th day of September following. I had expected that the various contests for the seat which he so nobly filled for only a few days would not have been permitted to prevent the formal announcement of his death at the proper time. I was, therefore, rather surprised to find on my arrival here about a month ago—having been detained at my home by severe illness until that time—I was rather surprised, I say, to find that no announcement had been made of his untimely and much deplored death. It would be a shame, sir, if not a disgrace, were such announcement to fail to be made by some one of his colleagues. Hence I hesitate not to attempt the performance of the painful but imperative duty.

It was not my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, to know the deceased member for any length of time; but during the brief period in which I had the honor of his acquaintance, I think I may say I became to know him well and intimately; for he was of that mold of manhood which has nothing hidden, and of that generosity of soul which could conceal not even an impulse of a large and open heart.

Of the early life of JAMES MANN I know absolutely nothing. I believe he was a native of Maine, and served in the legislative councils of that State prior to the late deplorable war in this country. During that war he is known to have served bravely and gallantly as a soldier in the cause of the Union and of liberty. I know not the extent of his public services as a civilian, nor the various phases and ranks in his military career. I only know that at the close of the war he settled in the city of New Orleans, where he was known only to be loved. It was there that I first became acquainted with him, soon after his election to a seat on this floor; for this House has decided that he was so elected, and as his personal friend and admirer I am perfectly satisfied with that decision.

Sir, in passing a few words of eulogy on the memory of my deceased friend, I am glad to find that no great degree of eloquence or of genius is needed. I need not, if I could, indulge in any such strain as that exhibited over the dead body of Cæsar. My subject being more pure and simple, the words and the figure of speech want no such embellishment.

To be a man in the true and natural sense, is the legitimate summit and fullness of all earthly greatness, and honor, and glory. To be able to stand forth before the world and bid defiance to its scrutiny and its criticism, and remain unscathed and without a blush, is the fulfillment of all that God could ever require or expect in this life of any of his creatures. Of such a character and type of being, so far as my knowledge and acquaintance extend, was my deceased friend and honored colleague. And I speak this not as a mere formal compliment, for with me on such occasions, the poor, common words of courtesy are only a mockery; but I speak what I say as coming from the heart, and as meaning something.

JAMES MANN was elected by a party with which I had no sympathy, and came up here and took his seat with political sentiments different from those entertained by myself. But our intercourse was none the less cordial and pleasant, and only tended to exemplify the beauty and wisdom of our system of government—a system of government which we may hope and pray shall prove immortal. To differ politically is not only the right but the duty of freemen; but to allow this difference to run into personal hates and proscriptions and persecutions, is both hateful and criminal. The gentleman on whose death I speak had a soul too large and a heart too noble for this. Being honest himself he accorded honesty of purpose to those who differed from him, and loved them none the less socially and personally. Ah! if this could with truth be said of every American citizen, how much more harmonious and judicious would be our legislative deliberations, and how much more happy our homes and pleasant our social intercourse! Neither a great mind nor a generous soul ever persecutes for opinion's sake. JAMES MANN was never accused of such folly and wickedness.

Well and vividly do I remember our last interview. It was on one of those lovely nights known only to the clime of my nativity and of his adoption. It was in the city of New Orleans, but a short time before his much lamented death. He embraced me cordially, and with the fervor and warmth of a long-absent brother. We walked to Canal street and ascended to a balcony where we could witness in safety a torchlight Democratic procession. I reminded him that the procession contained many prominent Confederates whom he had assisted in compelling to lay down their arms and acknowledge as supreme the cause of the Union. I was pleased to notice in him a lively love and even enthusiasm for the cause for which he had so bravely fought; and equally well pleased was I to notice in him no lurking feeling of hatred or jealousy toward those against whom he had fought—my personal friends and fellow-citizens. For all this I loved him the more; for thus I thought he did but display the more aptly the true type of the magnanimous and generous American citizen; and such he was in the true and practical sense.

Only a few days more and my noble friend and able and honored colleague slept with his fathers. He died suddenly of acute brain fever. But a man of his magnanimity of soul and his honesty and purity of impulse and aspiration could not have been taken wholly by surprise, and ushered into the presence of his God and Maker totally unprepared and unprovided. He was of that class who, to some degree at least, are always prepared; and without assuming to speak or judge as to the future, I can but feel that the friends and relatives of JAMES MANX should not mourn his death in the sense and feeling indulged by those who mourn without hope. God has not willed that the generous and noble and good should be finally and forever lost. Such characters may die suddenly, and with scarcely a moment's warning; but they cannot fail to die "in hope of that eternal life which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began." They may sleep for a season, and perhaps suffer beyond the tomb; but if creation is not a mockery, they shall arise and live again in renewed life and increased beauty and immortal happiness.

But, turning in sorrow and mourning from the tomb of the departed, it is natural, and perhaps of more avail and utility, to sympathize and condole with the bereaved and afflicted. Our honorable and honored departed friend has left an afflicted family, a bereaved wife and orphaned children, to weep over his tomb and bewail his death; and it becomes our duty to at least sympathize and condole with them. Those of us who have wives and children, and who have lost friends and kindred, will not need much special instruction to direct us aright in this matter. We shall instinctively know how to mourn with those who mourn and weep with those who weep. Nor is this unmanly or a sign of weakness; but on the contrary we shall find that after all our earthly efforts for honors and greatness, it is in the domestic circle and the private walks of life that are exhibited the noblest traits of exalted manliness and true womanhood. What the outside world may see and know but little of, and at which it may scoff if it does know, God in his wisdom and goodness has promised the most highly and specially to reward. David never appeared so majestic and grand, and so much like a man after God's own heart, as when prostrate in prayer and sackcloth for his sick and dying child; Joseph never seemed so manly as when he stepped aside in silence and unseen to drop a tear of joy at being told that his younger brother still lived; nor was the meek and devoted Rachel ever half so lovely as when weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted because they were not!

Hence, we may well pause for a moment and extend the poor boon of sympathy and condolence to the bereaved family of our departed member and friend; while we drop upon his untimely tomb one tear of sincere sorrow and regret.

Uniform Suffrage.

SPEECH OF HON. W. J. BLACKBURN, OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 30, 1869,

Pending the proposed constitutional amendment making suffrage uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, the proposition pending the action of the House is one of such deep interest—I may say gigantic importance—that I deem it but fair and proper that every State of the Union having representation on this floor should be heard, and through as many voices as time and occasion will allow. And it is with this view and under this feeling that I ask a few moments indulgence while I attempt to drop a few practical, common-sense hints, without aiming to enter into anything like a theoretical and nicely systematic argument; but what I say shall be addressed to the plain and unsophisticated understanding and honest heart of the country.

And what is it that we now propose to do? If I understand correctly it is simply to recommend a constitutional provision protecting all free and qualified citizens in their natural right of franchise, and to make the status of this right uniform and national. I take it that the abstract question of the utility of granting to certain classified portions of the community the exercise of the elective franchise is not involved or to be discussed in this issue, but rather that the question of granting to freemen in a free country the right to vote is conceded, upon the common-law principles of right and of public safety, as according more strictly with the theory and purposes of republican government. And the plain, practical question before us is simply whether this natural right under free republican institutions shall be nationalized.

Now, sir, as a southern man, living in a locality where this idea of nationalizing suffrage has been enforced, has been taken from the State authorities and regulated by the national Government, I would be in favor of this proposed amendment if for no other reason or feeling than a desire to give to others what they have given to me. If it is good, I would, as a just and generous man, naturally desire that those who gave it me should have it also; and if it is bad I could not do less, as a man of spirit, with a proper self-respect and resentment, than thrust it back upon those who thrust it upon me. But I favor this measure upon a higher ground than this. Conceding the proposition that all freemen in a free country and under a truly republican form of government cannot with safety to the healthy condition of the body-politic be deprived of the exercise of the franchise for any reason or ground short of felony, I am willing to see the right of this exercise dignified with a national guarantee. I am unwilling to see it remain subservient to the whims and caprices of local and sectional prejudices.

Sir, what has occasioned in this land so much fraternal bloodshed and civil commotion? I answer briefly but pointedly, the narrow-contracted heresy of State sovereignty over the national will; that unpatriotic idea in our politics which would dim and tarnish the luster and glory of our national renown with the flickering shadow of State pride and sectional prejudice. This heresy was beaten into the dust of humility by the hard implements of war in the patriotic hands of those who loved their whole country more than they loved any particular section or locality thereof. But there are those in the land, and some of them do not live in the "late rebellious States," who would even now revive this fatal delusion. And the great trouble is, the advocates of this idea of sectionalizing and localizing the full measure of freedom under our beautiful system and theory of government are men not exactly ignorant, in the real and vulgar sense and meaning of the term, but they are evidently resting under and actuated by the lowest and most stupid order of prejudice—a prejudice which our patriotic forefathers who framed and put into motion our system of government scorned to notice, much less exercise—a prejudice against a man because of the color of his skin; and they seem so oblivious to all which the idea of a free republican government means as to be willing to deprive a man of his right of self-protection simply and solely because of this color of the cuticle! For the eternal cry and leading "argument" with these men is and has been the everlasting and inevitable "negro!" When a slave he was their hobby; and now that he is free they ride him still! And the fact that he has been freed against their will and in direct opposition to their cherished idea of sectionalization as against the national safety, they are none the less forward; they run after him still, and hunt him down as their game, as a hound would chase a hare! These men feign a hatred or dislike to the black man in politics, when the truth is but for the negro as a bone of contention in the politics of this country the so-called Democracy would have no watchword, no slogan cry. The party would die for the want of humbuggery to feed upon. They could no longer cry aloud against the poor, unoffending negro in public, and then, after he is enfranchised by the Republican party, kneel to him in private for political power, while the hypocritical howl of "negro equality" gurgles from their very decent throats! Othello's occupation would be gone with the disappearance of the last African from this land, and modern Democracy would die a natural death.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is part of the mission of the Republican party to see to it that the march of free institutions and the consummation of real and practical liberty shall not be retarded in this land. It is the mission of the Republican party to see that the Government shall have a new and accelerated impetus under the new order of things, and be firmly organized and adjusted upon the idea of a great and overpowering nationality. If we are to give heed and give way to sectional prejudices and State pride, and allow the course of justice and of liberty to be turned and directed alone by an educated but barbarous proscription against color and caste, then the late war will have to be fought over again before treason against freedom is put down.

I confess, sir, that this question of suffrage is one which suggests many intricate and very delicate points, especially as involving negro suffrage; and an intelligent citizen of a free country, if he desires to maintain and retain his freedom for the future and perpetuate free institutions, will not approach such a question hastily, much less will he be influenced in his views and action by classified and sectional hates and prejudices.

The greatest source of strife in this matter seems to be a fear of social equality and a personal mixing up and commingling of the races; but if we view the question calmly and in the light of history and common sense we shall see that this fear is both unfounded and unmanly. We shall find in history that the noblest and greatest statesmen this country ever produced deemed it no personal disgrace nor political humiliation to vote at the same poll with "free negroes;" and if we consult the dictates of common sense we shall be taught that true manhood, like true virtue in woman, is its own best protector, and needs no special immunity or class legislation to sustain and protect it against outside pressure and the encroachments of menial and unworthy association. It is folly to assume and a burlesque to manhood and personal decency to contend that because a citizen is your equal before the law and at the ballot-box he is therefore your equal and must needs be your associate in the social circle.

Gentlemen who make such assumption know nothing practical of the negro character and display but a poor appreciation of the instincts of the white man, and I must think have studied but scattering and comprehended but illy the genius and tendency of free republican institutions. The negro in the South is already as thoroughly and completely enfranchised as written law can make him; and I can very plainly tell northern gentlemen that there is in the South to-day less of personal equality and social intercourse between the races than in the days of slavery. And I can assure them further that there was always in the South, both pre-vions to and after the abolition of slavery, more kindly personal feeling toward the negro than I have ever heard of existing toward him among the people of the North. The meanest masters I ever knew were men who came from the North as rash and fanatical Abolitionists, and who, after their cupidity had overcome their philanthropy and patriotism, and they became the owners of slaves, knew no end to their exactions and no limit to their tortures. It comes then, gentlemen, with poor grace from any of you to object to the enfranchisement of the few colored men among yourselves, after you have freed by force the slaves of the South and enfranchised them to a man; and not only so, but have disfranchised and disqualified for office many of their former masters!

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may seem that the truths I speak "doth lack some gentleness and time to speak them in;" it may be thought by some whose withers are galled that I "rub the sore when I should bring the plaster." But my answer is that "truth is truth unto the end of reckoning," and was never indebted to a lie. If gentlemen do not wish their toes tread upon they must get out of the "straight and narrow path" which duty, honor, and a Christian patriotism dictate to me to follow.

Let me say, sir, that of all the characters who now claim a name in the political history of this country, the so-called Democrat of the present hour, and especially the northern Democrat, is the last who should raise his voice or cast his vote against negro suffrage. And why? Because whenever and wherever this principle is ingrafted upon our statute-books they are the first and most eager to profit thereby. They seem to lack the nerve and the manliness to bring about that which they are the most forward and eager to grasp when accomplished; thus placing themselves in the most unenviable attitude of one who is too cowardly to steal, but who is mean enough to be the first to appropriate stolen goods!

I know how it is in the South, and I think I know what northern Democrats expected of the Democrats of the South. I know that the Democrats of the South, while they have howled and are still howling against negro suffrage, stole it and appropriated it in the last election in my State; and I think I know that the northern Democracy both expected and greatly desired this. Mr. Frank P. Blair, for instance, who was the first to disturb the quiet of southern institutions on southern soil, and who fought as bravely and gallantly as any man to bring about the condition of affairs which naturally enfranchised the former slaves, turned the back of his hand against their manhood, while he both craved and expected their votes! Such an attitude in politics is not only inconsistent, but it is something even more wicked. It is both unfair to themselves and unjust to their political adversaries for gentlemen to assume and seek to maintain any such untenable and humiliating attitude. As history passes on, gentlemen will look back and be ashamed of their acts before the ink of their record shall have dried on the pages of their disgrace.

But I have just said that the Democrats of the South have howled and are still howling against negro suffrage. I am willing to intimate that this, to some degree at least, may be an injustice. I am willing to say they are to some extent becoming reconciled to what they deem sealed and inevitable. I believe the southern Democrats would bow in the future to negro suffrage without a murmur if the same rule could be made uniform, and if they themselves could also be relieved from all disability and disqualification and placed upon a political equality with their former slaves. And, Mr. Speaker, without stopping to argue this question here, or that feature of it which relates directly to the disqualified white portion of the community and section in which I live, I would simply ask if it is deemed too much on the part of intelligent tax-payers, educated white men, who mainly support the Government, to expect or at least desire to be allowed as many and as much political rights and power as their former slaves? If it were in place I could here and now tell gentlemen—as I trust to be permitted to do so hereafter at a more proper time—that we shall never have the quiet and harmony which we ought to have until white men are accorded as many rights under the written law and the constitutional guarantees as are conceded to the black man. And I can say now and here, legitimately and appropriately, that until suffrage in this country is made uniform and is nationalized, we shall continue to have local strifes and sectional jealousies, which will tend more or less to mar that harmony of national unity which the proud and free citizen of a great and glorious Government should so much crave.

I fear, sir, there are in America, as there were once in Europe, and perhaps are still, Bourbons who neither forget nor learn anything. A prejudice becomes fastened to their souls, and it rankles and cankers in their hearts through life; and they persistently refuse to be taught anything more manly or less damning than a prejudice.

So far as the South is concerned I have said we feel that negro suffrage is irrevocably and irrepealably fastened upon us. It was not of our choice or of our asking; but we are not so sure but it will result in special good to us even in a sectional point of view, leaving entirely out of the count the question of national unity and national uniformity; for by its institution we shall be greatly increased in representation on this floor, a thing which I already see is much needed and "devoutly to be wished." And I appeal to northern gentlemen of all parties to harmonize on this issue and let us have a great country and a strong Government, with a uniformity of interest in the great leading question of franchise, and a sameness of honor and glory, without sectional prejudices or local animosities. We have tried a diversity of interest long enough, and the wounds thus opened need to be closed and healed, and the losses thus sustained should be at once gathered up and restored.

I trust, sir, and believe, this proposed amendment will be passed by Congress; and I believe it will be ratified by the necessary majority of the State Legislatures, and I believe much good to the country will result therefrom. The "negro question," I think, may then rest and cease to disturb the equilibrium of legislation and the unity of the nation. We want rest and peace, with brotherly kindness, and a sameness of interest, in a national sense at least, throughout the land. Then let us have uniform suffrage as an earnest of uniform and perpetual peace.

Extension of Boundaries.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. HOOPER, OF UTAH,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 25, 1869,

On the bill to extend the boundaries of the States of Nevada, Minnesota, and Nebraska, and the Territories of Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. Mr. Speaker, when it shall be in order I propose to offer the following amendment to the bill offered by Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, to extend the boundaries of the States of Nevada, Minnesota, and Nebraska, and the Territories of Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming, namely:

Strike out the first and fifth and so much of the sixth sections of the bill as relates to Utah Territory.

And on this amendment I propose to speak at this time.

Sir, in the interior of the North American continent, peopling the narrow valleys that lie between mountains from which the snows never disappear, exists a colony of this Republic, a hundred thousand strong, prospering marvelously in spite of rigors of climate and unfriendliness of soil, and distinguished by all the characteristics of the most thriving and moral American communities. This colony, planted some twenty years ago in a savage wilderness, remote from other civilized association, divided from either ocean by vast spaces of desert, was, like the kindred colonies of Massachusetts, of Maryland, and of the Carolinas, the offspring of religious persecution; a persecution which had not then the excuse since alleged, that the marriage institutions of the Mormons are antagonistic to the civilization of the age, for at that time the question of polygamy had not entered into the public discussion of their religious faith, but which was simply an outburst of the blind intolerance which has so often before driven the sincere disciples of a new religious faith from their homes, with the loss of property and good fame, and forced them to seek such asylum as God in his providence opened for their occupation. Three times before had these people founded a community and erected their altars to the Christians' God, whom they worshiped, though with forms somewhat different from those of the various sects which compose the visible church of this nation, yet relying on the Bible as the foundation of their faith; and each time they were pioneers in civilization and the useful arts, and like the Pilgrims in Massachusetts, the Catholics in Maryland, and the Huguenots in Carolina, had based their community on the foundations of religion and law, and introduced the habits of industry and the aids of mechanical invention.

The newspaper and the school were indigenous in their settlements. Nor, guided as were their movements by men born on American soil and reared in the fullest devotion to American institutions, and composed as they were, in great part, of immigrants escaped from the grinding despotism of European poverty, and inspired by fervent faith in our Government, did they ever fail in their fealty to the Republic nor exist a single hour without the overshadowing presence of the American flag. These are not mere rhetorical figures, but serious statements of fact, for which I personally vouch and which I am prepared uncontestedly to prove. This people, healthily grown now to the stature of a State, having subdued the hostile forces of nature in a region before considered a desert and filled the valleys of Utah with fertile farms, with successful manufactories, with workshops, with homes; having built up numerous cities and villages and constructed hundreds of miles of roads and telegraphs; having diffused the mountain streams over the barren plains, till all the fruits and grains of the temperate zone now flourish where only the sage-bush grew before; having established schools for all the children and built up a system of territorial government not inferior in practical excellence to any other in the land; having, as the last and crowning labor, accomplished the grading of between three and four hundred miles of the great railway whose center rests on Utah, while its extremities reach the older States—this people, with this record, stands arraigned as though these acts were crimes and its very existence an offense; and I, as its Representative, find myself compelled to assume an attitude of defense and ask the interposition of the just and reflecting members of this House between the citizens of the Territory of Utah and an act which confessedly threatens its very existence, and seeks again to make those citizens the victims of a persecution which they are justified in believing forever ended.

While I shall indulge in no undue severity of language in opposing a measure which must have its origin either in fanaticism or in motives still less excusable, and while I shall refrain from unkind allusion to the chief sponson of the bill, notwithstanding his want of personal courtesy and all common fairness in seeking to pass it in the absence of the Delegate representing the people whose interest in the measure is fourfold greater than that of any other constituency—I, whose stake in this issue is so great, must be pardoned for some intensity of feeling when I reflect upon its nature. If, indeed, it were possible, as I hopefully believe it is not, by destroying the autonomy of Utah and partitioning out its settlements among neighboring Territories and States whose capitals are remote and the exercise of whose authority over them must of necessity be feeble—if it were possible to exasperate this people to the point of resistance to law, and thus invite the fearful calamities of civil strife, how infinitely more terrible would be the consequences than on any of the previous occasions when they have been smitten and scattered by the hand of violence. I am reminded of the description given by Colonel Kane, in a lecture delivered before the Historical Society of Philadelphia, of a scene which had been visited by a similar calamity, and I must be excused for quoting his words as a fragment of history full of warning against future dangers. He says:

"A few years ago, ascending the Upper Mississippi in the autumn, when its waters were low, I was compelled to travel by land past the region of the rapids. My road lay through the Half-Breed tract, a fine section of Iowa, which the unsettled state of its land titles had appropriated as a sanctuary for coiners, horse-thieves, and other outlaws. I had left my steamer at Keokuk, at the foot of the lower fall, to hire a carriage, and to contend for some fragments of a dirty meal with the swarming flies, the only scavengers of the locality. From this place to where the deep water of the river returns my eye wearied to see everywhere sordid vagabonds and idle settlers and the country marred, without being improved, by their careless hands.

"I was descending the last hillside upon my journey when a landscape in delightful contrast broke upon my view. Half encircled by a bend of the river a beautiful city lay glittering in the fresh morning sun; its bright new dwellings, set in cool, green gardens, ranging up around a stately dome-shaped hill, which was crowned by a noble marble edifice, whose high, tapering spire was radiant with white and gold. The city appeared to cover several miles, and beyond it, in the background, there rolled off a fair country, chequered by the careful lines of fruitful husbandry. The unmistakable marks of industry, enterprise, and educated wealth everywhere made the scene one of singular and most striking beauty.

"It was a natural impulse to visit this inviting region. I procured a skiff, and rowing across the river landed at the chief wharf of the city. No one met me there. I looked and saw no one. I could hear no one move, though the quiet everywhere was such that I heard the flies buzz and the water-ripples break against the shallow beach. I walked through the solitary streets. The town lay as in a dream, under some deadening spell of loneliness, from which I almost feared to wake it. For plainly it had not slept long. There was no grass growing up in the paved ways; rains had not entirely washed away the prints of dusty footsteps.

"Yet I went about unchecked. I went into empty workshops, rope-walks, and smithies. The spinner's wheel was idle; the carpenter had gone from his work-bench and shavings, his unfinished sash and casing. Fresh bark was in the tanner's vat, and the fresh-chopped lightwood stood piled against the baker's oven. The blacksmith's shop was cold; but his coal-heap and lading-pool and crooked water-horn were all there, as if he had just gone off for a holiday. No work people anywhere looked to know my errand. If I went into the gardens, clinking the wicket-latch loudly after me, to pull the marigolds, hearts-ease and lady-slippers, and draw a drink with the water-sodden lead-bucket and its noisy chain, or knocking off with my stick the tall, heavy-headed dahlias and sunflowers, hunted over the beds for cucumbers and love-apples, no one called out to me from any opened window or dog sprang forward to bark an alarm. I could have supposed the people hidden in the houses; but the doors were unfastened, and when at last I timidly entered them I found dead ashes white upon the hearths, and had to tread a tiptoe, as if walking down the aisle of a country church, to avoid rousing irreverent echoes from the naked floor.

"On the outskirts of the town was the city graveyard. But there was no record of plague there, nor did it in anywise differ much from other Protestant American cemeteries. Some of the mounds were not long sodded; some of the stones were newly set, their dates recent; and their black inscriptions glossy in the mason's hardly dried lettering ink. Beyond the graveyard, out in the fields, I saw in one spot hard by, where the fruited boughs of a young orchard had been roughly torn down, the still smoldering embers of a barbecue fire that had been constructed of rails from the fencing round it. It was the latest sign of life there. Fields upon fields of heavy-headed yellow grain lay rotting ungathered upon the ground. No one was at hand to take their rich harvest. As far as the eye could reach they stretched away—they sleeping, too, in the hazy air of autumn. Only two portions of the city seemed to suggest the import of the mysterious solitude. On the southern suburb the houses looking out upon the country showed by their splintered woodwork and walls battered to the foundation that they had lately been the mark of a destructive cannonade; and in and around the splendid temple, which had been the chief object of my admiration, armed men were barracked, surrounded by their stacks of musketry and pieces of heavy ordnance. These challenged me to render an account of myself, and why I had had the temerity to cross the water without a written permit from a leader of their band.

"Though these men were generally more or less under the influence of ardent spirits, after I had explained myself as a passing stranger they seemed anxious to gain my good opinion. They told me the story of the dead city; that it had been a notable manufacturing and commercial market, sheltering over twenty thousand persons; that they had waged war with its inhabitants for several years, and had been finally successful only a few days before my visit in an action fought in front of the ruined suburb; after which they had driven them forth at the point of the sword. The defense, they said, had been obstinate, but gave way on the third day's bombardment. They boasted greatly of their prowess, especially in the battle, as they called it; but I discovered they were not of one mind as to certain of the exploits that had distinguished it; one of which as I remember was that they had slain a father and his son, a boy of fifteen, not long residents of the fated city, whom they admitted to have borne a character without reproach.

"They also conducted me inside the massive sculptured walls of the curious temple, in which they said the banished inhabitants were accustomed to celebrate the mystic rites of an unhallowed worship. They particularly pointed out to me certain features of the building which, having been the peculiar objects of a former superstitious regard, they had as a matter of duty sedulously defiled and doctored. The reputed sites of certain shrines they had thus particularly noticed, and various sheltered chambers, in one of which was a deep well, constructed they believed with a dreadful design. Beside these, they led me to see a large and deep chiseled marble vase or basin, supported upon twelve oxen, also of marble, and of the size of life, of which they told some romantic stories. They said, the deluded persons, most of whom were immigrants from a great distance, believed their deity countenanced their reception here of a baptism of regeneration, as proxies for whomsoever they held in warm affection in the countries from which they had come; that here parents 'went into the water' for their lost children, children for their parents, widows for their spouses, and young persons for their lovers; that thus the great vase came to be for them associated with all dear and distant memories, and was therefore the object, of all others in the building, to which they attached the greatest degree of idolatrous affection. On this account, the victors had so diligently decorated it, as to render the apartment in which it was contained, too noisome to abide in.

"They permitted me also to ascend into the steeple, to see where it had been lightning-struck on the Sabbath before, and to look out, east and south, on wasted farms like those I had seen near the city extending till they were lost in the distance. Here, in the face of the pure day, close to the scar of Divine wrath left by the thunderbolt, were fragments of food, with a bass drum and a steamboat signal-bell, of which I afterward learned the use with pain.

"It was after nightfall, when I was ready to cross the river on my return. The wind had freshened since the sunset, and the water beating roughly into my little boat, I headed higher up the stream than the point I had left in the morning, and landed where a faint glimmering light invited me to steer.

"Here, among the dock and rushes, sheltered only by the darkness, without roof between them and the sky, I came upon a crowd of several hundred human creatures, whom my movements roused from uneasy slumber upon the ground.

"Passing these on my way to the light, I found it came from a tallow candle in a paper funnel-shade, such as is used by street vendors of apples and peanuts, and which, flaring and sputtering away in the bleak air of the water, shone flickeringly on the emaciated features of a man in the last stage of a bilious remittent fever. They had done their best for him. Over his head was something like a tent made of a sheet or two, and he rested on a but partially ripped-up old straw mattress, with a hair sofa-cushion under his head for a pillow. His gaping jaw and glazing eye told how short a time he would monopolize these luxuries; though a seemingly bewildered and excited person, who might have been his wife, seemed to find hope in occasionally forcing him to swallow awkwardly measured sips of the tepid river water from a burned and battered bitter-smelling tin coffee-pot. Those who knew better had furnished the apothecary he needed—a toothless old bald-head, whose manner had the repulsive dullness of a familiar with such scenes. He, so long as I remained, mumbled in his patient's ear a monotonous and melancholy prayer, between the pauses of which I heard the hiccup and sobbing of two little girls, who were sitting up on a piece of drift-wood outside.

"Dreadful indeed was the suffering of these forsaken beings. Cowed and cramped by cold and sunburn alternating as each weary day and night dragged on, they were almost all of them the crippled victims of disease. They were there because they had no home, nor hospital nor poor-house nor friends to offer them any. They could not satisfy the feeble cravings of their sick; they had not bread to quiet the fractious hunger-cries of their children. Mothers and babes, daughters and grandparents, all of them alike, were bivouacked in tatters, wanting even covering to comfort those whom the sick shiver of fever was searching to the marrow.

"These were Mormons, famishing in Lee county, Iowa, in the fourth week of the month of September, in the year of our Lord 1846. The city—it was Nauvoo, Illinois—the Mormons were the owners of that city, and the smiling country round; and those who had stopped their plows, who had silenced their hammers, their axes, their shuttles and their workshop wheels; those who had put out their fires, who had eaten their food, spoiled their orchard and trampled under foot their thousands of acres of unharvested bread; these were the keepers of their dwellings, the carousers in their temple whose drunken riot insulted the ears of their dying.

"I think it was as I turned from the wretched night watch of which I have spoken that I first listened to the sounds of revel of a party of the guard within the city. Above the distant hum of the voices of many occasionally arose distinct the loud, oft-tainted exclamation, and the falsely intoned sorap of vulgar song; but lest this requiem should go unheeded, every now and then, when their boisterous orgies strove to attain a sort of ecstatic climax, a cruel spirit of insulting frolic carried some of them up into the high belfry of the temple steeple, and there with the wicked childishness of inebriate they whooped, and shrieked, and beat the drum that I had seen, and rang in charivariic unison their loud-tongued steamboat bell.

"They were all told not more than six hundred and forty persons who were thus lying on the river flats. But the Mormons in Nauvoo and its dependencies had been numbered the year before at over twenty thousand. Where were they? They had last been seen carrying in mournful trails their sick and wounded, halt and blind, to disappear behind the western horizon, pursuing the phantom of another home. Hardly anything else was known of them; and people asked with curiosity what had been their fate—what their fortunes?"

But I trust, sir, that any apprehensions of such evils may not be prophetic. I trust so because I know the deep-seated respect of the Mormons for the forms of law, and because I cannot for a moment believe that while the wounds inflicted in the late national struggle are still unhealed, and while amnesty and conciliation are the watchwords of all parties, and while all men are inspired by a generous emulation to excel in works of charity and forgiveness and to inaugurate a lasting reign of peace; I cannot believe, I say, that under these circumstances a majority of the people's Representatives will deliberately so outrage the feelings and violate the rights of the citizens of Utah as to enact against them measures as despotic as those which within our recollection gained for Poland the sympathies and drew down on her oppressors the execration of the whole unprejudiced portion of the civilized world.

I trust, sir, that no member of this House will vote on this bill without a careful examination of its provisions and of the changes which it meditates on the map of the region affected. The boundaries of Utah, as will be seen at a glance, are already those indicated by nature as fitted to divide adjoining States, and its limits are much less than those of any other Territory. Its form is nearly square, and the geographical centre is made conformable to the probable centre of population. But this bill so cuts and mangles the Territory as to diminish its size to the point of insignificance and to shear it of its fair proportions and utterly destroy its symmetry. As though in very mockery of the wishes of its inhabitants it is sought to reduce it to a narrow strip of country running north and south, containing only about twenty-two thousand square miles, and even cutting off from its northern frontier all the settlements nearest to the Pacific railroad; thus preventing that great thoroughfare for which the citizens of Utah have so ardently longed and which they have so cordially welcomed and have so gladly assisted to build from even touching the Territory within which it is intended to confine them! Are gentlemen afraid to allow a direct contact between their own civilization and that of Utah that they should thus seek to build up artificial boundaries between the two and confine the latter within a Chinese wall of territorial limits? Were the question of Mormonism not involved, or some other appealing equally to special prejudice, I do not hesitate to say that a map thus disfigured with mutilations would not for a moment be contemplated with favor. Will the members of this House allow this prejudice so to overcome their judgment and sense of justice as to blind them to the enormity of the proposed change? I do not believe it.

Moreover, to accomplish the end in view the boundaries of three States and four Territories are also to be changed, and one Territory is to be blotted from existence; in fact it is as though a legislative earthquake had prevailed upon the map and so transposed the parts that each could scarcely identify any longer that which formerly belonged to it. The States of Nebraska and Minnesota, already containing the one sixty thousand square miles and the other fifty thousand square miles, are each to be nearly doubled in size; while Nevada, containing one hundred and eight thousand square miles, is given some twenty-two thousand square miles now belonging to Utah and containing some ten thousand of its people. An even larger amount of population is to be transferred to Wyoming, a Territory now without local government and nearly destitute of inhabitants except the transient settlers drawn there by the work on the railroad; while a generous slice is appropriated to Colorado, though six hundred miles from its capital and all practical local government. But the authors of the bill hope, it is said, to gain some votes for the measure by reason of this wholesale mutilation, to make which legal the consent of three State Legislatures must be obtained beside that of Congress. By giving to the States of Nevada and Minnesota and Nebraska additional territory it is claimed that the Representatives of those States on this floor will be brought to sustain the bill. This may be so, sir; were those States now small in size I could understand the temptation on the part of their Representatives to plead local interest in extenuation of an act violative of real justice; and particularly in the case of that State which, lying contiguous to Utah, would absorb a large portion of its industrious population to assist in paying the taxes already so onerously bearing on her citizens. But if these gentlemen are at present swayed by an argument of self-interest like this it cannot be that they have reflected on the great injustice inflicted on the people thus expatriated; for while Utah, by industry and economy has thus far escaped all territorial indebtedness, the citizens thus forcibly transferred—sold like serfs with the soil they till—would be made responsible for obligations they never incurred, and in fact compelled to pay the debts contracted by their neighbors. Surely no man's sense of right can be so blunted as to permit his approval of a wrong like this.

No; the end sought by this measure is not the promotion of justice nor the benefit of the region affected. It is the destruction of an obnoxious system of religious faith through the temporal ruin of its disciples. That it would result as intended of course I do not believe; for all the persecutions of the Mormons thus far have eventuated in the increase of their prosperity. It is true still, as it ever has been, that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. But if it were possible thus to extinguish Mormonism in the United States it could only be done by the expatriation of the entire people. Similar things have been done in other ages and lands, it is true, but at what fearful cost? A hundred thousand of the citizens of France were destroyed and expelled during the great religious contests of that country in a single century; and the result was the emigration of the best of her scholars and artisans to Holland and Britain and America, and the ingrafting upon the learning and industry of those countries and the rapid growth under the influence of free institutions of those sciences and useful arts that have contributed so greatly to their glory and prosperity. But can such a thing, in this age of enlightenment, occur in free and tolerant America? Can this Republic institute oppressive measures against her own citizens for the purpose of driving them weeping from her soil? Is it possible that she can be so indifferent to the growth of new States, to the increase of population, to the production of material wealth, as deliberately to wage war on a whole community like that of Utah, which has so triumphantly demonstrated its power of self-support and self-government? I am confident, sir, that this cannot be; and in order that the people of the country and their Representatives may not be ignorant of the true character and history of the people against whose prosperity the measure is directed I must be pardoned for a rapid review of their past record and their present condition.

At the early history of the Mormons I shall but glance. Their expulsion from Missouri and from Illinois will in after times constitute one of the darkest, the most painful, and most shameful chapters in American history. Long before a suspicion existed of their practice of polygamy they were driven from State to State by the bigotry and avarice of their neighbors, who impiously coveted their valuable improvements while their piety could not tolerate a difference in religious faith. I trust there is no such feeling in the land to-day. And everywhere as this persecuted people in search of freedom of conscience planted colony after colony on the frontiers of civilization did they establish monuments of their industry and intelligence which were the wonder of all beholders. In Missouri they introduced implements of culture and mills for grinding grain and laid the corner-stone, which still remains, of a temple to be reared for the worship of the ever-living God. Their industrial achievements in Illinois are well known; and not even mob violence and the ravages of time and the elements have been able yet to obliterate the evidences of their industry and skill. After the bloody extinction of their hopes in that State they turned their faces again westward, resolved, like the Israelites of old, to dare even the terrors of the unexplored wilderness and the tender mercies of the beasts of prey rather than longer trust to the charity and justice of their fellow-Christians.

With this stern resolve they crossed partially-settled Iowa in 1846. Being scantily clad and but poorly provisioned, many perished by the way. The close of the autumn found them encamped upon the banks of the Missouri, in what was then called the Pottawatomie country. Here they wintered, laying out the town now known as Council Bluffs. In the spring of 1847, when preparing to send forward their pioneers to seek out a home and a route thereto, the United States Government called upon the Mormons for a battalion of five hundred men to aid in vindicating its honor in the conflict with Mexico. In spite of the sacrifice involved in a compliance with this call there was no hesitation in the response, and the men promptly volunteered. They made the march across the continent under the command of Colonel Philip St. George Cooke, and were honorably discharged in southern California the following year. The congratulatory order of Colonel Cooke is full of the most unqualified testimony to their patriotism, subordination, endurance, and general good conduct, and I invite its perusal by all who still credit the injurious calumnies with which we have been assailed:

HEADQUARTERS MORMON BATTALION,
MISSION OF SAN DIEGO, January 30, 1847.
The lieutenant colonel commanding congratulates the battalion on their safe arrival on the shore of the Pacific ocean and the conclusion of its march of over two thousand miles. History may be searched in vain for an equal march of infantry. Nine tenths of it has been through a wilderness where nothing but savages and wild beasts are found, or deserts where, for want of water, there is no living creature. There with almost hopeless labor we have dug deep wells, which the future traveler will enjoy. Without a guide who had traversed them we have ventured into trackless prairies where water was not found for several marches. With crowbar and pick and ax in hand, we have worked our way over mountains which seemed to defy aught save the wild goat, and hewed a passage through a chasm of living rock more narrow than our wagons. To bring these first wagons to the Pacific we have preserved the strength of the mules by herding them over large tracts, which you have laboriously guarded without loss. The garrisons of four presidios of Sonora concentrated within the walls of Tucson gave us no peace. We drove them out with their artillery; but our intercourse with the citizens was unmarked by a single act of injustice. Thus marching, half naked and half fed, and living upon wild animals, we have discovered and made a road of great value to our country.

Arrived at the first settlement of California, after a single day's rest you cheerfully turned off from the route to this point of promised repose to enter upon a campaign and meet, as we believe, the approach of the enemy; and this, too, without even salt to season your sole subsistence of fresh meat.

Lieutenant A. D. Smith and George Stoneman, of the first dragoons, have shared and given you valuable aid in all these labors.

Thus, volunteers, you have exhibited some high and essential qualities of veterans. But much remains undone. Soon you will turn your strict attention to the drill, to system and order, to forms also, which are all necessary to the soldier.

By order of Lieutenant Colonel P. St. George Cooke:
P. C. MERRILL, Adjutant.

Returning eastward these men found their families in the great basin of the Salt lake. The advance-guard of the Mormon emigration reached Salt Lake valley on July 24, 1847, selected the present site of Salt Lake City, built a fort of some strength as a protection against the Indians, and planted some root crops, a portion of which partially matured. A few of these pioneers under the lead of President Young returned to the Missouri river the same fall, leaving the majority to plow and plant during the following season. Their subsistence through the entire winter was in part a root growing wild and pointed out by the Indians as capable of supporting life. The few cereals and roots brought with them were saved for planting, for such were the difficulties of transportation through the eleven hundred miles of mountains and deserts they traversed that it was with the greatest difficulty they could bring the necessary implements and grains and roots for seed. No white man save Colonel James Bridger, a trapper at Fort Bridger, and a mountaineer named Goodyear, was found in the region, consequently the Mormon pioneers were undisputed masters of the country, with no neighbors except the wild and degraded Utah and Shoshone Indians, whose friendship was courted for the sake of peace and has always been retained through a policy of liberality and justice. The opinion of Colonel Bridger was expressed that it was impossible to raise grain in that region and that immigration to the "great basin" would be followed by starvation. Nevertheless, trusting in the Providence of God and remembering the persecutions of man, the community resolved to dare the alternative.

When the bulk of the immigration reached the valley in 1848 they found that much had been raised for their support, besides a large percentage preserved for seed. Rations of bread were issued and used, and the people were again in a condition of comparative safety and comfort. The march of 1848, as may be supposed, was attended with great hardships. The immigrants were deficient in transportation, and suffered from a scarcity of provisions and the severe toils of the journey. Great mortality resulted from disease, old age, and other causes, and it was said that the trail of the Mormons could be followed in 1849 by the graves of the dead they had left on their route. Yet it is worthy of note that during that pilgrimage of four months' duration neither the spinning-wheel nor the loom ceased to do its work, the large wagon and the slow step of the ox giving an opportunity for labor while the train was in motion. There are now in Utah hundreds of yards of goods for which the material was spun and which were woven during that journey. Every means was utilized to the utmost; even the faithful cow gave her strength in the yoke, and furnished milk at night for the sustenance of the children she had drawn during the day.

Such, sir, are some of the incidents connected with the planting of this colony which is now sought to be legislated out of existence. The calumnies charging the Mormons with idleness, immorality, and disloyalty are all refuted by the facts of history. The first printing-press ever taken west of the Missouri river was established by them at Independence in 1832. The first newspaper in the great basin of the Salt lake, where now there are three, and I believe the first in San Francisco, were published by the Mormons. The first United States flag unfurled in the great interior, save by Government officials, was raised by Mormons. Well do I know the spot where the first "liberty pole" was raised, and from the top of which floated the stars and stripes, while yet the country was known as Mexican territory. In obedience to Mormon love of law and order and of the institutions of our country one of their first acts after reaching their new home was to meet in convention and form a local government and send a Delegate over three thousand miles to Washington, and ask the parent Government to extend her protecting care over them.*

In regard to the Christian temper of the Mormons during the infancy of this colony there is also indisputable evidence. The year 1849 blessed the new settlement with an abundant harvest, amply sufficient, with strict economy, for its wants, besides something to spare to the many California immigrants who crowded the plains during that season in their march to the Pacific shores and whose lack of experience had caused much sickness and great loss of stock. Multitudes fell by the way-side, and many of those who succeeded in reaching "the great half-way house," as they styled Salt Lake City, were sadly in need of rest, medical treatment, and good nursing. The ill-health of many forced them to remain there for a time, and numerous lives were saved by the careful watching and tender nursing of some good old mother by the bed-side of the suffering stranger. For several years Salt Lake City was more or less a hospital for emigrants during the fall and winter seasons from disease and accidents incident to a long journey. When the strangers became rested and were able to proceed they exchanged their broken-down stock for fresh animals, recruited their supply of breadstuffs, and having improved their health by a free use of vegetables, went on their way rejoicing. Captain Stansbury, who spent a year among the Mormons while engaged on the Government survey of the Great Salt lake in 1849-50, in his report gives the following frank testimony to the character and dealings of the people:

"In their dealings with the crowds of emigrants that passed through their city the Mormons were fair and upright, taking no advantage of the necessitous condition of many if not most of them. They sold them such provisions as they could spare at moderate prices, and such as they themselves paid in their dealings with each other. In the whole of our intercourse with them, which lasted rather more than a year, I cannot refer to a single instance of fraud or extortion to which any of the party was subjected; and I strongly incline to the opinion that the charges that have been preferred against them in this respect arose either from interested misrepresentation or erroneous information. I certainly never experienced anything like it in my own case, nor did I witness or hear of any instance of it in the case of others while I resided among them. Too many that passed through their settlement were disposed to disregard their claim to the land they occupied, to ridicule the municipal regulations of their city, and to trespass wantonly upon their rights. Such offenders were promptly arrested by the authorities, made to pay a severe fine, and in some instances were imprisoned or made to labor on the public works; a punishment richly merited and which would have been inflicted upon them in any civilized community. In short, these people presented the appearance of a quiet, orderly, industrious, and well-organized society, as much so as one would meet with in any city of the Union, having the rights of personal property as perfectly defined and as religiously respected as with ourselves; nothing being farther from their faith or practice than the spirit of communism, which has been most erroneously supposed to prevail among them. The main peculiarity of the people consists in their religious tenets, the form and extent of their church government, (which is a theocracy,) and in the nature especially of their domestic relations."

A few words of evidence may not be amiss in regard to the orderly character of the Mormons and their capacity for self-government, especially when the witness is one suspected of no partiality for the people whom he describes. Lieutenant Gunnison, speaking of the same period, says:

"We found them in 1849 organized into a State with all the order of legislative, judicial, and executive officers regularly filled under a constitution eminently republican in sentiment and tolerant in religion; and though the authority of Congress has not yet sanctioned this form of government, presented and petitioned for, they proceed with all the routine of an organized self-governing people under the title of a Territory, they being satisfied to abide their time in accessions of strength by numbers, when they may be deemed fit to take a sovereign position, being contented so long as allowed to enjoy the substance under the shadow of a name. They levy and collect taxes, raise and equip troops for protection in full sovereignty on the soil they helped to conquer first and subdue to use afterward."

Gunnison also adds his testimony to that of others in regard to the fair dealing of the people, and says that food "was sold to the gold emigrants at a less price than at Fort Laramie, four hundred miles nearer to the States."

The progress of the colony was what you might expect from such a beginning. In 1850 there was not a shingle roof in Salt Lake City, now containing nearly twenty thousand inhabitants, with splendid churches, theaters, dwellings, and business houses. It is a remarkable fact, too, that most of the fortunes which were realized in Utah in mercantile pursuits previous to 1863 were made by those who were not Mormons; while I have never known of a farm being opened, a mill built, and scarcely a house erected by any but those of that faith. Thus it is shown that to the Mormons belongs the credit of redeeming from the complete sterility in which they found it the now magnificent valleys of Salt Lake. The population other than Mormon has never, in my opinion, exceeded two and a half per cent of the whole. The fact that a very large proportion of our people are of foreign birth is one that should give us favor in the eyes of the Government. We have expended over $5,000,000 in the promotion of immigration from foreign lands. While many of the States operate special machinery at considerable expense for the purpose of bringing foreign immigration within their limits, the whole country is sensitively alive to the importance of this means of increasing its power. With an immense area of virgin soil and all our wonderful resources, nothing is so essential to the nation as abundant labor. Now, the Mormons have not only materially swelled the aggregate of immigration, but they have created a system of management which is already famous for its excellence, and has attracted the attention of the British Government and caused the examination of our agent in England by a parliamentary commission, in order to learn the means by which we have so successfully transported our tens of thousands from the one continent to the other. Verily, a prophet is not without honor save in his own country.

I have alluded to the Indian policy of the Mormons and its excellent effect; and as the Indian question has become one which excites the anxiety of the whole country I must be pardoned for pointing with justifiable pride to results which show the wisdom of their leaders in this respect to be far in excess practically of that of our neighbors. We have acted on the principle that it is cheaper to feed these savages than to fight them; and the Indians have permitted the passage of the Mormon trains without the loss of a life or of a dollar's worth of goods. The first loss ever sustained was of property on the railroad since its construction. Compared with the Indian troubles of other sections those of Utah have been trivial. The whole expenditure of the United States on account of Indian wars there has been but $75,000, while millions on millions have been spent all about us without accomplishing any durable peace. These expenses too would have been much greater but for the supplies of food and forage drawn from our settlements at nominal prices.

Another material advantage derived by the country at large from the existence of our colony is the great assistance it has rendered in the settlement of the surrounding region. It will need no detailed statement to convince gentlemen of the immense aid rendered by such a colony in such a wilderness to the peopling of the adjacent Territories and to the success of enterprises like the overland mail, the telegraph, and the Pacific railroad. It is not too much to say that had the colony of Utah had no existence these enterprises must of necessity have been retarded for years longer, and might even yet be only dreams of the future.

And yet, notwithstanding our value to the country, it has always been a matter of extreme difficulty to obtain the ordinary legislation needed to protect our industry and property. It is only within a year that we have been able to secure an extension of the public land system over our Territory, a delay which has prevented us from availing ourselves of the liberal preemption and homestead laws enjoyed in the States and other Territories. We have borne these harsh and unjust discriminations with patience; but they deepen our disappointment at the attempts now made to impose upon us still greater hardships.

It is proper that I should now allude to the accusation that the people of Utah do not sufficiently honor the courts of justice. This statement is the exact reverse of truth. A well-regulated and impartial judiciary is regarded as the very foundation of civil government, and Utah has her system of territorial courts as well as those of the General Government. The error may have grown out of the fact that Mormons, in the settlement of disputes, prefer arbitration to litigation as being quicker and cheaper. The courts, however, are always open to those who prefer suits at law, and the judgments of these courts are respected and enforced. That Utah contains some bad men

* Extract from a discourse delivered by Daniel H. Wells, one of the prominent dignitaries of the Mormon church, on the occasion of the fourth anniversary of the entrance of the Mormons into the valley of the Great Salt lake:

"It has been thought by some that this people, abused, maltreated, insulted, robbed, plundered, murdered, and finally disfranchised and expatriated, would naturally feel reluctant to again unite their destiny with the American Republic."

"No wonder that it was thought by some that we would not again submit ourselves (even while we were yet scorned and ridiculed) to return to our allegiance to our country. Remember that it was by the act of our native country, not ours, that we were expatriated, and then consider the opportunity we had of forming other ties. Let this pass while we lift the veil and show the policy which dictated us. That country, that Constitution, those institutions were all ours; they are still ours. Our fathers were heroes of the Revolution. Under the master-spirit of an Adams, a Jefferson, and a Washington, they declared and maintained their independence, and under the guidance of the spirit of truth they fulfilled their mission whereto they were sent from the presence of the Father. Because demagogues have arisen and seized the reins of power should we relinquish our interest in that country made dear to us by every tie of association and consanguinity?"

"Those who have indulged such sentiments concerning us have not read Mormonism aright, for never, no, never, will we desert our country's cause; never will we be found arrayed by the side of her enemies, although she herself may cherish them in her own bosom. Although she may launch both the thunderbolts of war which may return and spend their fury upon her own head, never, no, never, will we permit the weakness of human nature to triumph over our love of country, our devotion to her institutions handed down to us by her honored sires, made dear by a thousand tender recollections."

is unquestionably true; with our frontiers it can scarcely be expected of us to exclude all such. Yet there is no more justice in holding the citizens of Utah responsible for the acts of vicious individuals among them than there would be on the part of the Mormons in charging the whole people of the United States with the wrongs perpetrated upon them in Missouri and Illinois, or than there would be on the part of the civilized world in charging upon the citizens of this District the untimely taking off of the late Chief Magistrate. Nor can it be justly made an extraordinary offense if some shall have assumed the cloak of religion for evil purposes. When you will point us to a Territory where there is no hypocrisy or crime we will acknowledge our responsibility for this imperfection. Let him among you who is without sin cast the first stone.

But the important influence on the country of Mormon enterprise has not been confined to Utah. It may not be known to all who listen to me to-day that the disciples of its faith have borne a leading part in the settlement and improvement of other portions. The first discovery of gold in California in 1847-8, which excited the whole civilized world and precipitated upon the Pacific coast that avalanche of immigration which transformed a semi-wilderness into proud and populous States and carried the frontier of American settlements to the very ocean was made by a portion of the Mormon battalion of Colonel Cooke after their discharge from service. The first mint for coining that treasure into a circulating currency was erected in Utah for the convenience of her people, and that coinage is now sought for as a curiosity by persons from all portions of the globe. The first American immigrants who entered the harbor of Yerba-Buena, now San Francisco, came on the Mormon ship Brooklyn, bringing with them a printing press and library, thus founding the literature of the State, and introducing many improvements in the building of mills and other important enterprises. The first brick ever burned in California were the work of a Mormon.

And now, sir, having recounted some of the difficulties under which the Territory of Utah was settled it becomes my pleasing duty to epitomize the chief features of its present condition. I could refer you to numerous narratives of disinterested travelers—to the works of Burton, of Bowles, of Greeley, of Richardson, of Hepworth Dixon—for full details; but shall content myself, in view of my limited time, with a brief recapitulation. The stranger visiting Utah to-day will find not only a railway reaching to within fifty miles of its chief city, but good wagon-roads, many of them constructed with great labor, extending in all directions, and lines of magnetic telegraph aggregating over five hundred miles in length, and the work entirely of Mormon industry and capital. He will see over one thousand miles of canals, bringing the mountain streams into contact with the fields which it is their mission to fertilize; and can then better understand how it is that a population superior in numbers to that of some of the States is supported in comfort, including one hundred villages and thirty incorporate cities. Inquiry will instruct him that not only is the Territory free from debt, but that the local, county, and other scrip is so limited in amount and so promptly paid as to be on a par in value with the legal-tender currency of the United States. If a foreigner—a native, perchance, of any of those European countries from the humblest classes of which a large percentage of the citizens of Utah have been drawn—he will be amazed to know that seventy-five per cent. of the families of the Territory are sheltered by their own roofs and owners of the homes which they have created and which year by year increase the comforts which reward their industry and their frugality. He will see more than this, a population comprising one hundred thousand souls, and not one adult of either sex among them who is not able to read and write his native language intelligibly.

To-day the material improvements of Utah exceed those of any other Territory in the Union. She has one hundred and fifty grist and saw-mills, three cotton and four woolen factories, and twenty-five tanneries, with numerous manufactories of shoes, hats, wagons, furniture, nails, and kindred branches of the mechanic arts. A hundred and twenty school-houses supply her eighteen thousand children with the opportunity for elementary instruction, and a hundred churches furnish the people with the means of congregational worship. Her vineyards and orchards are already providing fruit in abundance and of superior excellence; her fields produce the needful grains and roots, and even indigo and madder for domestic use. Her woolen mills draw their supplies from the flocks which whiten her hillsides, and her cotton mills owe their existence to the fields of cotton whose bursting bolls mimic the snows that glitter on the neighboring hills. The silk-worm is spinning for her people its shining thread. In the cities enterprise and skill have emulated the architectural achievements of older communities; cottages embowered in vines, fine dwellings and offices, spacious warehouses and elegant theaters, attest the intelligence and taste of the people. The foundations of the great temple now being erected in Salt Lake City may well excite surprise and admiration. In the tabernacle, capable of seating ten thousand souls, there is now being constructed by her own artisans, and almost entirely of domestic materials, the largest organ in America. These, sir, are some of the material evidences that go to refute all that has been uttered against Mormon thrift and intelligence.*

But, sir, the argument already becomes stale, for it is now patent to the world that the people of Utah are among the most thrifty of those which compose our common country. This crusade is directed against the Mormons as a sect. But what has become of the boasted tolerance of the age, and especially of the United States, which concedes to each individual and each congregation the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. It is said by some that the Mormons are fanatics, and by others that they are hypocrites. Even the Archangel Michael, when he strove with Satan, durst not bring against him a railing accusation; and the highest Christian authority has said, "Judge not, that ye be not judged." Of the sincerity of the Mormons it would seem that there could be no ground for doubt. Their unparalleled sufferings and surrender on various occasions of their sole possessions and even life itself rather than forsake their faith should close the lips of their slan-

*"How have these settlers in the wilderness done the things we see?"

"Simply, answers Young, by the power of work and faith; by doing what they profess, by believing what they say."

"Nearly all the forces which are found most powerful to sway men's minds in our lay societies—genius, reputation, office, birth, and riches—have been wanting in these Saints. No man of the stamp of Luther, Calvin, Wesley, has appeared among them. In intellect Joseph was below contempt. Brigham is a man of keen good sense. Pratt is a dreamer. Kimball is unlettered. Wells, Cannon, Taylor, Hooper—the brightest men among them—have shown no worldly gifts, no scholarship, eloquence, poetry, and logic, to account for such sudden and sustained success as they have met with in every land."

"The bee has been chosen by the Saints as an emblem of Desert, though nature has all but denied that insect to this dry and flowerless land. Young's house is called the 'Beehive'; in it no drone ever finds a place; for the prophet's wives are bound to support themselves by needle craft, teaching, spinning, dyeing yarn, and preserving fruit. Every woman in Salt Lake has her portion of work, each according to her gifts, every one steadfastly believing that labor is noble and holy; a sacrifice meet for man to make and for God to accept. Ladies make gloves and fans, dry peaches and figs, cut patterns, prepare seeds, weave linen, and knit hose."—Extract from New America, by William Hepworth Dixon.

derers in shame at such a charge. Well do I recollect, long before I cast my lot with the humble members of that church, an incident which deeply impressed me with the sincere faith of the people. My business led me to the levee of Nauvoo at the time of their expulsion; and when they were preparing for their departure they disposed of their clothing and their valuables to complete and decorate and furnish that magnificent temple to the living God which they believed themselves commissioned from on high to erect and consecrate. Not for themselves did they linger in that beleaguered city, nor with any hope of permanent resistance to the destroying mob, but because they were inspired by an enthusiastic sense of duty and a holy zeal more powerful than human impulse to complete the task assigned them by an invisible power, and to crown with order and symmetry the marvelous edifice.

And, sir, dark in contrast with this unselfish devotion to duty rises up before me the picture of the vandal violence that drove them from the sacred walls just as their work was finished and applied the incendiary torch to destroy the splendid structure. Nor, sir, would it be strange if a people so blessed amid persecution—so often protected from destruction and preserved amid dangers that threatened inevitable ruin—should become so intensified in their faith as to present to the irreligious an appearance of fanaticism. An extract from Gunnison happily illustrates one of these occasions. He says:

"During the following year, every month was so mild that they ploughed and sowed in each; but though the winter was auspicious and all things so favorable, they were so reduced in provisions as to eat the hides of the slaughtered animals and eagerly searched them out of the ditches and tore them from the roofs of the houses to boil them for the table, and they dug side by side with the miserable Utes for the wild roots used by them for food. But the most formidable animal they had to contend with as the crops were nearing maturity was the army of black, ungainly crickets—"a frightful bug," as a Liverpool sojourner called it when first he saw one, which, descending from the mountain sides, destroyed every green herb in their way. In vain did the sorrowful farmers surround their fields with trenches and fill them with water; the black host, leaping in, floated over and with wonderful instinct kept on their course of march, and, mounting up the wheat stalk, would cut off at the curve, which was bent by the weight of the fruit more precious than golden seeds. Whole families might be seen standing guard with branches and boards in their hands, uttering loud shouts and endeavoring to turn back and beat off the invaders. In some instances they succeeded in changing the direction of the march along the streams, and destroyed many in the waters; but it was only a partial relief on a few points of attack."

"But better defenders soon came to their aid. These were the most beautiful birds of the valley, the glossy white gulls, with bright red beaks and feet, dove-like in form and motion, with plumage of downy texture and softness. After the first molting of the crickets they came in flocks to feast on the banquet which was so bountifully spread for their reception. In early dawn they rose from the nesting islands of the great lake, and gliding through the air, gracefully alight on the smooth and gentle slopes at the last of the terraces at the mountain's base and feast the living day."

The same year to which I have before alluded, and soon after the expulsion of the Mormons from Nauvoo, while they were prosecuting their slow journey across the wilderness of Iowa, there occurred vast flights of quails in the same direction, lasting many weeks. These pilgrims have informed me that large quantities of these quails were slain, and furnished the famishing pilgrims with ample supplies of food, reminding them vividly of the provision made for the Israelites in the desert, and impressing them deeply with a conviction of miraculous protection. It would not be strange, sir, I repeat, if a people possessing such remarkable traditions and experiencing such unexampled preservation shall have become filled with a conscientious zeal, akin to the divine fervor of the early disciples of Christianity.*

*"I have spoken to you of a people whose industry had made them rich and gathered around them all the comforts and not a few of the luxuries of refined

HO. OF REPS.

But, sir, the charge of fanaticism is as groundless as any of the others which have been hurled recklessly against the Mormons. If they are firm in their own religious faith, it is because they believe it to be inspired of God; and if not so inspired, they desire to be convinced of the error of their doctrine. They invite contact with general society, and a practical comparison of institutions. If mistaken in their creed they desire the opportunity of conversion. It is not the Mormons, sir, who evade the test, if it can only be made without the hardships of persecution. They have welcomed every advance that reunites them to society; and the construction of the great railroad that brings them face to face with the other civilizations and religions of the Old and New Worlds has been looked forward to with intense longing, and its completion hailed with undisguised joy. And it is at this very moment, when the test of contact is on the very eve of application, that the advocates of this bill, assuming themselves to be the champions of Christianity and Republicanism, shrink like timid children from the encounter and seek to intrench themselves behind the flimsy ramparts of political boundaries which they hope to erect for their defense.

Abandoning all appeal to the cowardly, who are seldom generous, I turn to the courageous, who are strong in the conviction of their own moral power, and tell them that if Mormonism is a fatal heresy they owe it to its own deluded disciples to neglect none of the legitimate means of argument and practice for their conversion. If Mormonism is an error there is no community on the face of the globe and no class of people so vitally interested in its refutation as the majority of the people of Utah, who are its victims. Rather than curtail the proportions of the Territory and cut off its settlements from contact with the railroad you should seek to enlarge its area, encourage its population by all classes of good citizens, giving the amplest protection of law by substituting for its present organization a more ample, complete, and sovereign form of government, leaving the issue with God and the inevitable forces of nature. We expect the hostility of all the non-producing classes who seek to subsist on vices which we do not practice. It is natural that those who stand agape for Government plunder should foment trouble and seek to embroil us with the life; expelled by lawless force into the wilderness; seeking an untried home far away from the scenes which their previous life had endeared to them; moving onward, destitute, hunger-sickened, and sinking with disease; bearing along with them their wives and children, the aged and the poor and the decrepit; renewing daily on their march the offices of devotion, the ties of family and friendship and charity; sharing necessities and braving dangers together, cheerful in the midst of want and trial, and persevering until they triumphed. I have told or tried to tell you of men who, when menaced by famine and in the midst of pestilence with every energy taxed by the urgency of the hour, were building roads and bridges, laying out villages, and planting corn-lands for the stranger who might come after them, their kinsman only by a common humanity, and per- adventure, a common suffering—of men who have renewed their prosperity in the homes they have found in the desert, and who in their new-built city, walled round by mountains like a fortress, are extending pious hospitalities to the destitute emigrant from our frontier lines—of men who, far removed from the restraints of law, obeyed it from choice, or found in the recesses of their religion something not inconsistent with human laws, but far more controlling; and who are now soliciting from the Government of the United States, not indemnity, for the appeal would be hopeless, and they know it; not protection, for they have no need of it; but that identity of political institutions and that community of laws with the rest of us, which was confessedly their birthright when they were driven beyond our borders.

"I said I would give you the opinion I formed of the Mormons; you may deduce it for yourselves from these facts. But I will add that I have not yet heard the single charge against them as a community, against their habitual purity of life, their integrity of dealing, their toleration of religious differences in opinion, their regard for the laws, or their devotion to the constitutional Government under which we live, that I do not, from my own observation or the testimony of others, know to be unfounded."—Extract from Colonel Kane's address.

parent Government for the sake of the money they may make from contracts; but with a calm and just and intelligent spirit on the part of the people and their Representatives we are content to take all the risks of any contest in which we shall receive a guarantee of fair play.

But, sir, the confessed object of this bill is to entirely destroy the Territory of Utah and place its people, so far as possible, in the power of the hostile class that I believe are inspiring this action. It is admitted that if this bill shall pass the next movement will be to utterly abolish the territorial government. Once before has the State of Nevada—the foundation of which was laid at the base of the Sierra Nevadas by Mormon immigrants—taken a degree of territory from Utah with its people; now she seeks another, bringing her boundaries to the very threshold of its capital and within sight of its inhabitants; and the next step, as openly avowed, is to be final and absorb all the remainder. Thus the original object of the territorial organization, which was to give self-government to a homogeneous people and afford them the fullest guarantees of law, will be utterly destroyed. This, too, at a time when the good feeling prevailing among the people of Utah toward the rest of the country is so manifest to all eyes and so pleasing to all patriots and lovers of peace. Much of this good feeling, I am deeply gratified to state, is due to the recent impartial legislation and the kindness and courtesy which has uniformly been extended by this House to the Delegate to whom they have confided their interests on this floor. Is it possible that this policy is to be deliberately reversed and this budding confidence to be blasted by such an act of official injustice before it has an opportunity to blossom and bear fruit? Never will I credit an anomaly so foreign to the character of the American people, so hostile to the spirit of the age, so monstrous in its design, and so mischievous in its consequences, till I hear the vote counted and the result announced.

But, sir, let us for a moment contemplate the other alternative, and inquire what would eventuate from the success of this measure supposing such a success within the limits of possibility. Let us admit for a moment that this bill can become a law and the accumulated strength of its advocates be so increased as to enable them to complete their plans and sacrifice the small remnant left of the present territorial government. Let us imagine the people of Utah divided among States and Territories whose seats of government are remote and whose populations are measurably controlled by the adventurers who seek aggrandizement in rapid enterprises rather than by the slow and laborious processes of productive labor. Let us follow the machinations of these men till they have succeeded in securing so much of official control as will enable them to exasperate the temper of the Mormons by technical abuses so easy to practice, and till they have inspired the distant State authorities, already deeply imbued with prejudices, with a belief that these people are disloyal in spirit and criminal in act. Let us suppose the collisions which a temper like that which urges this bill will be sure to invite to actually take place, and the citizens to have been exasperated beyond the limits of forbearance, affording a pretext for such measures of force, both official and private, as shall render their peaceful residence in Utah impossible; imagine, if you will, the valleys of Utah again depopulated, and tell me where you are to find the immigrants who, uninspired by a peculiar religious faith and not bound together and controlled by a potential motive, will abandon the fertile prairies of the Missouri valley to cultivate those remote alkali lands, which can be made productive only by a costly and elaborate system of irrigation, and forsake the sunny climate of more favored regions for a land where the seasons are in fierce and perpetual conflict and the constant care and labor of man is needful to give the summer a hard-won triumph.

The Mormons, unlike the inhabitants of all the neighboring Territories and States, are an agricultural and manufacturing people; and it is for this reason that they have been able to subsist in Utah. Drive them away, sir, and a temporary succession of mining adventurers may occupy their place for a short time and in small number until starved into abandonment; but the region, with small exceptions, will again lapse into sterility and become the undisputed domain of wild animals and birds. Already the tide of general emigration from Europe is beginning to diminish; the reforms of governmental administration in Ireland and the unification of the German States threaten seriously to interfere with those great movements of the masses which have given to America so large a proportion of her effective population. Of those immigrants that come how many, think you, will pass by the fertile prairies to locate in those rugged valleys, or after arriving pause to dwell there, while the unparalleled farms of Oregon lie but a day's journey beyond? Sir, Utah is the proper heritage of men who are bound together by ties stronger than those of avarice, and whose operations are directed by a spirit of unity which no other class of our immigrants possesses.

I have thus endeavored to present to the members of this House the facts and principles involved in this issue, and to measure, with the best judgment I can command, the consequences awaiting their action on this bill. To which side the balance of justice inclines it seems to me that none can fail to discover. It is a maxim founded on the common principles of our religious beliefs that to do right is always expedient. That it is right to exercise the power of unfriendly legislation against a community such as I have shown that of Utah to be, the disinterested judgment of the world will surely deny. As to expediency, aside from justice, I cannot see how any difference of opinion can exist. Let the future be judged from the past, and no rash and cruel experiments be substituted for an established order of things that has produced the happiest results. With the speedy and complete restoration of the seceding States to the Union I trust in God that all internal differences may vanish, and peace again reign within our borders uninterrupted and profound. On the part of Utah I am ready to pledge a conflict of energies for the rapid development of the resources of the land and for a friendly emulation in all manner of good works. Let the contest between her and her neighbors be as to, which shall exhibit the most prosperous condition and most rapidly expand into a moral and enlightened State. To this contest, sir, we joyfully invite them; but from any less kindly we trust the good sense and good feeling of the Representatives of the nation will assist to protect us.

I feel that I do not appeal to them in vain when I ask that their potent and united voices may be lifted up to those who would disturb the elements of our prosperity and advancement in that language which, long ago uttered by Him who spake as never man spake, stilled the tempest and gave tranquility to the waves—

"Peace, be still!"

And in the kindred language of our great leader of to-day, so beautifully paraphrased recently upon this floor by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] "Let us have peace!" Let us have peace by an act of peace, so that the land which but yesterday was stained with fraternal blood may grow green and beautiful under the hand of honest toil. Let us have peace that we may perfect the holy temple of our liberties until it shall fill the whole earth with its glory and draw all nations into it. Let us have peace that by our sublime example we may teach the whole world of men how good and "how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Election Contest—Chaves vs. Clever.

SPEECH OF HON. C. P. CLEVER,
OF NEW MEXICO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1869.

The House having under consideration the New Mexico contested-election case—

Mr. CLEVER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I came here to meet a report not a speech. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETTIS] travels outside of the report and states facts which are not set forth in the report of the committee I think he does more than the Committee of Elections have authorized him to do. If he desires for one moment to connect me with any election frauds in New Mexico I will say that he or any one else who may believe any such thing is utterly mistaken. Sir, I was at the time of the election hundreds of miles away from the precincts to which the gentleman has alluded.

Mr. PETTIS. I disclaim any intention to impute to the gentleman any agency in those frauds.

Mr. CLEVER. I took it that the drift of the gentleman's remarks would leave such an impression upon the minds of members, and I have therefore taken the earliest opportunity to repel the charge.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to ventilate this report, and I have prepared some remarks which I propose to submit to the House. If there is any disposition to travel outside of the record in the case let that disposition be manifest. But, sir, I believe that honesty and justice prevail in this House and in this country, and that the mere trickery of one or two individuals in the Territory of New Mexico cannot defeat the claims of one who has been fairly elected a Delegate to this House.

Mr. Speaker, the report of the Committee of Elections now under consideration, in my humble opinion, is founded upon a misapprehension of the law which should govern in this case and the facts as disclosed by the evidence. To the members of the committee who agreed to this report I desire to say that while I radically differ with them as to the conclusion they have arrived at I do not desire to be understood as intending to question their motives or to be discourteous.

In my argument I shall follow the order of this report and discuss every point therein made separately. Should I misquote the evidence or appear to be unfair by garbling disconnected extracts I hope the gentlemen having this case in charge will call my attention thereto. I do not desire to mislead any one.

I cite from the report, first page. Contestant "among other things charges:

Tierra Amarilla.

That at the said election in the county of Rio Arriba, in precinct No. 13, commonly called Tierra Amarilla, only 68 votes were cast for the sitting member, and that none other were found or counted by the judges of the election after the polls were finally closed; but that after the said counting, and before the probate judge sent an abstract, with the poll-books of the said county, to the secretary of the Territory, a poll-book was falsely and fraudulently prepared, by which it was made to appear that the sitting Delegate received 452 votes, and that the said fraudulent excess of 384 votes were allowed the sitting Delegate in the count, that gave him a majority of 540 votes in the Territory at such election, and that they should not be withdrawn.

The committee are of opinion, from the testimony of Miera and Salazar, that the allegation of the contestant in this respect is sustained by the evidence in the case, and that 384 votes erroneously allowed to the sitting member in the returns from precinct No. 13, formerly called Tierra Amarilla, in the county of Rio Arriba, should be deducted from the return made to and accepted by the territorial officials.

In regard to the election of this precinct, there were nine witnesses examined on the part of the contestant, of which the committee has seen proper to mention but two; and five witnesses were examined by the respondent, whose testimony seems to have been entirely ignored.

The first witness upon the stand for contestant is one Juan Ygnacio Miera.

And here, at the outset, it may be proper to observe that this witness, as well as Salazar, according to their own statement, live about eighteen leagues or fifty-four miles (Mis. Doc. No. 154, page 51,) from the precinct of Tierra Amarilla. Was there no one, not even among the eighty-two voters who the contestant avers did vote at said precinct, honest enough to give testimony in this case? Why had the county to be searched for fifty-four long miles before a witness could be found to testify as to the facts in this particular case?

If such a glaring outrage had been perpetrated upon the people and the contestant as heavers in his notice, does it not appear strange that the witnesses had to be taken and singled out from among those who lived fifty-four miles off, when, according to his own statements, he had twelve persons in the precinct who voted for him and who must have been his partisans, to say nothing of the sixty-eight persons who, according to his story, voted for respondent, most of whom, if the testimony of his witnesses can be believed, and the names given by them are correct, were with but a few exceptions Mexicans and his own countrymen?

The people of Tierra Amarilla as well as the rest of the New Mexican people are generally poor but strictly honest, and the fact that contestant had to go outside of that precinct to find his witnesses casts a suspicion upon their veracity, to say the least of it.

Now as to Miera: this witness, who is twenty-five years of age and resides at Abiquiu, went to Tierra Amarilla, as he testifies on page 30, (ibid.) because he chose to go there. "I desired to go there" "without having any other business."

This precinct, according to Miera, was settled in 1860, and contains seven settlements, two of which are abandoned, though first settled in 1867. He (Miera) has been there very frequently, and at one time remained there an entire month, and at other times for a few days at a time. He thinks he remained there once three months, but he is not positive as to the length of time upon the occasion last mentioned.

He remembers the days and the one month well, but as to the three months, which from the length of time should have impressed themselves more firmly on his memory, he testifies that he merely thinks so, and states this with a qualification, (page 31.)

However, he found it necessary to serve his cause to make out that for a reasonable length of time he had lived in a place fifty-four miles from his own residence, in order to make the idea that he really knew something of it more plausible.

Let us examine his testimony, and see if taken by itself it conforms to such rules as would enable it, uncontradicted by other evidence, to remove the presumption of the verity and correctness of a public record, as are the poll-books from Tierra Amarilla.

On page 31 (Mis. Doc. No. 154) witness says:

"Question. What length of time have you known the amount of population in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. Since the year 1861.

"Question. Is the population of that precinct a new or an old population?"

"Answer. It commenced being populated in 1860.

"Question. What means have you had of knowing the people in Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. I have been there very frequently, and have at one time remained there an entire month, and at other times for a few days at a time. I think I remained there once three months, but am not positive as to the length of time upon the occasion last mentioned."

When cross-examined he contradicts the above statement, (page 34, ibid..)

"Question. How many settlements or plazas do you know in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. I know seven of them; two of them without inhabitants, and five with population. The towns of Puente, the plaza of Los Ojos, of Los Brazos, Encenada, and Las Nutritas are settled.

"Question. Which is the largest of the five?"

"Answer. Los Ojos and Las Nutritas are the two largest, but I do not know which of these two is the largest.

"Question. What is the population of Los Ojos and Las Nutritas?"

"Answer. I do not know; I can give no idea."

Thus, according to his own statement, he does not know the population of two of the largest settlements of that precinct, and this accords with his statement on page 32, (ibid.), when he says:

"Question. Have you any means of knowing the number of legal voters at the election in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla in the year 1866?"

"Answer. I have no such means of knowing about that precinct in 1866."

Two days afterward, being recalled and having probably been well instructed, he again knows all about that precinct, and at this time more fully than before.

I give his testimony entire, but request the House to bear in mind that this is two days later than his first examination.

On page 50 (ibid.) we find him to say:

"Question. Look at the first eighty-two names on the poll-book purporting to be that of the election held last fall in Tierra Amarilla, and see if you recognize them as living in that precinct."

"Answer. I know the names of the 82 who first voted and who appear first on the poll-book, though some of them did not belong in Tierra Amarilla. There are five men named in these 82 votes who did not belong there, but they belonged in the county."

"Question. Now look over the balance of the names on that poll-book and see whether or not you recognize them as of persons living in Tierra Amarilla, and how many persons of the same name do you find in this list after the first 82 names?"

"Answer. I find but two names of persons who reside in Tierra Amarilla, who were there at the time of the election, but these did not vote. One was in the military service of the United States as a soldier and the other had been discharged from the service, and he was not allowed to vote. I recognize 28 names on the poll-book after the number 82, which were enumerated among said first 82. I do not recognize, however, the surnames of these persons; only the Christian names.

"Question. State now the number of heads of families in the different plazas in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla."

"Answer. At the plaza of Las Nutritas there are about 25 or 26; in plaza Los Ojos there are some 20 or 21; in La Puente there are 10 or 12; in Los Brazos but 2, and in Cañada there are 11 or 12. There are no more plazas or towns where there are any people.

"Question. Where have the inhabitants of the two settlements that were in Tierra Amarilla, but which are now depopulated, gone?"

"Answer. Some went into the towns or plazas now inhabited; some went to Cañones and some to Abiquiu, and others went to other inhabited settlements.

"Question. Of whom generally consist the heads of families? Have they many grown sons or not?"

"Answer. There are some old men, young men, and some women who are considered heads of families."

He now knows the heads of families in the two largest settlements, which two days before he did not know and could give no idea about.

He again contradicts himself in his first statement, and says on the same page:

"Question. What have been your means of knowing the number of heads of families in Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. I have had ample means, as I have been there very frequently, and my relations reside there. I have been in all the towns, (plazas.)

"Question. How far apart are the towns and settlements in Tierra Amarilla?"

But further, he states that he recognizes twenty-eight names on the poll-book after the number "82," which he states positively were enumerated among the first eighty-two. But in the same breath he says that he does not recognize the surnames of these persons; he only recognizes the Christian names of them. In other words, he recognizes the names of Joseph, Charles, Henry, William, John, &c.; and from this fact he positively declares under oath that they are enumerated among the first eighty-two. A willing witness, indeed!

After having stated on page 34 that he does not know and can give no idea of the population of the two largest settlements of Tierra Amarilla, called "Los Ojos" and "Las Nutrias," when recalled two days afterward, and cross-examined he pretends to know every voter in the precinct.

On page 51 (ibid.) he says:

"Question. Do you know each and every voter in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla at the last election?"

"Answer. No.

"Question. Who are they, and what are their names?"

"Answer. Philip Madrid, Diego Madrid, Miguel H. Gallegos, Manuel Romero, Gabriel Velasquez, Francisco Martinez y Valdez, José Del Carmen Martin, Juan Pablo Baldez, Juan Pablo Martinez, Aniseto Velasquez, Juan Antonio Ruibal, Fernando Montano, Desiderio Valdez, José Ygnacio Ruibal, Andres Martinez, Eulogio Velasquez, Juan de Luna, Juan de Dios Jaramillo, Pedro Ruibal, Rinaldo Martin, Antonio Mestas, Jesus Ruibal, Ygnacio Velasquez, Juan Lopez, Serafin L. Cucon, Antonio Nerio Gomez, Antonio Nerio Martin, Manuel Gomez, Pedro Lopez, José Maria Lujan, Ventura Serrano, Domingo Abila, Juan Serrano, Francisco Martinez y Sanchez, Francisco Martin, Paz Martin, Manuel Martin, Enrique Mercure, Juan Floyd, Alejandro, an American, Santiago Candel, José Maria Ruibal, Pablo Madrid, Nicolas Martin, Sabino Salazar, Antonio José Martin, Demesio Martin, Pedro Martin, Gabriel Valdez, Santos Samora, Jesus Maria Cordova; Thomas—, an American; Miguel Lobato, José Rafael Alire, Jesus Maria Velasquez, Bernardo Sanchez, Roque Sanchez, Ramon Sanchez, Francisco Abeita, Juan de Dios Ruibal, José Maria Valdez, Jesus Maria Archuleta, Antonio Archuleta, Juan Trujillo, Pablo Salazar, Juan Nepomuseno Valdez, Manuel Trinidad Samora, Pablo Velasquez, Ygnacio Martin, Eliseo Salazar, Juan Ygnacio Miera; Serafin —, (I do not know his surname, a discharged soldier.) I do not recollect the names of the others. I recollect Manuel Valdez, also Christobal Martinez.

"[Seventy-three names are reported by the witness.]

"Question. Are you certain that these are all the voters there on that day?"

"Answer. I am not certain these are all the voters; I may have omitted some names, but I am certain that those I have named were there and voted on that day. Possibly I may have named the same person twice.

"Question. Are you certain that Jesus Maria and Antonio Archuleta were there and voted on that day?"

"Answer. I am, for they live there.

"Question. Look at the poll-book and see if you see the name of Antonio Archuleta among the first eighty-two names on the list.

"Answer. I do not see his name, but I am certain that he voted."

Now, if you will please examine this list of seventy-three names you will find that five of them bear the Christian names of Manuel, four of Gabriel, two of Miguel, and four of them Francisco; the Christian names of six commence with José, and twelve with Juan; three are called Pedro, five Antonio, four Jesus, two Ygnacio, two Serafin, three Pablo, and the remainder are miscellaneous names.

He now knows all of Tierra Amarilla, fifty-four miles distant from his own residence, about which he knows nothing.

He lives at Abiquiu, and on page 51 (ibid.) he says:

"Question. How many heads of families live in Abiquiu, where you live?"

"Answer. About six.

"Question. How many families are there in all the settlements of Abiquiu?"

"Answer. I do not know."

He does not know how many families reside in the precinct of Abiquiu, where he lives, and perhaps tells the truth when he says, on page 52, "I know Tierra Amarilla as well as I do my own home."

This testimony of this witness was reduced to writing in the English language.

On page 33 (ibid.) witness states that he does not understand the English language.

On page 30 he says that Clever received 56 votes and Chaves received 12 votes; 2 votes were polled that were not cast for Delegate.

Without being capable of knowing what was written down in the English language he consults, as he says, on page 35, (ibid.) his memory, comes to the magistrate before whom the evidence is taken, and makes an explanation, (see page 31, ibid.)

"TUESDAY MORNING, February 4.

"Juan Ygnacio Miera resumed his testimony. The witness at the opening of the court stated through the counsel for contestant that he desired to explain his testimony of yesterday, he being under a misapprehension as to one or two of the questions propounded. He proceeded:

"I did not understand, or it was not explained to me, yesterday: I thought I was asked about the majority, and not the number of votes cast. I now say that the majority of the votes cast was 56 for Mr. Clever; the whole number of votes cast for Delegate was 82; Colonel Chaves had 12 votes out of the 82. I do not know whether there were 66 or 68 for Clever. On yesterday I did not clearly recollect in what year the post of Tierra Amarilla was established. I recollect now. It was in the latter part of the year 1866, in the latter part of October or the early part of November."

Compare this with what he attempts to explain after consulting his memory, (see page 30, ibid..)

"Question. What was the mode and manner in which the votes and ballots were counted and the result of the poll announced?"

"Answer. When the election closed at six o'clock in the afternoon the principal judge of election took the ballots out of the ballot-box and read them in presence of the people who were present. When he got through reading them he turned the ballot-box upside down, open, and struck it three times, to show that there were no more ballots in it. Mr. Clever had received fifty-six votes and Colonel Chaves received twelve votes. There were two votes polled that were not cast for Delegate."

And compare his explanation with his first answer and you will see that the memory he consulted must either have been confused or else he was testifying about a matter of which he knew nothing.

Again, on page 31, the witness is willingly led by the attorney examining him; and he says:

"Question. What was the size of the poll-book, and did each candidate have a column in which to number his vote?"

"Answer. It was a poll-book, but the paper was not very large. It was a small book of about four sheets. Each candidate had his name in the respective columns, and each voter was numbered opposite to his name."

On page 35, he says:

"Question. Did you, during the day of election in Tierra Amarilla, have the poll-book in your hands?"

"Answer. I did not."

And then flatly contradicts his statement on page 31, and says (page 35) when asked how many sheets were there in that poll-book that "there might have been two or three."

Now, compare the following statement of this witness and see if his testimony can be reconciled:

"Question. Have you told any one what your testimony would be in relation to this contested election?"

"Answer. I have not.

"Question. Did you not talk with Governor Arny, before he left for the States, as to what your testimony would be?"

"Answer. I have never conversed with him, nor told him what I would testify to.

"Question. Did you not give Governor Arny an affidavit about this matter?"

"Answer. I gave an affidavit, but took it before a justice of the peace; but not to Governor Arny."

"Question. Did not Governor Arny's son go with you to the justice's to obtain the affidavit?"

"Answer. They sent for me, and I went. The papers were made out when I arrived there."

"Question. Do you know who wrote the affidavit: William Arny or the magistrate?"

"Answer. I do not know who wrote it. When I arrived at the magistrate's I found it in writing, but do not know who wrote it."

"Question. Was the affidavit in English or Spanish?"

"Answer. It was in Spanish. I do not read English."

"Question. Did you sign an English copy of said affidavit?"

"Answer. The affidavit I signed and testified to was in Spanish."

"Question. If you did not speak to any person about this matter, how could any person write out an affidavit about it?"

"Answer. I did not talk with any person about it; but they knew that I was at the election, and I suppose they knew what the facts were. Eliseo Salazar, who was present with me at the election in Tierra Amarilla, probably said something about it. I believe the affidavit made by me was the same as that taken also by Eliseo Salazar."

"Question. Was Don Eliseo present at the time you made the affidavit mentioned by you on the cross-examination?"

"Answer. He was not.

"Question. Did Eliseo make a like declaration with yourself?"

"Answer. Not to my knowledge."

"Question. What did you understand by your testimony to-day in relation to Don Eliseo's making an affidavit?"

"Answer. I suppose the affidavit was made out by Don Eliseo."

But further: Miera arrived in Tierra Amarilla, which contains according to his statement, seven settlements (two uninhabited) and which are a mile or more apart, at about five o'clock in the morning of the day of election. At nine o'clock of said day he was at the polls, (see pages 33 and 34.)

"Question. How long prior to the election did you and Salazar go to Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. We arrived at Tierra Amarilla about five o'clock on the morning of the election."

"Question. How high was the sun on your arrival there?"

"Answer. The sun was not yet up."

"Question. Did you leave the polls at any time during the day until they closed in the evening?"

"Answer. I was at the polls all the time during the day, and was not absent more than fifteen minutes at any one time."

"Question. How high was the sun when the polls closed; was the sun yet down?"

"Answer. It was just before sundown when the polls closed. I did not go out of the door, but from the window I saw that the sun was still shining."

"Question. How long were the judges of election in counting the votes after the polls closed?"

"Answer. I do not know how long. I had no time-piece."

"Question. Did you not state on your direct examination that the votes were counted immediately after the polls were closed, and that after this you left?"

"Answer. When the officers of the election had finished counting the votes I left with Mr. Eliseo Salazar and others, and I do not know how many hours or how many minutes the officers were engaged in counting the votes."

"Question. Was it before or after dark that you left the place of election?"

"Answer. It was dark when I left."

On page 80 Salazar says:

"Question. When did you leave Tierra Amarilla for Abiquiu after the election?"

"Answer. The day following the election."

"Question. Who accompanied you to Abiquiu?"

"Answer. Juan Ygnacio Miera."

Now, I ask, how could Miera know who was or who was not at Tierra Amarilla? He arrived at five o'clock. The precinct is a large one; the settlements are many miles apart. He was at the polls all day, according to his statement, and yet he is found to say on page 85:

"Question. Were there not at the time of the election a number of persons cutting hay for the Government in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. At the time of the election there were not."

"Question. At the time of the election were there not persons there who were furnishing fruits to the troops in Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. There were not."

Miera and Salazar contradict one another, because Miera says on page 32, (ibid.)

"Question. At what place were you during the first three days after the last general election in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla?"

"Answer. At Abiquiu; but the first day I remained in Tierra Amarilla; the other two in Abiquiu."

On page 34 witness says:

"Question. How high was the sun when the polls closed? Was the sun yet down?"

"Answer. It was just before sundown when the polls closed. I did not go out of the door, but from the window I saw that the sun was still shining."

And further, on same page, witness says in the same breath:

"Question. Was the day fair or cloudy on election day?"

"Answer. I do not recollect whether the day was cloudy, or whether it rained, hailed, or snowed."

This, his last statement, seems to be confirmed by the testimony of Francisco Martinez y Sanchez, on page 151, (ibid..)

"Question. Did you or did you not see Juan Ygnacio Mora at the polls on the day of the last general election held at the precinct of Tierra Amarilla? If so, state at what time he came to the polls and at what time he left, if you recollect."

"Answer. I saw him at the polls; he was there from in the morning until about three o'clock in the afternoon; he commenced drinking and annoying us to such an extent that I was compelled to put him out; about half an hour afterward I went out and found him holding on to a post, and very sick and intoxicated; he returned to the polls a little before sundown, very drunk, and went away very shortly afterward."

The original depositions will show that "Mora" is a misprint; the word should be "Miera."

Witness says, on page 32:

"Question. If any means, words, or inducements have been made use of to induce you not to appear here and give testimony in this case, state by whom such was done, and when."

"(Objected to by counsel for Clever.)

"Answer. Words and means were so used on yesterday. I was told that no obligation rested upon me to attend as a witness upon this investigation. Don Diego Archuleta promised to make himself responsible for any default of my non-attendance. This was at the pueblo of San Juan yesterday.

"Question. What reasons did Don Diego give to you that you would not be responsible if you did not appear as a witness?

"Answer. The reason he gave was that the appointment of the deputy marshal was revoked and that he, the said marshal, had no right to summon me."

In this he is contradicted by Diego Archuleta, who says on page 120, (ibid..)

"Question. Do you know Juan Ygnacio Miera, the witness who has testified in this case?

"Answer. I do.

"Question. Did you see him and have a conversation with him on the first day the testimony was taken here, the 3d day of February?

"Answer. I saw him in San Juan. When I met him at that place he complained to me that he was threatened with the penalty of twenty-five dollars should he fail to appear here at this court. I asked him by whom. He said by the deputy marshal, Señal. I told him that Señal was deceiving him; that he was no longer deputy marshal, for his appointment had been revoked.

"Question. Did you in any manner counsel or advise him or offer him any inducements not to attend and testify in this case?

"Answer. No, sir; I thought his evidence would amount to nothing."

The memory of this witness seems to be exceedingly bad. On page 30 he says:

"Question. At what house was the election held, and who were the judges of election, and who the clerks?

"Answer. The election was held at the house of Bernardo Sanchez in the plaza of Los Ojos. Juan Lopez, Francisco Martinez, and Bernardo Sanchez, were the judges, and Philip Madrid and Miguel Gallegos were the clerks of said election."

Philip Madrid, one of the clerks of the election, (on page 15, small pamphlet,) says that the election was held at the home of Francisco Martin. Now, I submit in all candor to the members of this House the question: is that witness to be relied upon; can his testimony be reconciled; would a sworn jury entertain it for a moment; will any one say that a solemn record could be impeached by such evidence?

About the precinct of Tierra Amarilla, contestant in his notice of contest says that fraudulent poll-books were prepared after the counting of the votes, and attempts to prove his allegation by Miera. Let us see how he succeeded. Page 31, (ibid..)

"Question. Would you know the poll-books again were you to see one of them?

"Answer. Possibly. [Here the poll-list of the election was handed to the witness for identification.] This is not the same poll-book I saw at the election in Tierra Amarilla. [Poll-book marked "A" in presence of witness.]

Jesus Maria Ruibal, clerk of the probate court for Rio Arriba county, called to testify at the instance of contestant himself, and whose testimony he is not allowed to impeach, says, on page 36:

"Question. What is the number of the Tierra Amarilla precinct?

"Answer. Number 16.

"Question. Did you send a poll-book to the precinct of Las Truchas?

"Answer. I sent two. I sent two poll-books to each precinct.

"Question. By whom did you send those to Tierra Amarilla?

"Answer. I sent them by Don Philip Madrid, who happened to be here. Don Philip was not a clerk at the time I sent them.

"Question. After the election was held, how many poll-books were returned from Tierra Amarilla to your office?

"Answer. The two were returned which I had sent there."

And on page 39:

"Question. Look at this book that purports to be the poll-book of Tierra Amarilla; [the poll-book handed to witness:] has this the same number of sheets, and no more, that you furnished to Tierra Amarilla?

"Answer. This is the same book, containing six sheets, which I sent to Tierra Amarilla, and contains no more and no less sheets, and as I stitched myself."

The testimony of Don Juan Antonio Ruibal, probate judge for Rio Arriba county, found on pages 46 and 47, (ibid..) who was called to testify by the contestant, sustains the correctness of the poll-books from said precinct. The depositions of Don Jesus Maria Señal y Baca, page 118, (ibid..) and Diego Archuleta, page 119, (ibid..) fully confirm the evidence of Jesus Maria Ruibal, probate clerk, and Juan Antonio Ruibal, probate judge.

The testimony of Francisco Martinez y Sanchez, judge of the election, pages 149 to 151, (ibid..) and Philip Madrid, one of the clerks of said election, (Mis. Doc. 14, pp. 14 to 16, ibid..) fully sustains the returns from that precinct.

Elisio Salazar, another witness for contestant, who was a candidate for office and who smarted under a defeat, was also examined by contestant, and his testimony seems somewhat more regular than Miera's. Neither is he a resident of that precinct, but as Miera had so contradicted himself that it was feared his testimony would be rejected as unworthy of belief he, Salazar, had prepared himself more fully to meet the troublesome emergency. He has the most of his testimony in writing so as not to make a mistake, some of which had been made out but a few days previous to the taking of depositions, and he was aided in so doing by one Antonio Maria Vigil; see pages 78, 80, (ibid..) Now, what is most strange in this is that the eighty-third and eighty-fourth sections of the compiled laws of New Mexico, found on page 452, provide:

"Sec. 33. That the said judges shall close the election at six o'clock in the afternoon, and immediately thereafter shall open the ballot-boxes and publicly count the votes cast for each candidate, certifying the poll-books as provided by law: Provided, That said judges of election shall order that a copy of the certificate be entered in the poll-books, then to be signed by them and clerks, and transmitted to the justice of the peace of their precinct: Provided, further, That the said judges of election be required and obligated to give certified copies to the parties interested that may solicit the same: Provided, That these copies shall not exceed four in number.

"Sec. 34. That the said copies mentioned in the preceding section shall be as valid as the original certificates from which they were taken; and said copies shall be used and taken as proof in any contested election in this Territory as though they were the originals: Provided, That when any person or persons shall solicit of any justice of the peace a copy of the certificate on file in his office the said justice of the peace shall give a certified copy thereof free of charge."

Now, Salazar says (see page 18, ibid..) "that he went to Tierra Amarilla for the purpose of watching the election, looking out for the election, and to challenge illegal voters, and that he was a candidate for senator." He came to watch the election—meaning that watching was necessary. Being a candidate for senator implied that he would be a man of some intelligence, and is presumed to have known the laws of the Territory. Being thus distrustful, why did he not ask for a certificate? Why does the contestant omit or avoid to produce the certificate filed with the justice of the peace in conformity with the law just read? The legal presumption is that the officers complied with the law; and this presumption is strengthened by the fact that no evidence has been presented creating a doubt as to such compliance. But contestant is satisfied with the evidence of witnesses, living fifty-four miles away from the scene of action. Compliance with law is nothing. The motto "O homines semper ad servitutem paratus!" is all that is desired. And this accords with the objection made by counsel for contestant when it was proposed to examine a judge of the election of the precinct of Tierra Amarilla who had been cited by them to appear and testify as to the vote given in that precinct. On page 117 we find the following:

"The counsel for Charles P. Clever offered to introduce as a witness in the above entitled cause Francisco Martinez y Sanchez, one of the judges of election at the last general election in the precinct of Tierra Amarilla, county of Rio Arriba, the name of said witness being included in the notice served by the said J. Francisco Chaves on Charles P. Clever, and being in attendance in obedience to a subpoena served upon him in conformity with the said notice. To his examination as a witness counsel for Chaves objected, and the court sustained the objection, and the said witness was not permitted to be examined.

"To which counsel for Clever protested and asks that this his protest be spread on the record.

"Upon the offer of the counsel of Charles P. Clever to introduce Francisco Martinez y Sanchez the counsel for J. Francisco Chaves opposed the introduction of said witness because no notice had been served upon the contestant of an intention to examine the said witness on the part of the said Charles P. Clever."

Why this objection? Were the judges of election, necessarily residents of Tierra Amarilla, less qualified to expose the fraud contestants have been committed than witnesses living fifty-four miles away from the precinct? I leave it to the members of this House to make their own deductions.

Miera is positively contradicted by the probate judge and his clerk, as also by the testimony of Señal y Baca, Archuleta, and others, to say nothing of the testimony of Francisco Martinez y Sanchez, judge, and Philip Madrid, clerk of the election, who testify positively that 464 votes were cast, of which respondent received 452.

"Francisco Martinez y Sanchez sworn:

"Question. What is your age, where do you reside, and how long have you resided in your present place of residence?

"Answer. I am forty-one years of age. I live in La Tierra Amarilla, in the county of Rio Arriba, and have resided there for the last seven years.

"Question. Where were you on the day of the last general election held in this Territory for Delegate to Congress?

"Answer. I was in Tierra Amarilla, and was one of the judges of the election of the precinct of Tierra Amarilla.

"Question. Were you present from the opening of the polls until the closing of the same?

"Answer. I was present from the opening to the closing of the polls.

"Question. Were you present when the votes cast at that precinct were counted? If so, state if you recollect how many votes were cast at that precinct, and how many votes were cast for Charles P. Clever and how many for J. Francisco Chaves.

"Answer. I was present when the votes were counted; there were 464 votes polled on that day at that precinct; Clever received 452 votes, to the best of my recollection, and J. Francisco Chaves received 12 votes.

"Question. Was the result of the election publicly announced to the persons present, and on such announcement being made was there any dissatisfaction expressed at the result announced by any person present?

"Answer. The result of the election was publicly announced, and no person present expressed any dissatisfaction as to the result of the election."

Philip Madrid says, page 15, (ibid..)

"Answer. I am thirty years of age, a laborer, and I reside in Tierra Amarilla.

"Question 2. Where were you on the day of the general election in the year 1867, held in this Territory?

"Answer. I was at the Tierra Amarilla, and clerk of the election.

"Question 3. Were you present at the opening of the polls to the closing of the same on that day?

"Answer. I was.

"Question 4. At what time did the polls close?

"Answer. At six o'clock p. m.

"Question 5. Who were the judges and clerks of election on that day?

"Answer. Bernardo Sanchez, Francisco Martinez y Sanchez, and Juan Lopez were the judges of the election, and Miguel Gallegos and myself were the clerks.

"Question 6. If you remember what were the number of votes cast at that precinct on that day for Delegate state it.

"Answer. Mr. Chaves received 12 and Mr. Clever received 452.

"Question 7. Where were the votes counted, and were they counted in your presence?

"Answer. They were counted at the house of Francisco Martin, where the election was held, and were counted in my presence.

"Question 8. In what manner were the votes counted?

"Answer. The tickets were taken from the ballot-box and strung on a string.

"Question 9. After the votes were counted what was done with the tickets and poll-books?

"Answer. They were all placed in the ballot-box, and the box placed in the hands of one of the judges of election to be delivered to the probate judge, but as the judge had no horse the box was delivered to me to be delivered to the probate judge.

"Question 10. When and to whom did you deliver the ballot-box and poll-books?

"Answer. After the election; but I do not recollect the day I delivered them, but it was in the same week I delivered them to Juan Antonio Ruibal, who was then judge of probate."

Don Antonio Ruibal, probate judge, says, page 47, (ibid..)

"Cross-examined:

"Question. Who delivered you the poll-book from Tierra Amarilla?

"Answer. Philip Madrid.

"Question. Did you see this poll-book before it was sent to Tierra Amarilla?

"Answer. I did.

"Question. Was it in any way changed or altered by him until it was returned to him?

"Answer. It was not.

"Question. Did you examine it after it was returned to you by Philip Madrid?

"Answer. I did not examine it until the day I counted the votes.

HO. OF REPS.

"Question. Could it have been altered or changed after it came to your hands, and before the votes were counted, without your knowing it?"

"Answer. No."
 "Question. Look at it and see if it appears as it did when you counted the votes as probate judge?"

"Answer. It is in the same condition."
 And remember that Ruibal is the contestant's witness, and the statement I have just read is from his cross-examination.

Jesus Maria Seña y Baca says, page 118, (ibid..)

"Question. Were you present at the house of the probate judge, Juan Antonio Ruibal, at the time the poll-books were received from the precinct of Tierra Amarilla, in this county? If so, state on what day and what time of the day they were received, and who brought them."

"Answer. I was present when those poll-books were received, on the day I left for Santa Fé. I am not certain as to the day, but I think it was Thursday. The messenger was Philip Madrid, one of the clerks of election at Tierra Amarilla. It was in the forenoon, between ten and eleven o'clock, that they were received. Juan Antonio Ruibal, Jesus Maria Ruibal, I think—I am sure that Don Diego Archuleta and Juan Garcia were present."

"Question. Did you see the poll-books when they were delivered to the probate judge at or about that time, and do you think that you would recognize them again if you saw them?"

"Answer. I saw the poll-books delivered to the probate judge. I think I would recognize them if I should see them."

"Question. Look at Exhibit A, now shown you, and see if you recognize it as the book, and by what do you recognize it?"

"Answer. I recognize this to be one of the books; there were two of them, as one was delivered by Philip Madrid, one of the clerks of the election, to the probate judge; I recognize it by the paper, but by no particular mark, because I did not examine it particularly, as I only wanted to see how the election had gone."

"Question. Did you look at the certificate of the judges? If so, look at it again, and see if the certificate appears now as it did then, as to the number of votes and appearance."

"Answer. It looks to me to be the same certificate, with the same number of votes; I observe no change in it; I took the number of votes from the poll-books."

Diego Archuleta says, page 119, (ibid..)

"Question. Where do you reside now, and where did you reside during the last election?"

"Answer. In the county of Rio Arriba, Territory of New Mexico, Plaza de Luceros."

"Question. What is your age, and what are the offices, both under the Mexican Government and that of the United States, which you have held?"

"Answer. I am fifty-four years of age; I was first a captain in 1841 under the Mexican Government, and breveted to the rank of lieutenant colonel in the same year. In 1844 and 1845 I was delegate to the Mexican Congress from New Mexico. In 1846, at the time General Kearney entered New Mexico, I was colonel and second in command of General Arriaga. In 1850, before the territorial government was organized, I was appointed district judge of the first district. In 1857 I was appointed Indian agent for the Capote Utes. In the rebellion of 1861 I was in command of six companies as lieutenant colonel in Fort Union. I was afterward appointed agent for the same Indians. I have been a member of the Legislative Assembly, both houses. I am now a member of the territorial council."

"Question. Were you at the house of Juan Antonio Ruibal, the then probate judge of the county of Rio Arriba, at the time the poll-books from Tierra Amarilla were received? If so, who delivered them; on what day were they delivered, and what time of day?"

"Answer. I was at the house of Mr. Ruibal when Philip Madrid delivered the poll-books from Tierra Amarilla. It was on the 6th of September, between two and three o'clock p. m."

"Question. Who, besides yourself, was present at the time of delivery, and to whom were the books delivered?"

"Answer. Juan Garcia, Jesus Maria Seña y Baca, and myself. The books were delivered to Juan Antonio Ruibal, the then probate judge."

"Question. Did you see the poll-books, and do you think you would recognize them were you to see them again?"

"Answer. I saw them, and think I would know them if I should see them again."

"Question. Look at Exhibit A, now shown you, and see if you recognize it as one of the poll-books then delivered; and if so, by what do you recognize it?"

"Answer. I have no doubt but that it is one of them. I know it by size, and I am certain it is one of them, because I had them in my hands."

"Question. Did you see the certificate of the judges of election to the poll-books? If so, state whether this appears to be one of them, from the number of votes and general appearance, or not."

"Answer. I saw the certificate. It is the same I saw."

"Question. Look at it and see if it is certified to by the judges and clerks of election?"

"Answer. It is."

"Question. What is the number of votes, as appears by this certificate, given to the respective candidates to Congress?"

"Answer. Chaves received 12 votes, Clever received 452 votes, as appears by the certificate."

"Question. Look at the names and numbers registered on the poll-book referred to, those in black ink as well as those in blue, and see if they appear to be in the same hand writing or not."

"Answer. I think that they are written by the same hand; the only difference is in the color of the ink."

Five witnesses rebut the allegations of fraud and sustain the verity of the official record, and three of these witnesses were public officers, who must necessarily have the best means of knowing all the facts of the case. They swear clearly and positively as to these facts, and they are not only unimpeached, but not the slightest attempt has been made or could be made to shake their veracity. And yet the committee have utterly ignored all of this evidence, and for all that appears in their report this House would be ignorant of its existence. The committee say that the testimony of Micra and Salazar sustain the allegations of fraud and should be conclusive here; but they omit to tell you that five credible witnesses contradicted in toto these two wandering, willing witnesses. The preponderance of unimpeached testimony, then, is largely in favor of the returns and their correctness, and a part of this testimony comes from the contestant's own witnesses.

It is therefore difficult to determine how the committee could arrive at the conclusion that the point made by the contestant is sustained. What principles of law or rules of evidence were applied to arrive at that conclusion I sincerely confess I am unable to imagine.

There is a peculiar feature in this case to which I shall briefly call the attention of the House. It will be remembered that upon the presentation of my credentials, in November, 1867, the honorable Speaker stated that he had received from the territorial secretary a letter notifying him that he, the secretary, had been compelled by force to sign his name to such credentials. The office of territorial secretary is an honorable one and its incumbent, to some extent, has to exercise official functions in counting returns for Delegate to Congress. Decency requires that he should interfere no more than is required of him by law in the performance of those official acts. The judge who would interfere in the management of cases coming before him for adjudication is certainly unworthy to wear the judicial ermine, and when a secretary is found to interfere to such an extent as we find that Secretary Heath has interfered in this case it is fair to presume that there must be a motive in so doing.

Now, we find that the depositions of the territorial secretary occupy nearly one half of the two printed pamphlets of testimony in the case. We find him not only as secretary and witness, but we also find him as attorney, sole attorney, and attorney for the attorneys of the contestant. We also find that without having been summoned as witness duces tecum he has taken possession of the records under his charge, belonging to the archives of his Territory, and transferred them to Washington, (see page 79:)

"The poll-book of Tierra Amarilla is now demanded by counsel for Mr. Clever, and it appearing that the same had been sent to Washington with testimony previously taken the counsel for the contestant enters his objections to the testimony of this witness and proceeds with the cross-examination under protest."

"To this counsel for Mr. Chaves states that the poll-book for Tierra Amarilla, being a part of the record in the testimony taken in Canada, in Rio Arriba county, and not having been introduced upon the examination-in-chief here, it was not competent for counsel for Mr. Clever on the cross-examination of this witness to call for it. Said poll-book has been transmitted to Washington city as part of the record and testimony in this case previously taken in La Canada, in Rio Arriba county."

That the Secretary, witness, &c., was also attorney is apparent from what we find on page 60, (ibid..) as follows:

SANTA FÉ, NEW MEXICO, February 13, 1868.

SIR: The undersigned, attorneys for J. F. Chaves, in case of contested election to a seat in Fortieth Congress, finding it impossible to personally attend the taking of the evidence in said contested election at La Junta, on the 14th instant, respectfully request that you represent us at that time and place and superintend the taking of testimony.

Very respectfully, yours,
 BENEDICT & ELKINS,
 Attorneys for Chaves.

It is shown in his testimony, and it did so appear before the committee, that the poll-books of every precinct concerning which contestant complains were annexed to the depositions, sealed up by the judge before whom the depositions were taken, and transmitted to Washington. When the respondent desired to explain and correct testimony concerning these poll-books the cool answer was, "They have gone to Washington." Now, I submit to the members of this House in all candor if it was just to thus deprive me of an opportunity by evidence to fully ventilate the record evidence produced here? But the Secretary goes even further. Although he is one of the attorneys of record for contestant, and had also given his evidence positively and pointedly, he still thought there might be some difficulty about his case, and therefore induced his co-attorneys to address a letter to my friend, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Elections, requesting him to order the secretary as a witness on to Washington. Mr. DAWES has kindly consented to my taking a copy of that letter, which I now send to the Clerk's desk with the request that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SANTA FÉ, January 31, 1868.

SIR: The undersigned, attorneys for Colonel J. Francisco Chaves, in case of contested election between him and C. P. Clever, esq., feel it a duty incumbent upon us, after having made a thorough examination of the poll-books of the different localities where frauds occurred at the September election for Delegate to Congress from this Territory, to inform you, both as Colonel Chaves's attorneys and his personal and political friends, to say that from the remarkable character of the poll-lists no adequate idea can be obtained of them, and the character of frauds patent upon them, through evidence or copies. We have therefore most earnestly to request that General H. H. Heath, the territorial secretary, who is perfectly conversant with every minutia of their character, be ordered on as a witness, with such official papers and returns of said election as bear upon the case, satisfied as we are that an examination of them by yourself and your committee, in connection with the evidence now being taken, will insure justice in the premises.

We would further state that General Heath has leave of absence from the State Department, but does not wish to go to Washington so soon as we desire without being ordered on.

Whatever reply you may be pleased to make to the above request we respectfully ask be telegraphed to Denver City, Colorado Territory, to be forwarded to us by letter, the expenses of which will be paid by Colonel Chaves or General Heath.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,
 BENEDICT & ELKINS,
 Attorneys for J. F. Chaves.

HON. HENRY L. DAWES,
 Chairman Committee of Elections,
 House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CLEVER. It does seem that the disinterested secretary was very willing to pay expenses if ordered on to Washington. I now send to the Clerk's desk a paper, without making any comment thereon, except to say that it is signed by Hon. Francisco Perea, a first cousin of the contestant, who was the Delegate from New Mexico in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and who has many friends and acquaintances on the floor of this House. He is one of the most respected and influential citizens of our Territory; one whose strict integrity has never been called in question. This paper is exemplified under the seal of a United States court, and bears date October, 1867, shortly after the election for Delegate.

The Clerk read as follows:

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO,
 County of Bernalillo, ss:

This day personally appeared before me, the undersigned, clerk of the district court of the United States for the second judicial district of the Territory of New Mexico, Francisco Perea, and being duly sworn says, that some time about the day of September, A. D. 1867, he was present when several of the political friends of Colonel J. Francisco Chaves were gathered together, and while they were so gathered together it was stated by some of the political friends of Mr. Chaves that he, Chaves, had gone to Santa Fé to superintend the counting of the votes for Delegate to the Congress of the United States, and that said Chaves would get the certificate, as he had carried money with him with which to bribe the secretary; that to the best of the remembrance and belief of this affiant, Christoval Armijo, who was a warm political friend of Mr. Chaves in the late election and a man of wealth, was one of the persons who made use of the statement that Mr. Chaves had taken money with him to Santa Fé to bribe the secretary with.

FRANCISCO PEREA.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 9th day of October, A. D. 1867.

Mr. CLEVER. Now, when in the study of nature we wish to investigate the particular character of individual organization we place it under microscopic examination and by the effect of the well-known principles of optics make startling discoveries of hitherto unknown elements of life. So under the microcosm of political chicanery and the concentrated light of the documentary evidence just read we are startled by the delineation of the moral structure of the specimen of official organism now under examination.

But, Mr. Speaker, I had almost forgotten that the secretary of New Mexico had written to you a letter stating that he had signed the credentials presented by me under duress. Let us see if this accords with the positions he has occupied according to his own evidence.

On page 52 (Mis. Doc. No. 154) he testifies as to the "military positions" he had occupied. He was asked—

"What were those military positions?"

Answer. Lieutenant, captain, major, brevet lieutenant colonel, full colonelcy, brevet brigadier, and brevet major general."

Is it possible that a person who has held all these positions could be made to sign an official document against his own will? He must either have written to you what was not the fact or else the Government was very much deceived in confiding to him trusts and responsibilities which he says had been conferred upon him. But that the secretary is a man of undaunted valor will more fully appear from a letter he wrote, a copy of which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read. I have seen the original and am satisfied that it is in his own handwriting. I also send a letter addressed to my friend, Mr. DAWES, by General Townsend, and ask that they both be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

WASHINGTON, June 12, 1868.

SIR: The Secretary of War directs me to furnish you the inclosed copy of a letter signed H. H. Heath, and dated Dubuque, Iowa, April 9, 1861, in compliance with your request of this date.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND.

Assistant Adjutant General.

Hon. H. L. DAWES,
Chairman Committee of Elections.

DUBUQUE, IOWA, April 9, 1861.

MY DEAR SIR: I for the first time this morning learn from the papers that you are in position in the new confederacy. Accept, my dear sir, my congratulations, not more for your accession to honorable position than your felicity in having a home in a region where honor and principle go hand in hand and fanaticism and madness are thrust out. I, too, would have been there, where my heart ever is, had your president responded as promptly to me as my proffer of service was tendered to the new government. But I have not heard from him on the subject, though I do not yet despair of doing so in his own good time. I simply offered my military or civil services to him, in both of which branches I have had some experience. You may not be aware that I was the first publisher of the first paper ever started north of the Potomac expressly to defend southern rights. I mean the Southern Press, in Washington, in 1819 or 1850—the latter year I think. Since then I have been ever faithful to the interests of that section, and although a northern man by birth I have never been anything but southern in my feelings. I need not attest to you the course pursued by me during the Lecompton struggle as editor of the Northwest, nor either how I supported southern men and northern, too, who supported them. In doing so, it is true, I lost all I had in the world, and the post office here for three years, and from which I have been ejected as one of the first sacrifices to Republicanism, has only served to aid me in liquidating a portion of the indebtedness contracted during the exciting period of the first half of Mr. Buchanan's administration. If I were foot-free here, had I the means, in other words to support myself and wife for one year South, I would not remain out of the southern confederacy one day longer than would suffice to take me thither. As it is, however, I dare not with a wife in delicate health leave here upon an uncertainty. I shall be one of your fellow-citizens again, however, if I am spared; and until then God prosper the southern confederacy. Our Episcopal liturgy you know has a prayer for the President of the United States. No man assuredly needs prayers said over him more than Mr. Lincoln, and so I respond amen, but while the rector is repeating in the prayer "the President of the United States," I am hastily interpolating "also the president of the confederate States;" so that you see our friend, President Davis, is not quite forgotten before the Father even in the ultra North.

There are all sorts of rumors of war just now. The New York Tribune and Times have at last I apprehend goaded the new President on to a policy that must lead to a collision. Let it come, if so it must. There are tens of thousands of loyal hearts at the North who never will accede to coercion, and not only so, they never will pull a trigger against the South. Before I would march against my brethren of the South I would suffer myself to be hanged on the first tree before the eyes of my own wife. Indeed, there are many Republicans who declare their abhorrence of the policy of secession, and I think the sentiment is on the increase, particularly in the Northwest, the interests of which are so entirely linked with the South. But while old Abe grants the lion's share of the spoils to the Northwest he lends his ear to the treacherous advice of New England's fanatics, and will through them profitably drive the two nations into war. God grant that in any event your government may maintain itself, now that it has undertaken to do so upon her own account, as against all foes from whatsoever quarter they may come. Do me the favor to show this already too lengthy epistle to my friend Colonel Clement; and, wishing you every prosperity,

I remain very truly, as ever, your friend,

H. H. HEATH.

H. ST. GEORGE OFFUTT, esq., Montgomery, Alabama.

P. S. It would give me great pleasure to hear from you at your convenience.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

WASHINGTON, June 12, 1868.

Official copy of a letter on the files of the War Department.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. CLEVER. It must be presumed that the secretary of New Mexico, prior to entering upon the discharge of the duties of his office, must have taken the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, which oath requires him to declare, among other things, that he has "voluntarily given no countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in the rebellion; nor sought any office under any pretended authority in hostility to the United States." I beg the members of this House to compare the letter just read with the oath the secretary was required to take before he could exercise the functions of his office, and then determine in their own minds whether that man is worthy of belief, notwithstanding he is clothed with official authority and has given his testimony under the sanctity of an oath. Would the man who would have "suffered himself to be hanged on the first tree in the presence of his own wife before he would march against his brethren of the South" suffer himself to be forced into the signing of an election certificate? Will you believe the man who took the test-oath after having expressed himself as he did when he comes to testify before you, especially considering the circumstances I have set forth?

The secretary of the Territory is the custodian of the archives of the Territory, and the poll-books are under his charge, and possibly the statement of the contestant's attorneys, "that General H. H. Heath, the territorial secretary, who is perfectly conversant with the minutiae of their character," may mean more than was intended to have been communicated to the honorable chairman of the committee. He who upon his bended knees, before the altar of his country and his God, could interpolate along with the benediction for the lamented Lincoln, a blessing on the country's arch-traitor and enemy, is unworthy to be the custodian of the archives of a sovereign Territory! He who could even by thought or word mutilate or pervert the ritual of his church to the purpose of applauding the rebellion, or sympathy with treason, is a fit instrument for bribery, corruption, and fraud. Gentlemen, I leave the history of the whilom rebel sympathizer, his character, his evidence, and his sacredly kept records of state to your consideration and for your reflection, and hope you will accord to them such measure of credence as their character may call for and justify.

The report of the committee on page 2 contains the following:

"It was also charged by the contestant that in precinct No. 12 commonly called Santa Clara, in the county of Mora, the sitting member received 56 votes only, a majority of 37 over him, the contestant, and yet that the poll-books were falsely and fraudulently made to appear that the sitting Delegate received 130 votes, and the contestant 19, and that such excess, which was 131 votes, was fraudulently counted and allowed to the said sitting Delegate."

"The committee are of opinion, from the positive testimony of José Angel Padilla, and the appearance before the committee for inspection, and the fact that the vote in the precinct in September, 1867, was over five times as large as the election preceding, and twice as large as the one succeeding, that at least 134 illegal votes were cast in such precinct called Santa Clara, in the county of Mora, and having been allowed to sitting member, should be deducted from the vote credited to him in the return made to and allowed by the secretary of the Territory."

It seems, in the point made above, that the committee have determined, from what they style "the positive testimony of José Angel Padilla, and the appearance of the poll-book itself." The animus of the witness José Angel Padilla, upon whose testimony the committee seem to have formed their opinion, and which is styled by them "positive testimony," is found on page 107, (ibid.) and is as follows:

"Question. Have you been threatened by any of the partisans of Mr. Clever on account of the affidavit you made in this case at La Junta, in February last?"

Answer. I have been so threatened and for the reason named. I have been threatened with having all the injury done to me that those opposed to me politically could do on account of that affidavit, and came near getting into a serious difficulty with one of Mr. Clever's partisans and friends, who assaulted me on that account. Mr. Fernando Nolan, one of the clerks of the election at Santa Clara, on the 2d of September, 1867, was present on the latter occasion, an accomplice in the assault, and Nolan himself threatened me with future injury."

The tone of this witness' testimony does show that animus, but I omit to read the same, as his testimony was taken ex parte, as appears on page 91, (ibid.) showing that notice was served and accepted on the 15th day of May, 1868, to take testimony in the county of San Miguel on the 25th day of May, 1868, when notice to take testimony had previously been given to contestant and served upon him by the marshal of the Territory on the 12th day of May, 1868, (see page 181, ibid.) to take testimony on the 22d day of May, 1868, at the county of Santa Ana. The testimony of José Angel Padilla must be precluded if law prevails in this case, for the reason that the contestant could not take testimony, according to the act of Congress, within five days after the taking of testimony by respondent. (See Statutes-at-Large, volume 9, page 569.) Respondent having given notice to contestant, which was served upon contestant's attorney three days prior to contestant's notice, by law Padilla's testimony must be excluded.

If law is respected and Padilla's testimony is excluded there remains nothing upon which to found the opinion of the committee except the inspection of the poll-book itself, which, having been in the custody of the territorial secretary, might or might not be the poll-book from that precinct. This I leave for the members of this House to determine. I have no faith in the identity of poll-books that have passed through the hands of Mr. Heath; but you gentlemen may have. The man who would not pull a trigger against his brethren of the South, and not receiving an appointment from J. Davis comes North to hold office, is no friend or companion of mine. The smoothness of the testimony of José Angel Padilla proves its fallacy, and, unhappily for him, he is contradicted by several witnesses, namely, Benigno Baca, page 28, and Manuel Abeita, page 32, (small document,) who sustain the returns. Why the committee have rejected the testimony of the last two-named witnesses, whose character for truth and veracity has not been impeached or attempted to be impeached, discrediting or ignoring their testimony, and only give credence to the testimony of Padilla, whose character for truth and veracity has been impeached, I am at a loss to imagine. If the rule of evidence that a preponderance of testimony should prevail has any applicability here I should think that the returns of the probate judge should not be impeached except upon the most satisfactory evidence. Secretary Heath's poll-books may show differently, but I believe that two honest native citizens of New Mexico are entitled to a greater measure of belief than he or all the poll-books he can furnish to this Congress.

The report of the committee says:

"It was also charged by the contestant that in precinct No. 11, known as La Junta precinct, in Mora county, the place of voting was illegally and fraudulently placed beyond the settlements and resident voters of the precincts and held in a shed erected for that purpose upon an open plain, and that persons who were desirous of voting for him were grossly and violently assailed by the friends of the sitting member, and by such means were intimidated and entirely prevented from voting, and that after the polls were closed the returns were so changed as to fraudulently increase the vote of the sitting Delegate 100, and that the great majority of persons who voted at such poll were camp followers and had no legal right to vote under the laws of the Territory.

"The committee are unable to find any good reason for the fixing of a place so unusual as was the one in this instance for the holding of an election, and do believe from the evidence that coarse, improper, vulgar, and threatening language was used by the friends and followers of the sitting member, and evidently for the purpose of intimidating and preventing persons from voting for the contestant, yet the committee cannot for such reasons recommend the throwing out of the whole vote of such precinct; Yet from the testimony of Walter Fosdyke, and the appearance of the poll-book itself, they are of opinion that the poll-book was fraudulently altered and changed after the polls were closed and before it passed into the possession of the secretary of the Territory, so as to increase the vote certified by the judges and clerks of the election (Mr. Fosdyke being one) in favor of the sitting Delegate from 538 to 638, and that the same having been wrongfully allowed the sitting Delegate by the secretary of the Territory should now be deducted."

If the committee was unable to find any reason for fixing a place for the election at the point it was held, I desire to call their attention to the testimony of Mr. William Kroenig, (pages 76 and 77,) a witness introduced by contestant. As to the words "friends and followers of the sitting member" "using coarse, improper, vulgar, and threatening language," I desire to say that I was many miles away from that precinct on the day of the election; and while the language of the report of the committee has the appearance of harshness, I cannot but believe that it was unintentional. Touching the character of my friends and adherents in the election referred to for decency and honesty I may well challenge comparison with those of my honorable competitor.

As regards the precinct of La Junta, the committee seem to have come to their conclusion upon the testimony of Walter Fosdyke and the appearance of the poll-books, again ignoring the rebutting evidence produced by respondent. This witness was one of the judges of La Junta precinct, and appears to testify with a vengeance. He, too, seems to be the victim of malicious persecution, but after examining his evidence closely it will be easy to discern the reasons for unfriendly conduct toward him. On page 104 (ibid.) we find him to say:

"Question. Have any of the prominent supporters and partisans of Mr. Clever exhibited any hostility toward you on account of the testimony given by you in this case in February last at La Junta?"

"Answer. In what, decidedly."

"Question. In what manner has this hostility been manifested?"

"Answer. Both personally and financially."

It is very seldom we find honest people to be persecuted for telling the truth; falsehood is always detested. This witness was examined twice, and in his first examination he speaks of poll-books throughout. On page 63 (ibid.) he says:

"Question. Would you recognize one or both of the poll-books of that election with the certificates attached, which you signed, if presented to you?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Look at this poll-book marked 'A,' and see if you recognize it as one of the poll-books of that election."

"Answer. I recognize this as one of the poll-books, except three sheets tacked in the center of the book, which I do not recognize. My name is attached to the certificate in my own handwriting. This certificate was read off to me by the clerk, Nelson. I did not read the certificate that night. It was written by the clerk and handed to me for my signature, which I gave him. My impression is that the 638 votes that are here registered on the certificate were not read off according to register by the clerk. Had they been I should have detected the mistake at the time. The three sheets tacked in in the center were inserted after the poll-book went out of my hands and my signature had been attached to the certificate, and that is the reason why I do not recognize them as part of the poll-book."

On page 104 (ibid.) he contradicts his statement, and says:

"Question. Were there two poll-books of the election on the 2d day of September, 1867, at the La Junta precinct made?"

"Answer. There was but one."

On the 17th day of February, 1868, this witness was brought upon the stand and was solemnly sworn "that the evidence he should give in this cause be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." Under this solemn injunction it was his duty to relate all he knew of the facts, without concealing or adding anything. He was again brought upon the stand on the 26th of May, 1868; and on page 101 (ibid.) he makes these answers:

"Walter L. Fosdyke sworn:

"Question. Have you been examined in this case before?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. At your first examination at La Junta did you give all the facts connected with the election for that precinct in September, 1867?"

"Answer. No, sir."

This, his last answer, is given unqualifiedly and can leave upon a discriminating mind but one conclusion, namely: that at his first examination he did not state the whole truth, as required by his solemn obligation, but did conceal a portion of the truth. Now, then, if he was capable of concealing the truth he must be capable of perverting the truth; if he did withhold or diminish the truth of facts the presumption is that he was capable of augmenting falsehood, and his testimony must certainly be taken with a great deal of caution when it operates upon the rights of others. His testimony as found on pages 101 to 104 (ibid.) is of such a character that if true it could not have escaped his memory. Had the committee fully weighed that testimony they would have found that this witness deserved but a small degree of credibility.

Mr. H. H. Heath again appears upon the stage as an attorney, interpolates in his leading question, and makes this witness show the full extent of his animus in giving his testimony, hurling his anathemas against the other witnesses who have testified in this cause. On page 102 (ibid.) we find the following:

"Question. Have you read the evidence given by the other two judges of the election and a clerk of the election, as taken at an ex parte examination at Santa Fé in February last?"

"Answer. I have."

"Question. Was that evidence in accordance with the facts, so far as it related to the result of the voting in the La Junta precinct?"

"Answer. It was not in any essential particular."

"[Here the witness insisted upon giving testimony as to the truth or falsity of the evidence given by those two co-judges at Santa Fé, as published in the Santa Fé Gazette, in his own terms. Counsel for Colonel Chaves referred the question whether Mr. Fosdyke be permitted to state in his own language his knowledge of the truth or falsity of the evidence of those two judges as given at Santa Fé, and his honor decided that Mr. Fosdyke be allowed to so give his testimony.]

"Answer. I say that those two judges have sworn falsely, knowing the facts relative to the result of the election at La Junta to be different from what they swore to, and they have absolutely perjured themselves. The facts of the case are precisely as given in my former testimony."

This witness's two co-judges, Juan Estaban Trujillo and Benito Romero, as also Juan Baldonados, one of the clerks of said election in said precinct, all of whom testify that 643 votes were polled at that precinct on that day and positively contradict Mr. Fosdyke, are styled by him as perjurers. These men are old men, near the verge of the grave, are the contestant's own countrymen, could have no earthly interest in this cause save that to tell the truth, and whose character for truth and veracity it has not even been attempted to impeach except by Mr. Fosdyke, are denounced by the latter in the bitterest possible terms.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us, for the sake of argument, reverse the case. Suppose the grand jury should indict Mr. Fosdyke in this particular case and cause him to be brought before the bar of the court to answer the charge, and upon trial was confronted with the three witnesses above named, would the plea that they were Mexicans and ignorant avail himself any? Mexicans, sir, with a few exceptions, have as much regard for the sanctity of an oath as the people of any other country. Fosdyke positively contradicts himself. No contradiction can be pointed out in the testimony of the other three witnesses, and therefore the presumption of their being truthful men is largely in their favor.

I might go on and point out many more irreconcilable inconsistencies in Fosdyke's testimony, but time does not permit me so to do. On page 102 (ibid.) he states that he has seen the testimony of Mr. Mink, which he also denounces as false; but unfortunate for Mr. Fosdyke Mr. Mink never gave any testimony, as no depositions of his are found in the printed evidence.

Now, as to the poll-book. Mr. Fosdyke says on page 63 (ibid.) that he recognizes the one before him as one of the poll-books, except three sheets tacked in the center of the book. He states that he recognizes only five hundred and forty-three names, the number of votes polled. Examining the poll-book itself it appears that in order to have five hundred and forty-three names nearly eight pages of the three sheets are consumed. If his statement that three sheets were tacked in was true there would remain only two hundred and forty-two names, so that it is easily discernable that Mr. Fosdyke's power of recognition is liable to mistake, to say the least of it. As to the change of the figure five in the certificate to the poll-book, I desire to say that he who can interpolate something in a prayer for purposes of his own might interpolate in poll-books.

That the vote for Delegate in that precinct was much larger than for county officers is fully explained by the testimony of Trinidad Lopez, who, on page 72, (ibid.) says:

"Question. Did you not have an agreement with Mr. Mink on the day of the election to the effect that if he would cut from the tickets the names of the county officers and vote for the Delegate alone you would not oppose Clever for Delegate?"

"Answer. I had an agreement with Mr. Mink that if he would cut off from his ticket the names of the county officers I would not delay the election by swearing men on the side of Mr. Clever. That is, if Mr. Mink would cut off the names of the county officers from his tickets which he had for distribution I would not challenge his voters."

Such an agreement may seem strange, but it is explained by the testimony of one Juan Estaban Trujillo:

"Question. How did Trinidad Lopez conduct himself on the day of election; as a quiet and peaceable man or otherwise?"

"Answer. He was there speaking very loud and excited, but do not know whether it was from the effects of liquor or not."

"Question. Did he challenge the votes of any old-looking men on that day and have them sworn as to their age before he would permit them to vote, or not?"

"Answer. He did challenge one man that was turning gray as to his age."

Mr. Fosdyke being positively contradicted by three witnesses, taken in connection with his own contradictions, it is impossible for me to comprehend why the committee could base their opinion upon the testimony of Walter Fosdyke alone, ignoring the testimony of two judges and one clerk of the election. Their

"Answer. It was read by Mr. Nelson on request of us that it should be read in Spanish.

The returns from the thirteenth or Moreno precinct, in the county of Mora, and those from the fourteenth precinct or Valle de Misouri, in the county Socorro, were made under color of law and under the authority of the laws of an organized Territory. The Territory of New Mexico is large in extent, and the precincts in said Territory must necessarily be large. Settlements are constantly extending, and if there is to be, according to the opinion of the committee, but one voting place in each precinct, many an honest citizen will be prevented from voting. No allegation of fraud or illegality as to the votes cast has been made by the contestant, and inasmuch as the committee has ruled on technical points made by myself I am of the opinion that the rule should operate both ways. The Territory of Wyoming has only an existence in law. No organization under that law has as yet been effected. There are no counties nor precincts, no authority to hold an election therein as at present constituted. Yet the committee have recommended the admission of her Delegate. While I believe the committee to be right in their recommendation, I must object, however, to Wyoming enjoying any more privileges than New Mexico.

The question as to the Rio Bonito precinct, in the county of Socorro, stands upon a different footing. That precinct was organized by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico by act approved January 15, 1858, and there exists no act upon the statute-book for its repeal. The statute reads as follows:

"SEC. 4. That the ninth precinct, 'Rio Bonito,' shall comprise all the inhabitants residing within thirty miles of Fort Stanton."

No allegation of fraud or illegality as to the votes cast in this precinct has been made. The precinct, judging from the number of the votes polled at the election, (182 votes,) must be a large settlement. It will appear from the testimony of Mr. Shaw, found on page 88, (Mis. Doc. No. 14) that Rio Bonito had been recognized as one of the precincts of Socorro county. Here is his testimony:

"Question. Where did you reside, and what position did you occupy in 1867?"

"Answer. I resided in the town of Socorro, county of Socorro, and occupied the position of probate judge of said county.

"Question. Had precinct No. 13, of the county of Socorro, been recognized by your predecessors, and was it recognized by you as an established precinct of that county?"

"Answer. It was so recognized by me, and had been recognized as such by my predecessors; that is, the Rio Bonito precinct; I do not know the number.

"Question. While you acted as probate judge were election returns made to you for justices of the peace and constables for that precinct?"

"Answer. They were.

"Question. Why does this precinct now appear as being precinct No. 13?"

"Answer. The clerk of my court informs me that there was another precinct No. 9, and that the precincts of said county run up to No. 12, and this number was given to it so as not to conflict with any other.

"Question. Did you appoint judges of election in 1867 in the said precinct of Rio Bonito?"

"Answer. I did; the poll-books were sent from my office in due form.

"Question. Now, Mr. Shaw, look at that pamphlet of the laws of the Territory of New Mexico, passed by the Legislative Assembly in 1857-58, and approved on the 15th day of January, 1858, and see if you find the act establishing the precinct of Rio Bonito.

"Answer. I do find such act and the limits are, 'all the inhabitants residing within thirty miles of Fort Stanton,' as appears by said act."

All the precincts in the Territory are mentioned by some specific name, and numbers are added for the sake of convenience. Will any one who has any pretense to or knowledge of law (except Secretary Heath) for a moment pretend that the erroneously numbering of these precincts in the different counties reveals such precincts? Such an idea, in my opinion, is preposterous. This precinct was recognized; local officers were elected and commissioned, justices of the peace exercised their functions therein and executed the laws of the country without any interference on the part of any authority. Under the execution of law and the exercise of rightful authority by such justices of the peace rights have passed from individuals to individuals, property has been transferred and conveyed, rights have accrued, and under the law of the Territory marriage contracts have been celebrated. Suppose that the judicial tribunals of New Mexico were to adopt the opinion of the committee as a rule of action, what would be the result? Acquired rights would be annulled, property relations set aside, marriages declared void, and poor, innocent beings, the offspring of loving hearts, declared illegitimate or bastards. And here, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that before I would lend a hand to such a procedure I would rather give up ten seats in Congress.

The committee say that they are satisfied from the testimony of Mr. Heath, the secretary, and the statutes of the Territory that at the time of the election that precinct had no legal existence. Most of the testimony of the illustrious secretary is about the law of the Territory—whether he desired to lecture Congress

I do not know—certain it is that lawyers generally believe the law to prove itself. The passage of an act renumbering precincts cannot be construed as recognizing their non-existence at the time of such renumbering, and the act of 1868 could have no bearing upon the status of the Rio Bonito precinct in September, 1867. The laws then in force must govern. The testimony of H. H. Heath is not law, nor should his construction of law be regarded as authority.

The committee in their report further state:

"It was also charged by the contestant that the returns from the several precincts in the county of Doña Ana were in most cases arbitrarily and illegally changed, to such an extent as to alter the result from the return of the judges of the various precincts, which gave a majority for the contestant of 169 votes, to a majority of 144 votes for Clever.

"The committee are of opinion, from the testimony of J. F. Bennett, who acted as a clerk for the probate judge and justice of the peace at the county seat of Doña Ana, upon the sixth day after the election, upon the first Monday of September, 1867, that the action of the said probate judge and those acting with him was unauthorized and void, and that the 393 votes that were thus arbitrarily and illegally deducted from the lawful return in favor of the contestant should be restored to him and allowed, as well as the 80 votes in the same manner withdrawn from the vote returned in favor of the sitting Delegate."

This question involves a construction of statutes. Section seventeen, page 434, of the compiled laws of New Mexico, provides:

"Sec. 17. Within six days after the election the probate judge shall call to his assistance one of the justices of the peace of the county and publicly examine and count the votes polled for each candidate, giving notice thereof two days previous, which notice shall be posted up at the court-house for the information of the people where the examination is to be held, and any citizen shall have the right to question the legality or illegality of any vote."

Our first inquiry is: what is the meaning of section seventeen, above referred to. The probate judge within a certain time shall call to his assistance a justice of the peace of the county and examine and count the votes. If it was intended that he should only count the votes, why is the word "examine" inserted in the statute? Would it be reasonable to construe that the lawgiver meant the probate judge to pass merely an ocular inspection of the ballots and poll-books; or is it more reasonable to presume that it was the intention of the Legislature to examine a case or a question brought before the probate judge in a judicial capacity? But if we construe that portion of the statute in connection with the last sentence, "and any citizen shall have the right to question the legality or illegality of any vote," we are forced to the conclusion that something else than a mere ocular inspection of the votes polled was intended.

Where a right is granted a remedy for the enforcement of that right is implied. To say that A shall have the right to present himself before the probate court and say, "Mr. Judge, B, who is not a citizen of the United States, and is by the organic act prevented from voting in this Territory, did vote; and for that reason I come here to question the legality of his vote," and the probate judge to answer him, "Mr. A, I am glad to see you; I am glad you manifest a spirit to uphold our laws; will be glad to see you at my house after court adjourns, but here I am a mere mummy and can decide nothing," seems to me to be an absurd construction of the statute. Again, the statute uses the language, "to question the legality or illegality of any vote." If the statute only intended to give to a citizen the right to object to votes and have that objection recorded, why is not this language employed: "to object to the legality of any vote." But it says, "to question the legality or illegality of any vote;" doubtless meaning that one party might object to a vote as illegal, while another party may maintain that that vote is legal. This, then, brings a legal controversy before the court, and to say that the probate judge has no right to decide that controversy seems to me to construe a statute different from its obvious meaning.

But if we compare the above-mentioned section of the statute with another section of the same statute it will be found that the construction I give to the seventeenth section is correct. The twenty-sixth section of the same act (see page 438, ibid.) provides:

"Sec. 26. The probate judges of the respective counties, to whom is forwarded a transcript of the votes, within ten days after the time limited for the examination of the votes, shall forward to the secretary of the Territory by a special messenger a true extract of the votes polled in their respective counties for Delegate to Congress, members of the legislative council, and house of representatives, accompanying with said extract a poll-book of each precinct."

Thus it will be seen that the probate judge is required to forward not an abstract of the aggregate vote polled in each county, but an extract of the votes polled in their respective counties for Delegate to Congress, to the secretary of the Territory. Construe the two sections together and it will be found that it must have been the intention of the lawgiver that the probate judge should have power to examine the ballots or votes cast, entertain questions about their legality or illegality, and after having decided upon the controversy brought before him and purged the returns of illegal or fraudulent votes to forward an "extract" thereof to the secretary.

By the rules of law courts are to take judicial notice of the meaning of words in the vernacular language. According to Webster "extract" means that which is extracted or drawn out, or that which is taken from an aggregate. If, then, the probate judge is required to furnish an extract and not an abstract, it logically follows that he may omit something; and if we inquire what that omission might be we must come to the conclusion that it should be the votes whose legality or illegality was questioned before him and the illegality of which he decided in his judicial capacity.

But in order to ascertain the degree of fairness with which the probate judge of Doña Ana county proceeded in this instance let us examine the testimony of J. F. Bennett, to which the committee in their report have alluded. On page 170 (Mis. Doc. 154) he says:

"Question. When the votes were counted, as you have heretofore stated, after the last general election for Delegate to the Fortieth Congress, was there many people in the court-house, and how many people were there to hear and determine the good and bad votes in that election?

"Answer. There were present at the counting and summing up of the votes cast at the last general election at the court-house in La Mesilla, Doña Ana county, one hundred and fifty or two hundred persons.

"Question. Did the best and oldest citizens of Doña Ana county come here to see that those votes were rightfully counted?

"Answer. Many of the best and oldest citizens of the county were present at the count, and I presume they were there for that purpose."

And on page 169:

"Question. What was the manner of determining the legality or illegality of the votes through means of the sworn evidence of those citizens?

"Answer. When the voter's name was called by the probate judge, if none of the bystanders made objection, it was taken for granted that the person was a qualified voter; but if an objection was raised to any voter the person making such objection was asked the grounds upon which he based his objection, which was by him stated, when he was required to produce at least two credible witnesses to substantiate his objection, under oath; and when two or more such witnesses testified under oath that any such voters were not qualified voters, such voters, and none others, were rejected."

The larger portion of what is now known as the county of Doña Ana was acquired by the United States under the so-called Gadsden-purchase treaty, proclaimed June 30, 1854. At the time of the acquisition there were but few and scarcely populated settlements in the county. Many of these persons, comprising at least thirty-three per cent. of the male adult population of said county, moved thither after the proclamation of the treaty from the neighboring States of Chihuahua and Sonora, republic of Mexico. They were not citizens of the United States; but few of them were ever naturalized.

On page 174 (ibid.) Mr. Bennett says:

"Question. How far does your actual knowledge of the qualified voters of the county of Doña Ana extend, and on what ground do you base your belief that thirty-three per cent. of the people of this county are not qualified voters?

"Answer. I have been a resident of Doña Ana county since the fall of 1862, and my belief that thirty-three per cent. of the people of that county are not qualified voters is based upon the fact that I am pretty generally acquainted with the people of said county. Have been present on many occasions when United States and territorial grand and petit juries have been empaneled, and was present when sworn evidence was produced before the probate judge and justice of the peace when they counted and examined the votes polled at the last general election, when about 500 votes polled at that election were upon such evidence declared illegal. My official duties have also brought me in contact with all the people of the county, thereby enabling me to form what I believed to be a pretty correct opinion as to their citizenship."

And on page 1768, (ibid.):

"Question. What was the principal cause for rejecting votes from the count at that time?

"Answer. The principal cause for rejecting votes from the count at that time was upon the grounds that the persons casting the ballots were not citizens of the United States; others were rejected upon the ground of being minors.

"Question. What means had the probate judge and justice of the peace of ascertaining these facts?

"Answer. The sworn testimony of citizens of the county present at the counting and summing up of the votes."

Now, I maintain that the laws of the Territory confer upon the probate judge the power to reject illegal votes at the time and in the manner as was done by the probate judge for Doña Ana county. In that respect he constitutes the canvasser of the votes. That his action in the premises was fair and proper and not arbitrary, as the committee aver, is shown by the testimony of Mr. Bennett, examined at the instance of contestant. The action and returns of the probate judge are presumed to be correct until the contrary is shown by competent testimony. I claim that under the laws of New Mexico and the rules of evidence it was the duty of the contestant to prove affirmatively that the votes rejected by the probate judge were legal votes and that their rejection by the court was erroneous, as in this event the onus probandi rests upon the contestant.

Let us reason further. By the organic law of the Territory it is provided that after the first election shall have been held the time, place, and manner of holding elections shall be as prescribed by law. Suppose the Legislature had provided by enactment that at a given time the probate judges of each county should appear at the court-house in their respective counties and open polls; that they might or might not admit persons to vote; that they might examine the legality of every vote prior to receiving the same, &c.; could you refuse here to receive the returns of the probate judges prepared in the manner indicated? Congress has delegated certain powers to the Legislatures of the Territories; the enactments of the Legislature, if they conform to the Constitution and laws of the United States, are law until repealed by Congress. No one will pretend that in the enactment of the election laws of New Mexico the Legislature went beyond its delegated powers; that is, "to legislate on all rightful subjects of legislation." By express provision of the statutes of New Mexico probate judges are authorized to reject whole returns; he shall examine and hear questions of legality or illegality of votes cast. The probate judge of Doña Ana county complied with these enactments; his acts were judicial acts, presumed to be legal; and I repeat that nothing but positive affirmative proof of the legality of the votes and returns by him rejected can invalidate the returns made by him to the secretary.

The returns from one or two precincts in that county were rejected by the judge for the reason that they were not signed by the officers of the election. If the opinion of the committee prevails probate judges in New Mexico may hereafter count from any lists of names without legal authentication whatever. All this goes to show that the Legislature must have intended to clothe that officer with certain judicial functions in matters of elections; and unless his decisions are shown to be erroneous I contend that the adjudication of that officer must hold good.

As to the mode and manner in which the returns from Mora county were forwarded to the secretary of the Territory, I shall say nothing except to read the testimony of Don Vicente Romero, probate judge, one of the best citizens of our Territory, (see page 143, ibid..)

"Present, as on yesterday. Don Vicente Romero now appears and asks leave to explain as to the manner in which the poll-books were forwarded, as he misunderstood the question as explained to him on yesterday; which leave is granted by the court.

"Answer. I accompanied the person who carried the books from his house to Fort Union, where they were delivered to Harry Harriss, the postmaster, for the purpose of having them forwarded to Governor Mitchell. I sent them by mail and accompanied the mail man to Fort Union for the reasons that there were rumors in circulation that there would be an attempt made by the Chaves party to take the books and destroy them; and in order to have them more securely conveyed, I requested Mr. Harriss to forward them in the most secure manner, and to have them indorsed in such a manner as to induce the belief that they were not poll-books. The ballot-box from the La Junta precinct, when I received it, was wrapped with yellow paper, and the paper sealed, and the top of the box and over the aperture was pasted white paper in the form of a cross, with Mr. Nelson's name on the paper."

Henry V. Harriss, esq., the postmaster at Fort Union, on pages 87 and 88, (ibid..) called on the part of contestant, testifies as follows:

"Question. Did you or did you not, at any time after the last election, see the returns of the election in the county of Mora, in bulk or separately? If so, state how, and in what manner, and when.

"Answer. I saw what I supposed to be the returns in bulk; they were given to me by Vicente Romero to be delivered in Santa Fé.

"Question. Did you deliver them yourself in Santa Fé; if so, to whom?

"Answer. I did not.

"Question. Were they sent to Santa Fé?

"Answer. They were.

"Question. By whom, and how?

"Answer. I sent them there by the southern overland express.

"Question. To whom were those returns addressed in Santa Fé?

"Answer. I do not recollect to whom they were addressed when they were handed to me; but I put another wrapper over them and directed them to Governor Mitchell, at Santa Fé, New Mexico. They were sealed when handed to me.

"Question. What was the direction and inscription, if you recollect, as you transmitted the package?"

"Answer. Governor Robert B. Mitchell, Santa Fé, New Mexico—value, $5,000."

"Question. What kind of paper was that package wrapped in?

"Answer. It was wrapped in post office paper, the same as used in mailing letters. I put the outside wrapper on myself and addressed it as above.

"Question. Was the package handed to you by Vicente Romero, purporting to have been the returns of the last general election held in this county, examined by you?

"Answer. I did not examine it.

"Question. Did you send that package by what you deemed to be the most safe conveyance?

"Answer. I did."

As the law providing that the returns shall be forwarded by the probate judges to the secretary is only directory, intended only to secure the speedy and safe transmission of such returns, and as it is conclusively shown that the intention of the probate judge in forwarding the returns as he did was to prevent the Chaves party from capturing them, and no evidence having been adduced that these returns have been tampered with, but, on the contrary, that they safely reached the hands of the secretary without having even been opened by Governor Mitchell, I dismiss the subject.

The committee, on page 4 of the report, say.

"And the additional fact in evidence that in two districts or precincts in said county the vote of 1867 amounted to 948, although in 1866 the same precincts were in one and polled but 337 votes."

In 1866 there was no general election held in the Territory. The testimony throughout shows that the vote in the different counties and precincts where no general election is held is very small, sometimes only one third or one fourth. Contestant has used H. H. Heath long enough; now I beg to be permitted to use him for a moment.

We find on pages 39 and 40 (Mis. Doc. No. 14) the following:

"NOVEMBER 13, 1868.

"Present as on yesterday.

"Taking of testimony resumed.

"H. H. Heath sworn:

"J. F. Chaves, by S. B. Elkins, attorney.

"H. H. Heath, attorney for attorney, now presents a protest herein, as of yesterday, which is overruled.

"Question 1. Are you the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico?

"Answer. I am.

"Question 2. Have you in your office the returns of the election held in the county of San Miguel, during the year 1867 and 1868? If so, state the difference of the vote in that county of the year 1867 and 1868.

"Answer. The returns named are on file in my office, and I have them here. The vote cast for Colonel Chaves in 1867 was 2,137, and that for General Clever 999, being a total vote for Delegates of 3,136. The Republican vote in the county of San Miguel in 1868 was respectively for the candidates 1,202, 1,204, 1,073, and 1,139."

And he hastily interpolates as he did interpolate in the prayer—

"there having been, as I believe, no Democratic candidate in the field.

"Question 3. What was the highest number of votes cast for any one Representative?

"Answer. Twelve hundred and four.

"Question 4. Look at the extract of the returns from Peña Blanca for the years 1867 and 1868, county of Santa Anna; if so, state what is the difference in that precinct of Peña Blanca?

"Answer. The vote for Delegate in precinct No. 1 in the year 1867 was 165; and in 1868 the number of votes cast for representative was 118.

"Question 5. Have you in your office the roll-books or abstracts of the vote cast in precincts Nos. 13 and 14, as returned to your office, from the county of Socorro, in the year 1867?

"Answer. I have not.

"Question 6. What disposition did you make of said poll-books and abstracts?

"Answer. That abstract and those poll-books were transmitted to Washington city, with the evidence taken at La Junta, in February last, to the best of my recollection, with the testimony which I gave at that examination.

"Question 7. Were those poll-books and abstracts made exhibits in that testimony or not?

"Answer. They were.

"Question 8. Was a subpoena duces tecum served upon you to produce that abstract and poll-books or not?

"Answer. I do not recollect whether I was subpoenaed duces tecum or not. I was the acting attorney upon that examination for the attorney of Colonel Chaves, and had been subpoenaed as a witness upon that examination, and know that those poll-books and abstract were necessary to my evidence, and therefore took them."

Here, then, you have the testimony of the secretary, witness, attorney, sole attorney, and attorney for attorney, (objecting to the taking of his own testimony.) showing that in the county of San Miguel the vote at the local election had fallen off nearly two thirds from the vote of the general election in 1867.

The lists of registry furnished by the secretary of the voters who registered in 1868 shows more plainly what little interest our people take when there is no general election. On page 8 (Mis. Doc. No. 14) the following certificate is found attached to the registry list:

Yo, Trinidad Lopez, mimbro de la comision de registro por el precinto No. 11, del condado de Mora, certifico que los nombres puestos en la antecedente lista de registro no auido personalmente suscritos por ellos mismos y auido puesto en su ausencia, con la excepcion de diez y dos.

TRINIDAD LOPEZ,
G. W. GREGG.

Which, translated into English, reads:

"I, Trinidad Lopez, member of the board of registers for the precinct No. 11, of the county of Mora, do hereby certify that the names inserted in the foregoing list of registry were not personally subscribed by the parties themselves, but have been placed on the list in their absence, with the exception of ten or twelve.

TRINIDAD LOPEZ,
G. W. GREGG.

Now, in the precinct where the committee concedes that a large number of votes were polled only twelve persons appeared to register for a local election.

I dismiss this subject, only remarking that in my opinion there can be found no evidence in this case warranting the remark contained in the report of the committee.

On page 4 the report, speaking of the precinct of Bernalillo, states, "and that although there is no evidence that the return was either incorrect or fraudulent they recommend that such majority of 139 be withdrawn from the contestant's vote as returned to the secretary of the Territory."

I may be ignorant of what the word "evidence" means; but on this point I will read a portion of the evidence. On page 129 (Mis. Doc. 154) Mateo de Luna says:

"Question. State, if you know, by whom the ballots were generally passed in to the judges.

"Answer. The most of them were handed in through a vacant square for a glass in the window by Mariano Otero to one of the judges, and he would cry out the name of the person to the judges."

Section twenty-two, page 436, Compiled Laws of New Mexico, provides that "all votes shall be by ballot, each voter being required to deliver his own vote in person." Most of the votes being handed through a vacant square for a glass by one Mariano Otero, and not delivered by the voter himself, seems to me to be a fatal defect as to the votes so handed in.

Mr. Luna continues, (same page:)

"Question. Did you see any person prevented from voting on that day through threats or intimidation? If so, state about how many.

"Answer. I did not hear any threats or menaces used, but I did see many persons having tickets to vote for Mr. Clever pushed away from the window and prevented from voting."

And on page 130 (ibid.) Mr. Luna says:

"Question. Were the tickets opened by any one during the day and the names of the candidates on the ballots called off?

"Answer. The tickets were handed in doubled up and placed in the ballot-box unopened, one of the judges simply saying, 'This is for Chaves.' I requested them to permit me to examine some of the tickets, but they declined to do so.

"Question. How many men, more or less, on that day, did you see pushed away from the window and prevented from voting?

"Answer. The greater part of the voters were prevented by the people standing in files about the window.

"Question. Did you see any ballots thrown away by any of the judges of election on that day? and if so, state how many."

"[Objected to by counsel for Mr. Chaves, and objection overruled.]

"Answer. I saw the judge who received the ballots throw one out through the window, and another he threw down on the floor, which I picked up from the floor and asked the judge why he had thrown it away. The judge stated it was not valid. I then appealed to the presiding judge, and he told me that they were complying with the law. The ticket was for Mr. Clever."

The judges were complying with the law when, throwing away the tickets handed in for the sitting Delegate, and without opening any tickets counted them by crying out, "This is for Chaves." I shall abstain from discussing this point and the committee's remarks any further.

The committee further say that no testimony has been offered as to the alleged illegality of 77 votes in precinct No. 7, known as Los Alamos. The poll-book from that precinct was before the committee, brought there by contestant himself, the inspection of which will show that there are no signatures to the return, neither those of the judges or the clerks of election. [Here the poll-book is shown.] Not knowing the principle of law or evidence upon which the committee base their opinion, I am compelled to leave this point without further comment.

On page 5 of the report the committee say:

"Your committee are of opinion that the evidence upon the part of the sitting Delegate is insufficient in support of his allegation with reference to the 82 votes claimed to have been cast by aliens in the county of Santa Fé, and the same is not allowed."

The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo contains a clause providing that those Mexican citizens residing in the ceded territories who do not desire to become citizens of the United States may, within one year after the ratification of the treaty, elect to retain their character as Mexican citizens. Under this provision of the treaty Colonel Washington, civil and military Governor of New Mexico, issued a proclamation, a Spanish copy of which is found on page 146, (Mis. Doc. No. 154,) ordering that all Mexicans at that time residing within the limits of the Territory of New Mexico and who desired to retain their character as Mexican citizens (or citizens of the republic of Mexico) should, within a certain time, make the declaration provided for by the terms of the treaty. Many of the Mexicans, misled by emissaries sent from the Mexican States to New Mexico, did make the declaration to so retain their citizenship of the republic of Mexico. It is shown in evidence that 82 of them voted at the last election in the county of Santa Fé for contestant; but to cite here the testimony of the witnesses on this point, and to elucidate the legal import of that testimony, would occupy too much of the time allotted to me for argument. While I believe the committee to have had sufficient evidence before them to reject the 82 votes cast for contestant in Santa Fé county by citizens of the republic of Mexico, I do not insist that they shall be disfranchised or injured, as many of them are my personal friends, and most of them are respected and honest men. I know they were deceived when they signed the declaration.

During the last session I introduced a bill to restore them to citizenship, and I hope that the committee, or some one of them, remembering the position they have taken in this case, will be foremost in assisting to have a law of Congress passed restoring them to citizenship, to which by their conduct, interest, and circumstances they are entitled. These so-called Mexican citizens during the late civil war stood by the Government of the United States as well as all of the inhabitants of New Mexico, and a proper consideration of their case will soon disembarass elections as well as judicial tribunals in New Mexico. I desire the committee as well as the members of this House to know that I can afford to be generous as well as just.

The report on page 5 states:

"Your committee are of opinion that the secretary of the Territory was warranted in omitting the sitting Delegate's majority of 28 in his count upon which certificate was issued, touching the vote in precinct No. 5, and known as Barelás, in the county of Bernalillo, although the committee believe that it is probable that the sitting member received in said precinct a majority of 28 votes, but which must not be allowed now for the reason that your committee give for disallowing the contestant his majority claimed in Bernalillo, precinct No. 1, in the county of Bernalillo."

The committee is mistaken in saying that the secretary was warranted in omitting the sitting Delegate's majority of 28 in his count, &c., because that majority or any vote from that precinct never came before the secretary. The probate judge excluded that precinct on account that no poll-books properly signed came before him. But the testimony shows that such a majority was given in that precinct for the sitting Delegate, and therefore should have been allowed him by the committee. The committee undertakes to trade off this majority for the reason that the committee gave for disallowing the contestant his majority claimed in Bernalillo, precinct No. 1, in the county of Bernalillo. The evidence on this point is positive. Aaron Zeckendorf, on page 125, (Mis. Doc. No. 154,) testifies that a certificate in conformity with the laws of the Territory was obtained, which he produced, and which is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Question. Was this certificate signed by the judges of election in your presence?

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. State the contents of the certificate.

"Answer. Its contents are as follows:

"We the undersigned judges and clerks of the election held on the 2d day of September, 1867, in the precinct of Barelás, in the county of Bernalillo and Territory of New Mexico, certify that the following named persons received the votes set opposite their names for the offices as stated respectively:

"For Delegate in Congress—Charles F. Clever, 89 votes; Francisco Chaves, 61 votes.

"For Senators—José Ynez Perea, 83 votes; Andres Romero, 53 votes; José Antonio Lujan, 83 votes; Miguel Anto Lobato, 83 votes; W. H. Henrie, 53 votes; Vicente Chavez, 53 votes.

"Judge of Probate—Scriñu Ramirez, 83 votes; Thomas Gutierrez, 53 votes.

"Sheriff—Matío de Luna, 81 votes; Manuel Garcia, 55 votes.

"Coroner—Green Wilson, 83 votes; James A. Jeremiah, 53 votes.

BARELAS, N. M., September 2, 1867.

"Question. State whether the above is a true and correct copy of the certificate handed to you by Benjamin Stevens after the votes had been counted at the Barelás precinct.

"Answer. It is.

"Question. Was that certificate explained to the officers of the election in Spanish before it was signed by them?

"Answer. It was, in the Spanish language.

"Question. Do you understand the Spanish language?

"Answer. I do, sufficiently to know that the certificate was explained to them before they signed it."

This certificate, as I have stated, was obtained under the laws of New Mexico, and under those laws it is made evidence. The committee disallows the majority given in this precinct to the sitting Delegate, for the reason as they say, "that they have disallowed the contestant his majority in Bernalillo precinct." The election in these precincts should stand or fall according to their own merits. I have shown that the election in Bernalillo precinct was a farce. I most earnestly but respectfully object to the committee's attempting to trade off the vote given bona fide in Barelás precinct for the farce enacted in the precinct of Bernalillo.

According to the testimony of H. H. Heath, secretary of the Territory, page 40, (Mis. Doc. No. 14,) 165 votes were cast in the precinct of Peña Blanca, county of Santa Aña. As to the voting in that precinct, Roman Baca, a witness uncontradicted, says, page 181, (Mis. Doc. 154:)

"Question. Where were you on the day of the last general election held in this Territory for Delegate to Congress on the first Monday of September, 1867?

"Answer. I was in the precinct No. 1 of said county of Santa Anna, Peña Blanca.

"Question. Were you at the polls that day from the opening to the closing of the same? If so, state at what time they were opened; and at what time they were closed and in what manner the election was conducted.

"Answer. I was present at the opening of the polls, which took place about nine o'clock a. m. I remained at or near the polls until noon, at which time a recess was taken for dinner. When I returned from my dinner the voting had commenced. The polls were closed, I think, about six o'clock. Some voted for the candidate of their choice; others, from what I saw and believe, voted against their will. The ballots were handed by the voters to Antonio Sanchez, one of the judges of the election, and by him to David Baca, another of the judges, who called off the names of the candidates to the clerks. He sometimes mis-called the names, calling the names of Chaves when he should have called that of Mr. Clever."

And on page 182 (ibid.) Mr. Roman Baca says:

"Question. Did you see any men not allowed to vote on that day who wished to vote for Mr. Clever who were told by the judges that if they would vote for Mr. Chaves they could vote?

"Answer. I saw three men offer to vote for Mr. Clever whose votes were not taken, but were told that if they would vote for Mr. Chaves they could do so.

"Question. Did you or not hear a majority of the voters say on that day that they desired to vote for Mr. Clever, but through fear of Tomas Cabeza de Baca they had to vote for Mr. Chaves; that Baca would persecute them if they did not vote for Mr. Chaves?

"Answer. I heard a large number say that they wished to vote for Mr. Clever, but were afraid to do so on account of threats made by Tomas Cabeza de Baca, and some did not vote or come near the polls on that day through fear of Mr. Baca, as they said, and I believe.

"Question. At the closing of the polls did the judges of the election call off the names of the several candidates voted for, as shown by the tickets in the ballot-box?

"Answer. When the polls were closed the tickets were taken from the ballot-box and counted, but the names of the candidates were not called out, or any count of the votes cast for each one. The tickets were placed back in the box and the box taken away by one of the judges of the election, David Baca.

"Question. To what party did the officers of the election belong—to the Clever or Chaves party?

"Answer. They belonged to the Chaves party. Antonio Sanchez, one of the judges, a short time after the election stated under oath in my presence in the district court that he was a citizen of the republic of Mexico.

"Question. Did you know of any persons being threatened by Tomas Cabeza de Baca that if they voted for Mr. Clever he would take their houses from and deprive them of the use of wood and pasture which they had always, and therefore they were compelled to vote for Mr. Chaves?

"Answer. Several told me previous to the election that they had been so threatened, and although Mr. Clever was their choice they could not vote for him through fear of Mr. Baca; they must obey his order.

"Question. Were not Mr. Clever's friends previous to and on the day of the election threatened with violence and grossly insulted on account of supporting him?

"Answer. They were and have since the election.

"Question. When persons who wished to vote for Mr. Chaves were challenged did not the judges refuse to administer the oath to them as to their qualifications, but allowed them to vote?

"Answer. They did."

The committee seem to have taken no notice whatever of this testimony. The evidence of Baca shows that there were not only threats and gross irregularity, but absolute illegality in the voting in this precinct. Had the committee duly weighed this evidence they might have come to some different conclusion.

Thus far I have spoken only as to the legal aspect of this case. I believe that I have shown conclusively to every legal mind, as I said at the outset, that the report in this case "is founded upon a misapprehension of the law which should govern in this case and the facts as disclosed by the evidence."

An effort has been made to show that there exist in the Territory of New Mexico two parties divided on national politics. Such is not the case, at least such was not the fact at the election in September, 1867. A few demagogues for the purpose of their own aggrandizement may make such a proclamation. The people of New Mexico at the time of the election voted solely for the two candidates as the one or the other was regarded as the better promoter of the interests of the Territory in the national councils, or follow the lead or obey the behests of certain "lords of the soil" whose influence was exerted in behalf of their patriotic friend and relative.

The attempt to tack on to the great Republican party of the nation one of the old purely personal and local parties of New Mexico and long time and bitter animosities and antagonisms of such party will be a most potent agent in preventing the formation, growth, and supremacy of a Republican party in the Territory. I have made mention of this state of things because I know that an effort has been and is being made to so prejudice the members of this House as to induce them to be ready to lend a willing ear to anything that seems to confirm the contestant's right to a seat in this House. This, of course, has no bearing upon the merits of this case, judging of them by the law or by the evidence. But I wish to call attention to the fact that the efforts to excite prejudice is apparent throughout the testimony and in the efforts of parties connected with the case; and I have desired to show that there is no foundation upon which to base such a prejudice. In both the Chaves and Clever parties there were individual representatives of the most extreme views of each of the great national parties, and it would be as absurd for me to claim that my election was a triumph of either of those parties as it is now for the contestant. That no regard to our political divisions here were paid in the election is shown throughout the testimony, as all of the witnesses speak of the Chaves and Clever parties.

On page 46 (ibid.) Don Antonio Guadalupe Corduva, an honest and intelligent citizen, gives the following answer:

"Question. To what political party do you belong? Do you know the difference between a Democrat and a Radical?

"Answer. I do not; I belong to the Chaves party. I did belong to the Clever party, but now belong to the Chaves party."

It will thus be seen that the last election for Delegate to Congress was not carried on upon any party issue, and that personal preference and local issues were the only questions involved. You can no more make out of my honorable contestant a Republican than you could make out of me a Democrat. When the Chaves party found itself defeated, believing that party prejudices might advance their cause in Congress, like the wolf in sheep's dress, they raised the cry of party. I, Mr. Speaker, had to leave my country on account of my sentiments of Republicanism. I went to New Mexico shortly after the close of the Mexican war, in one hand an ox whip and in the other an ax to cut a road for my team to carry supplies to our suffering soldiers in that distant Territory. In that country I found an honest and a hospitable people, and I did link my destiny with them.

It should astonish no one that there are still found in that Territory a few nabobs or proud, hereditary, domineering, rich men, who still, dreaming of days long gone by, in order to retain their power should even furnish money to bribe an official and thus devise means to prevent a stranger—an ox-driver, as they called it in New Mexico during the political campaign, but what is now denominated a carpet-bagger—from representing them in the councils of the nation. If you desire to maintain and perpetuate the influence of a few men whose power is only a remnant of the feudalism that prevailed under the old peon-driving monarchy of Spain you will vote to give the contestant this seat. If you desire to extend the area of civilization, to encourage emigration to and to promote the growth and wealth of this remote portion of our domain, you will reject the evidence which has passed under the manipulation of the political adventurer who by some strange accident holds position in the Territory, and carry out the will of the people of New Mexico as expressed in the election, and confirm the right of the sitting member to his seat.

Naturalization, Ireland, Fenianism, Right of Expatriation, Protection to Citizens, &c.

SPEECH OF HON. W. E. ROBINSON,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 2, 1869.

The House having under consideration the President's message relating to naturalized citizens imprisoned in Ireland, &c.—

Mr. ROBINSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: On the 3d of February, 1868, I introduced a bill to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, to allow bona fide residents of this country who had no home and intended to have none except in this country to become citizens, leaving the right of suffrage to be determined by the States, which usually require a year's residence before voting. At that time neither party had made their nominations for the Presidency. Leading Republicans—the distinguished dead of Pennsylvania, Mr. Stevens, the eloquent Senator from Illinois, Mr. Yates, the powerful head of the New York Tribune, Mr. Greeley, with other Republican Senators, Representatives, and editors—were known to be in favor of some such bill as I then introduced. When I proposed that bill I had no doubt of its passage or the passage of some bill substantially like it. It had been discovered that all men were created equal and had an inalienable right to self-government. The sky of my confidence was serene and cloudless through the May of Chicago and the July of New York, and up to election day in November. That bright sky is now clouded. It seems, in place of facilitating naturalization and conforming that department of citizenship to the doctrine of manhood or universal suffrage, that every obstacle is to be thrown into the path which leads to the ballot-box, at least for those who have the misfortune to have been born in Ireland or with a white skin.

It is a curious, if not also a lamentable fact, that before every election appeals are made to naturalized voters with such prodigality that the more unsuspecting seem bewildered in their efforts to distinguish between their real and pretended friends. It is natural for them therefore to suspend their judgment till after election to see whether the tone of compliment in either party may change. Far be it from me to try to make capital for this or that party out of the question now before the House, but I must be permitted to say that no party can ever gain the confidence and support of the naturalized citizens, however prodigal they may be before election in what at home is called "blarney," if after election they blacken their character and try to abridge their privileges. Now, I contend:

1. That naturalization, in place of having more restrictions thrown around it and made more difficult, should be made easier and less expensive.

2. That under our advanced ideas of "manhood suffrage" our naturalization laws are unjust and illiberal.

3. That the best plan to prevent naturalization frauds is to let every bona fide resident of our country vote for the officers who are to make and execute laws for the government of his person and property.

4. That obstructing immigration is as much a crime now as it was when the immortal signers of the Declaration of Independence charged it as such upon King George.

5. That throwing obstacles in the way of naturalization is obstructing immigration. You cannot induce large immigration of Europeans if they are classed lower than Africans. That we should so far encourage immigration as to offer free passage from all European countries to the United States to every proper person of sound mind and body, either in our national vessels or by a paid steam marine, and a free voice in the choice of those who shall govern them here.

6. That the people of Ireland and Germany, the two great sources of our population, are sound republicans, and need no state of probation to teach them how to vote.

7. That the only excuse ever offered for a five-years' probation for aliens, or any probation at all, was that they might learn how to vote, and this excuse has been rendered absurd by our recent legislation to secure universal manhood suffrage and admitting the most ignorant to the ballot-box.

8. That the useless provision in our Constitution prohibiting any naturalized citizen from being President or Vice President of the United States should be abolished, leaving the American people free to choose the best men for these offices, irrespective of birth or previous condition.

9. That every proper person settling in this country should be allowed to become a citizen as soon as he produces evidence satisfactory to any court of record that he has no residence, either present or prospective, elsewhere, and that it is bona fide his intention to remain in the country and be true to the Constitution.

10. That the subject of voting should be left with the several States, or if regulated by Congress should be on one year's residence in the State in which the vote is cast, and if an alien by birth six months' previous citizenship.

11. The best way to prevent any person breaking over a fence to get at the enjoyment of any inalienable right is to take away the fence. Why should earth, air, water, or suffrage be monopolized?

12. That every effort to confine naturalization to the United States courts is simply an effort to render naturalization impossible, and is therefore a revival of the creed of Know-Nothingism; and have prevented some twenty per cent. or more of those legally entitled to naturalization and suffrage from the enjoyment of those rights under our laws.

13. That the obstacles already thrown in the way of naturalization, by State laws requiring additional time and unequal registration,

From the earliest times we have had this anti-immigration policy. Not contented with the wise provision in the bill of 1790, made by Congress under Washington, requiring only two years' residence in the country and one year in the State, it was increased to fourteen years. Our minister to England, Rufus King, thought our country would be disgraced if such men as Thomas Addis Emmett were allowed to emigrate to this country, and protested to Lord Castlereagh against it. This anti-Irish feeling cropping out here now, if successful at any time, would have ruined as it would now ruin the country. Had the wishes of such men as Rufus King prevailed what would have been the destiny of our country? Say, for instance, if these loyal leaguers of a former day had stopped immigration in 1790? Our free population then was three million two hundred and fifty thousand. Their descendants, it is estimated in a report made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BANKS] to this House January 27, 1868, would now be less than ten millions; and less than fourteen millions, the whole colored population included. The balance of the people, some twenty-four millions, are immigrants or descendants of immigrants arriving in this country since 1790. Had these anti-immigration men had their way we would be a mere pigmy in the family of nations. Twenty-two millions of our people would have given their resources, genius, fame, and power to other countries. They would be aliens here. We should have had no Grant and no Sheridan. Steamboat navigation and the electric telegraph, reaping machines and cylinder presses, would have been European and not American discoveries. Fulton and Morse, McCormick and Hoe, would have made other nations famous. The same spirit if now indulged would compel other Fultons and Morses, McCormicks and Hoes, to be born abroad.

This whole outcry of naturalization frauds, principally aimed at New York and Brooklyn, and at their residents of Irish birth and descent, is wicked and dishonest. More frauds are perpetrated in other parts of the country than in New York and Brooklyn. These two cities have never had their just share of power or their full vote either in the State or nation. In other parts of the country one out of every four or five vote; in New York city and Brooklyn only one out of every five or six vote. These cities are the heart, the brain, the enterprise of the country. They have more schools, more education, more refinement, more wealth, more intellect, more newspapers, than any other population of equal number in the world. Governors elsewhere would hardly be competent for New York constables! Judges from rural districts would lack talent safely to cross Broadway in omnibus times! These two cities contribute more than their quota of soldiers to our armies, money to our Treasury, and character to the country, more than any other equal number of population elsewhere in the Union. The number of fraudulent native voters is larger than that of fraudulent naturalized voters. A native fraudulent vote is easier than a naturalized fraudulent vote. I presume that more fraudulent Republican votes were cast in the southern States within the last twelve months than all the fraudulent Democratic votes cast in New York since the foundation of our Government. More fraudulent votes by unnaturalized colored men, I presume, were cast in our last November election than all the fraudulent white naturalized votes cast in New York since the first grand fraudulent pipe-laying in that city over a quarter of a century ago.

And what does the whole of this naturalization fraudulent vote amount to? What has caused all this commotion throughout the country? The heavens seem darkened, the thunder rolls in rapid succession after vivid flashes of lightning, earth and sky are mingled together, and yet after all the cause of this terrific commotion is simply that a respectable white inhabitant of the United States, having no other country but the Union, owing allegiance to no other flag, toiling for the country's good and willing to die in her defense, has offered a ballot as his neighbors, no more honest, patriotic, or intelligent than himself, have done. Disguise it as you will, sugar it over as you may, that outcry of fraudulent naturalized voting is aimed at white manhood suffrage, and that hatred which bubbles over in reams of bills to amend our naturalization laws and runs around with peripatetic committees to investigate frauds are aimed at Irishmen here. And yet, sir, Ireland has been the source of our wealth and power. A great majority of our people, more than half of this Congress, are Irish by birth or blood, and the minority would disfranchise the majority if they had the power.

Are gentlemen honest in this shout for manhood suffrage? No, sir; they are not sincere. Strip all pretense away and the fact stands out naked that every effort of this party contending for manhood suffrage while shrieking against naturalization is nothing more nor less than a distrust of their own race. Everywhere they are throwing down the barriers to negro suffrage, and everywhere blocking the way to white suffrage. With what face can men stand up here and talk of universal or manhood suffrage while they are straining every energy to thwart, obstruct, and curtail naturalization, and to make it as difficult and expensive as possible for the poor and honest workingman to reach the polls?

According to a statement which I have received from the statistical bureau of the Treasury Department there arrived here from foreign countries from July 1, 1863, to June 30, 1868—five years—1,476,789 passengers, or in round numbers, 300,000 a year; of these 177,676 were citizens of the United States, and 12,819 were foreigners who did not intend to remain, leaving the total actual immigrants 1,286,294. Here is a number of men equal to some entire countries of Europe who have no voice in the election of those who are to govern their country; a whole nation disfranchised, and disfranchised for no crime. Thousands of them are men of great learning, professors, clergymen, literary men, engineers, writers for the press; and not one of this vast number allowed to vote, though they are educating your children, preaching to your congregations, editing and reporting for your papers, able to teach your sons the way to learning and yourselves the way to heaven, but not permitted to cast a vote, which you would monopolize for the lowest and most ignorant of the descendants of Ham.

I will mention two distinguished men who have immigrated within the past year. Rev. James McCosh was sent for to Ireland, and brought over here and inaugurated president of Princeton College. Within the limits of mental philosophy throughout the world no mind soars above his. The colored man who shaves the students or blacks their boots or opens their oysters can have the Constitution of the United States changed to allow him to vote immediately, under the hypocritical party watchword of manhood suffrage, while Dr. James McCosh, the head of the college, must remain disfranchised for four years and six months longer, perhaps for his lifetime, that he may learn from this colored fellow-citizen how to deposit a ballot.

Rev. Dr. John Hall, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church, New York city, was sent for to Ireland. Sunday after Sunday that church is thronged with the wealth, beauty, and intellect of that great city, who hang spell-bound on the witchery of his words; and yet there are loyal leaguers in that very church who clamor for the right of manhood suffrage in their colored coachmen and flunkies, and labor to keep their own pastor disfranchised for four years longer. I will not stop to torture my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who thought to overwhelm me with his sarcasm a few days since, in merely suggesting to me that perhaps I would insist on sending over to Ireland to bring immigrants over, by reminding him that here are actual cases where Princeton College and the Fifth Avenue church of New York did send over to Ireland for two immigrants to instruct them in science and religion, and nobody but a fool supposes the country will be the worse for it. Now, these are but two out of the million and a half of immigrants coming to us within the last five years. There were thousands of others of great mental and moral worth—teachers, preachers, editors, poets, philosophers, artisans, mechanics—and better than all, and as well deserving of the right to vote, the honest laboring masses; all kept five years disfranchised by a party shouting itself hoarse in the very acme of their inconsistency for manhood suffrage. Professor Agassiz, Professor Lieber—who, I am sorry to learn, is here urging further restrictions in naturalization against his fellow-immigrants—Archbishop Hughes, General Siegel, General Schurz, Garibaldi, General Meagher, John Mitchell, General Corcoran, Robert Bonner, General Shields, Ericsson, George H. Stuart, A. T. Stewart, James McCosh, Richard O'Gorman, Thomas Addis Emmett, and John Hall, many presidents of our colleges, hundreds of our most distinguished divines, one half of our editors and reporters, have been or are kept five years disfranchised under manhood suffrage on the plea that they must watch field-hands and plantation servants for five years to learn the art of dropping a piece of paper in the ballot-box for the election of their political servants!

As a general rule one out of every five of the common run of population votes, but in that population the number of children largely predominates. Now, in this immigration of 1,476,789 souls only 270,567 were under fifteen years of age; 1,206,222 were over fifteen. There are also more males—about one fourth more—than females in an immigrant population. I do not think it would be out of the way to say, after deducting women and children and allowing for deaths, that there are half a million white men who have arrived here within the past five years now over twenty-one years of age who are not allowed to vote in the only country they can call their own. These disfranchised white men hold the balance of power in every northern and western State in the Union, and this probably accounts for their disfranchisement; but the party that stakes its hopes upon their disfranchisement will come to speedy and certain grief.

Did it ever enter into the heads of any of our committees investigating naturalization frauds to inquire how far short the naturalized voters fall in securing their just proportion of votes? New York and Brooklyn have never polled seventy per cent. of their male inhabitants over twenty-one years of age, and yet these screech owls of party are deafening the public ear and filling the echoing air with shrieks of woe at the number who do vote. Fraudulent naturalization! Why, sir, take the entire number of naturalized voters, those alleged to be fraudulent and all, and I was going to say that it would not amount to seventy per cent. of those entitled to naturalization. Instead of screeching against over-naturalization you should be urging more thorough naturalization. Instead of obstructing it and defeating it by your teeming propositions to amend, you should be encouraging and increasing it, for it is a bad country where its citizens do not perform the duties of citizenship. There ought to be, according to the average of our immigration, at least one hundred thousand citizens naturalized every year.

I venture to say they do not average seventy thousand, and yet the dishonest party shriekers keep the country in turmoil and agitation because about three quarters of those who should vote actually do vote!

On the 18th of May, 1868, I offered a joint resolution providing that the American people might have a free choice in the election of their President and Vice President. Is it not strange that any ignorant field-hand or city loafer of any color, education, or standing is eligible to the Presidency and Vice Presidency, and yet Agassiz, Shields, McCosh, Hall, Schurz, and Seigel are not eligible. Sheridan, had he been born two or three years closer to his parents' marriage, could not be President of the United States if all the people in the United States and every Electoral College voted for him. It always has been, and always will be believed by many that General Jackson was born in Ireland. Did it make him any less a good President whether born in Ireland or South Carolina? There may come a time when another Grant will arise, who, though born in the country of Shields or Schurz, would be the most desirable man for President, and if so why should the people be debarred from electing the best man? I acknowledge that I dislike this everlasting amending, or rather altering, of our Constitution. I wish our Framers had provided that it should not be amended over once in twenty years, nor then without a previous yearly publication of the proposed amendments for five years in the papers published in the capital. But if any amendment at all should be made it is this which I proposed nearly a year ago.

I have also contended that we should send to Ireland and bring over free every good emigrant willing to come. This, I think, will yet be done. Every immigrant is, over and above his expenses, worth $1,000, if not double or treble that sum. How much was Ericsson worth, who invented the monitor to meet the Merrimac just in time, perhaps, to save the Union from destruction? Could we have afforded to dispense with him for $1,000? How much was Fulton's father or Morse's grandfather or Hoe's father worth? Immigration every year is worth to us in workingmen, if none of them or their children should be inventors or otherwise distinguished, $300,000,000. By paying their expenses over, which under proper management need not cost more than ten to twenty dollars apiece, immigration would double and treble itself, and thus add to our national wealth $1,000,000,000 a year. This we should do for the sake of humanity. There they are enslaved and starving. Here we could enfranchise and clothe and feed them, or rather they would take care of themselves here. We should either do this or annex Ireland. I rather think even this will come. I have no doubt that Ireland will soon be either an independent republic or a part of this Union. We could afford to let the Alabama claims sleep if England would quietly acquiesce in this. It would be for her benefit as well as ours. Ireland to her is a burden, to us she would be a blessing; to her she is rebel, to us she would be faithful and true. She is nearer to us than California or Oregon—much nearer than Alaska. Homogeneity makes her nearest to us; heterogeneousness makes her farthest from England. The cable cord of intelligence stretching between us binds us in unison, and the wire that is insulated from the rest of the world thrills unceasingly with electric love from shore to shore.

Let me say a few words here, once for all, in defense of Ireland and her sons against the abuse so often aimed at them. Unworthy would I be of calling her mother if I failed to raise a filial voice in her praise or if I omitted, amid the darkness that broods over her destiny, to call attention to the light that still plays upon her history. To others be the unwelcome task of chronicling her misfortunes, her degradation, and her misery. Be it mine to evoke from her still tuneful harp one note of praise, and to pluck another leaf of laurel from the tree of time with which to adorn her still radiant brow.

Poor forsaken Niobe! Far away beyond the billow she sits to-day a crownless queen, yet still in the queenly majesty of centuries greatness ruling with the scepter of affection myriads of her loyal children. From every clime and every sea, from a multitude greater than any monarch governs, comes the polyglot song of her praise; and throughout the world the hope is still cherished by her children that the night of her sorrow is past and the morning of her glory is advancing to the full noon of freedom and independence.

Strange it is that we know so little of Ireland in this country. Indeed, so far as her history is concerned, except from the prejudiced pens of English writers, Ireland is as little known to the people of the United States as is Japan. Too many of her own sons are responsible for this. Too many of them are afraid to toast her green immortal shamrock.

Of all most sickening spectacles or sounds to me the most sickening and offensive is to see or hear an Irishman mouth over and cover up his honest Irish brogue with a mixture of Yankee and cockney dialect; to disguise with some contortion or prefix the grand old name of Patrick which his pious parents had given him. While I am not in favor of having Ireland's sons all the time shouting their mother's praise offensively into unwilling ears, yet I do love to see a man proud of his native country while willing to die for the country of his adoption. And to the credit of the poorer and homelier classes of Irishmen be it spoken that they are seldom guilty in this respect. It is generally those who would rub elbows with a mushroom aristocracy, or those who are Irish only by descent—and such a descent!—that turn up their ignorant noses at this or that as too Irish for them! I love the filial feeling which breathes in the lines of that great Irishman, Oliver Goldsmith:

"Where'er I roam, whatever lands to see,
My heart untraveled fondly turns to thee.
To thee my (mother), turns with ceaseless pain,
And drags at each remove a lengthening chain."

And let not America be jealous on account of this love of Ireland. We were born of Ireland, we are wedded to the Union, and believe me no true woman will ever be jealous of her husband's love for his mother. The man who does not love his mother is not worthy of wife or children, and that Irishman will make the best American who kindles his patriotism oftenest at the fire of filial affection. We all hear daily and hourly of Ireland's degradation and misery. From every ship entering our harbors we see masses of humanity flung like sea-weed on our shores, and this daily and hourly spectacle of human wretchedness stamps too broadly on the American mind the outlines of that picture which represents Ireland; but who cares to turn his attention to the elevation which even the lowest of these masses suddenly obtain in a country where "there's bread and work for all," or cares to consider that other fact that the world for centuries has been and is now and will be more and more each succeeding generation governed by Irish intellect? That in peace and war, in the camp and the Cabinet, in literature and the fine arts, in the studio of the painter and sculptor, on the stage, in music, oratory, and poetry, Ireland stands to-day as she has stood in days gone by, foremost in rank and highest in fame?

"When the Saxon degraded and trampled lay down
And trembled to every foeman that came,
The universe rang with her lofty renown
And fancy stood mute in the light of her fame."

I have contended and do still contend that numerically the strongest element in American society is Irish; that in the texture of American intellect some of the firmest fibers are Irish; that in the reservoir of American blood the Irish contingent is not the thinnest nor the coldest. What names are more honored in Maine and Massachusetts than Kavanagh and Knox and Sullivan? What name is more proudly remembered in New Hampshire than Matthew Thornton? What colony has given to the Union better names than the Irish colony of Londonderry in New Hampshire? What name is more honored amid Vermont's green mountains than that of "The spouse of Molly Stark?" What names would New York take in exchange for her Clintons and Emmetts and Montgomeries? What would the list of Pennsylvania's great names look like if General Wayne, Charles Thomson, Commodore Barry, Moylan, Taylor, Wilson, Kane, Meade, and other Irish patriots were stricken from it? What would little Delaware be without her Reads, McKears, and McDonoughs? What would Maryland be without her Carrolls; or South Carolina without her Rutledges and Lynches and McDuffies and Calhouns? What would Tennessee be without her Andrew Jacksons and Polks and Johnsons; or North Carolina without her Grahams and Gastons and Moores; or Ohio without her McLeans and Phil. Sheridans; or Louisiana without her Porters; or Texas without her Houstons? Yet these are but a fraction of the numbers of Irish names scattered starlike in the firmament of glory which overarches the States of our Union!

Nay more, if we consider the mere physical forces of Irish sinew now tugging at the oar of labor in our country, what would the United States be in mere physical development without this power? Why, look at the force of three hundred thousand fresh, willing, and able laborers added every year to the dynamics of our country; and yet while God is lavishing these riches upon us there are parties who would obstruct and turn away this tide of wealth which flows without ebbing upon our shores. Just imagine what this population of three hundred thousand a year means—most of them adults, young men and young women, three fourths of them unmarried, yet nearly all marriageable—bringing money with them, too, averaging over one hundred dollars each. The decay of age and the weakness of infancy lopped off from both ends, and the vigor of humanity ready to make itself available and useful for mental, moral, and physical development. A whole city of people, larger than any city in the Union save three, added yearly to our population, ready made and in working order. What a calamity to have such a city sunk by an earthquake, but not a greater calamity to this country than to have immigration cease for a single year.

The native genius of America might plan railroads, canals, and cities, but the physical power is necessary to put that planning into execution, and Ireland is the great deposit of physical power on which America has drawn at will and without protest. This force is on every railway and canal. It is tunneling the mountains and lifting up the valleys to form easy highways for the footsteps of commerce. It is on every round of the ladder, following the progressing height of public buildings. It is this moment standing on the solid granite which in the next moment is flying in the air from successive explosions which shake the earth with their concussions. In the valleys, on the mountains, by the lakes, along the rivers the mental and physical forces of Ireland are at work, through toil and turmoil, sweat and exhaustion, amid dangers and difficulties, and brushed by the passing wing of death, building up and perfecting the grand architecture of this country's destiny.

Poor forsaken Niobe! Her tale is a tale of woe as well as a story of pride. Her sons, like her poetry, are a curious mixture of melancholy and of levity. The tear and the smile blend together like the rainbow's colors; shining in sorrow, sad mid pleasure, her sun is clouded as soon as it has arisen. Her patriots, names she dares not breathe. They sleep unhonored in nameless tombs. Their memory is kept green only by the tears which she sheds upon their holy graves. They longed to see the day of their country's glory, and when that was denied them the next dearest blessing was the pride, the honor of dying for her. And still the sacred fire of patriotism is kept alive; one after another of her sons mounts the scaffold or welcomes the prison. In this noon of the nineteenth century, while English hypocrites have been lecturing us upon mercy to our fallen prisoners, her ermined tyrants have been passing sentence upon scores of patriots whose only crimes have been fidelity to their native land and devotion to her cause—patriots in the luster of whose lives the fame of their Hampdens and Sidneys fades into insignificance; patriots sentenced to punishment worse than death because they love the green above the red:

"For they're hanging men and women there
For wearing of the green."

No matter how we may differ about the wisdom and feasibility of their actions we cannot deny to these young men now sacrificing their liberty for that of Ireland the homage due to them as followers in that long train of radiant demigods which embraces the names of Emmett and Fitzgerald, Kosciuszko, Tell, and Washington, and which will embrace the names of Barry, Casey, Dillon, Duggan, Hayes, Lynch, Kennealy, O'Connell, O'Donovan-Rossa, and O'Ryan, now suffering cruel imprisonment as a punishment for their patriotism.

If we, as Americans, knew more of Ireland and her people we should feel less alarm about admitting them to citizenship. I wish we had some well-digested epitome of Irish history for our schools. We are more interested in her history than in that of England or of any other country in the world. Her people are ours and ours will soon be hers. A majority of the American people are Irish by birth or descent. Ireland is a greater nation to-day than England, not in compact, but in diffused power. She has recently had more of her sons as soldiers, with arms in their hands and knowledge to use them, than any other nation except the United States.

Half the British army are Irishmen. Their most distinguished officers have been Irish. The writers for British magazines and English newspapers have been Irishmen. England's architects, sculptors, painters, astronomers, actors, composers, and dramatists have been Irishmen. England's chief orators, poets, statesmen, and generals for the last century have been Irishmen—rather poor Irishmen? too, yet good enough to lead and govern England. Other countries, too, are enriched with Ireland's blood. Spain's uplifted lance has been most powerful in the hands of an O'Donnell; the spear of Austria shone brightest in the line of battle in the grasp of a Nugent; at the head of the Army of the Potomac the sword of the Union flashed fiercest from the scabbard of a Meade, and the star of hope on the helmet of America outshone all others along the valley of the Shenandoah where Sheridan rode.

The history of Ireland is an ancient and an honorable one. She had lived through two thousand years of glory before England was known. Fifteen hundred years before the commencement of the Christian era she was skilled in art and science. Nearly a thousand years before that era her Parliament sat at Tara, and had abler men than any English Parliament ever had, except such English Parliaments as had their dullness redeemed by the presence of one or more Irishmen. That Parliament framed wiser laws under Ollamh Fodhla than England now has under Disraeli or Gladstone. The psalter of Tara, which for two thousand years was a guide for kings and priests, was superior to the British constitution. Its laws provided for national hospitality, diffusion of knowledge, subdivision of land, and punishment of crime. England claims trial by jury as an invention of Anglo-Saxonism, but Ireland had it a thousand years before the Anglo-Saxon ceased disputing with hogs for the roots and nuts of the forest. Chivalry, honor, rank, music, poetry, and martial courage were fostered and promoted as social customs. While Roman, Dane, Saxon, and Norman overran and conquered England they were vanquished and expelled from Ireland. With the Romans the Irish waged a war of four hundred years and drove them back over the Alps, at the base of which the last pagan king of Ireland, victorious over the Romans, fell from a stroke of lightning.

The Irish were the first of western nations to receive Christianity, and the only one where the conversion was made without shedding of blood. St. Patrick, in the early part of the fifth century, achieved this honor for Ireland. Soon afterward Ireland became a nation of missionaries, who taught the people of western Europe astronomy, architecture, literature, languages, morals, music, and poetry. The youth of France, England, Scotland, and other countries flocked to her colleges for their instruction. In the gloomy night of barbarism, through the dark ages of Gothic ignorance, Ireland was the light-house on the shores of time from which religion and learning penetrated Europe; and hence she received the name of the Island of Saints, as her missionaries carried knowledge of letters everywhere with veneration for the Cross.

During the ninth and tenth centuries the Irish waged a war with the Danes, who had overrun England and governed her with a line of their kings; but they failed to conquer Ireland, and were finally driven from the island after the battle of Clontarf.

In the twelfth century England invaded Ireland; but after a four hundred years' struggle England had hardly power to preserve its rule in one eighth of the island, known as "the Pale," and not till nearly the close of the seventeenth century did England gain a solid footing in Ireland. How her possession there has been maintained let centuries of oppression, bigotry, persecution, confiscation, and blood answer. Still, through the thickest gloom Irish intellect blazed up and Irish patriotism still renewed its vows at the altar of independence. Curran, Grattan and O'Connell appealed to reason; Fitzgerald, Emmett, O'Brien, Meagher and Mitchell appealed to the sword. Reason was trampled down and profaned in her temples; the sword was broken; her priests and prophets, however, still worship at her altar and foretell her independence. The stars of heaven will sing together for joy, and the nations of the earth will clap their hands at the advent of her regeneration.

But Ireland is not all of Ireland. Her sons and their descendants in other nations are multiples of those at home. The thousands of her people that flocked to France and the Continent after the treaty of Limerick have given to these countries much of their best blood. Other thousands more recently have gone to Australia. Many found homes in the South American republics, which they helped to establish; but it is with the greatest pride that we point to America as the country in which the Irish have found their happiest and most congenial home. Until quite recently this country has been the theme of England's ridicule. Her tourists traveled over it and saw nothing but a wide and rude territory, rendered more uninviting by uncivilized society. While pirating from the productions of our literary men there was a perpetual sneer upon her lip and a flippant taunt upon her tongue as she scornfully reiterated her question, "Who reads an American book?" But recently, while missing no opportunity to cripple our energies and to dwarf our power, she has set herself to work to prove that we are her child! Some ignorant English writers started the foolish idea that England was Anglo-Saxon; and then they set to work to Anglo-Saxonize us, too, and adding our population to hers, she baptizes us all into the Anglo-Saxon family, claims that as the governing race of the world, and subscribes the absurdity with her Q. E. D!

To all this I reply that the English element is the weakest in this country. The English colonies of Virginia and Massachusetts, and all their descendants for a century after their arrival, did not number as many souls as landed from Ireland from a single ship at Castle Garden, in New York.

In 1850 Boston had a population of 138,788, and of these 52,923 were natives of Ireland, and one half of the people of Boston between five and fifteen years of age were born of foreign parents. More than one half of the children born in Boston in 1859 were of Irish parents. This was ten years ago. I presume it is entirely within the truth to say that there are seven of other races for every one of the Anglo-Saxon race in this country, and that the proportion is rapidly increasing in favor of the Celt. Take, for instance, the last national census of the State of New York and see how curiously our population is mixed and mixing itself. The population of the State in 1860 was 3,880,735; of this 2,879,455 were natives of this country, born of native and foreign-born parents, and 1,001,280 were foreign born. In the county of Kings the natives were 165,157, the foreign born 109,077; of the population of the State all the other States in the Union contributed 279,635, while Ireland gives us 498,072, or nearly double as many as all the other States together. The little State of Connecticut gives us 53,141; Massachusetts, 50,004; Vermont, 46,990; New Jersey, 36,499; Pennsylvania, 30,232; California, 451; Kansas, 26; Oregon, 17; Texas, 140; and the sea, 375. Ireland also gives New York about double as many as all other foreign countries together. Thus:

Ireland.....	498,072
England.....	106,011
Scotland.....	27,641
Wales.....	7,938
Holland.....	5,354
Italy.....	1,862
Russia.....	1,013
Asia.....	206
Australia.....	68
Greece.....	35
Germany.....	256,212
British America.....	53,273
France.....	21,236
Switzerland.....	6,166
Poland.....	2,236
Denmark.....	1,136
Spain.....	809
Africa.....	69
China.....	77
Turkey.....	39

In the State of New York there were in 1860 583,594 native voters and 239,832 foreign-born voters, and in the county of Kings we have 29,933 native voters and 28,234 foreign-born voters, a very large majority of foreign-born voters being Irishmen, with 53,435 aliens—disfranchised white residents—competent in every way to vote as well as their neighbors, but who are studying hard for five years to learn how to get a piece of paper through a hole in the top of the ballot-box.

From statistics such as these the admirers of Anglo-Saxonism will see that its day in this country, if it ever had a day, is rapidly passing away, and that the star of the Celt is in the ascendant.

It is perhaps difficult to tell with any certainty, from the intermingling of the kindred nations of the Caucasian race, who are Celts and who are Saxons. But it is not difficult to determine which race is most desirable for this country. The Anglo-Saxon race migrated westward from the shores of the Baltic. They were a fair-haired, blue-eyed, and florid-complexioned race. They were not an inventive race; they were low in the scale of the fine arts. In general they had no ear for music, and mistook noise for it. Their self-esteem was great; they looked upon themselves as superior to all other races, yet in Britain they were enslaved by a Norman dynasty; on the Continent they were broken, crushed, and enslaved by the Hapsburgs and Brandenburg. In Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Norway, Holstein they were sunk into insignificance and became the degraded pieces of clay upon which the conqueror planted his unobstructed foot. They made poor soldiers, principally because of the awkwardness of their form and the slowness of their movements, although occasionally under Celtic drill they became passable food for powder and not altogether indifferent sheathing for steel. The Anglo-Saxon and the dark ages were synonymous and coincident, each producing the other. He found Europe in a blaze of Celtic light; he enveloped it in a pall of Gothic darkness! And such is the Anglo-Saxon race, to which some writers would degrade the Americans.

The Celt, the original race of western Europe, the original type of the people of Greece, Rome, France, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and Brittany, has written his own renown in the world's history. He has played at the game of war for nearly four thousand years. War is his favorite pastime. In stature and weight inferior to the Saxon, yet in muscular energy and rapidity of action far superior. His natural weapon is the sword. He is jealous on points of honor; extreme in self-respect; an admirer of beauty of color and beauty of form, and therefore liberal in his patronage of the fine arts. Inventive and imaginative he dictates the laws of fashion and refinement to the world. He has a fine taste and a musical ear. He is warm-hearted; full of deep sympathies. The great and leading family is France, then Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and other nationalities which are giving to the United States a large majority of its people. Hereafter the destinies of this country are in the hands of the Celt, and chiefly of the Irish Celt.

In illustrating the difference between the Saxon and the Celt, Knox, in his work on the different races of man, instances their favorite books: The Maid of Orleans, by Voltaire, representing the Celt, witty and refined in spite of its objectionable features; the Saxon represented by Hudibras, coarse and brutal, and abounding in that pleasant and comfortable feeling which measures the worth of all things from a bishopric to a bale of cotton by its value in money:

"For what's the worth of anything
But as much money as 'twill bring?"

War is the pastime of the Celt. Who have been the warriors and conquerors in the battles waged among men for the last thousand years? What was Alfred the Saxon to Charlemagne or Brian Boru, the Celts? Who was the Anglo-Saxon rival in arms of Napoleon, the Celt? What generals has Anglo-Saxonism produced equal to Hugh O'Neil, Phelim Roe, Gough, Napier, or Wellington, or Ulysses S. Grant, or Stonewall Jackson, or Philip H. Sheridan, or Winfield S. Hancock? It was French bravery that redeemed the Crimean war from utter ridicule. Take away French, Scotch, Irish, and other Celtic generals from the records of war and you impoverish history.

Believe me, I am not one of those who would make the battle-fields on which hostile humanity has met and melted into blood the only spots worthy of room in geography. There are other spots of earth worthy of veneration and other heroes worthy of the highest honors. I would rather pluck a thorn from the heart of grief than win a laurel crown from the blood of the bravest. I would rather hush one groan in the bosom of suffering humanity than hear the shouts of a thousand blood-stained victories. I would rather be told of the drying of one tear on the widow's cheek or from the orphan's eye than see rivers incarnadined with blood, to reflect from their crimson waves the blushing honors with which war glorifies its heroes. I would rather crown the mechanic, the artisan, the inventor, the benefactor, with honors and laurels than deify violence and idolize human butchery.

HO. OF REPS.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

But, alas! what is history but the lives of warriors? What is France but Charlemagne and Napoleon? What is England but Marlborough and Wellington? Marathon, Platea, Mycale, Canae, Hastings, Bannockburn, Poitiers, Agincourt, Blenheim, Fontenoy, the Boyne, Lexington, Ticonderoga, Yorktown, Cremona, Marengo, New Orleans, Waterloo, Buena Vista, Bull Run, Antietam, and Gettysburg—what are they all but a few of History's footprints on the pathway of Time?

And if martial daring; if marching up to the cannon's mouth; if offering a fearless bosom as a sheath for the sword; if coolly receiving or impulsively delivering the charge when the steel instrument of Bayonne rips the quivering flesh and pierces the palpitating heart; if pushing these same bayonets through a hissing cloud of lead and fire into an opposing wall of quick and living flesh, if these be glorious deeds, then the Irish Celt is not inglorious. If glory's footsteps are traced in crimson; if the music by which she marches are the yell and shout of the onset, the clangor of conflicting arms; if the incense of her altars is the curl of the cannon's smoke which lifts itself lazily from the earth as if burdened with the doom of the dying, then have Irishmen spent no holiday trifling in glory's service. Clontarf, Ballinabewee, Benburb, the Boyne, Aughrim, and Limerick, are scenes where glory has drawn from Irish hearts artificial seas of blood on which her red flag floated unseen from shore to shore. The red footfalls of Irish bravery have kept time to the music of war's death-march on the burning sands of India. The clang of its armor and the shouts of its victories have multiplied themselves in the echoes of the Alps. Beneath their own green flag at Clontarf and Benburb; beneath the tricolor at Cremona and Fontenoy; beneath the cross of St. George at Waterloo, Lucknow, and Balaklava, and beneath that brighter and more dearly-beloved banner of our Union, its azure robe glittering with increasing and brightening stars at Quebec and Princeton and Yorktown, at Niagara and New Orleans, at Palo Alto and Chapultepec, at Buena Vista and Churubusco, at Fair Oaks and Malvern Hill, at Fredericksburg and the Wilderness, at New Orleans and Vicksburg, at Antietam and Gettysburg, down the Peninsula and up the Shenandoah, all the weary way from Bull Run to Richmond, Irish valor vindicated itself and Irish courage shone triumphant. There is no secret in chemistry by which war's deep draught can be purged of Irish blood, no perception of vocal criticism to separate from war's music the sounds which Irishmen have mingled with it; no history of earth's red deluge can be written upon whose pages you may not read the immortality of their fame.

A man prejudiced against everything Irish may stand by the tombs of Boyle and Berkeley, Swift and Sheridan and Goldsmith, and deny to Ireland the homage due to genius. He may have listened to Miss O'Neill and Catharine Hayes, or witnessed the living delineations of Kean, Macklin, and Macready, and deny to Ireland all honor in music or the drama. He may have listened to the song of the bards, have heard Anacreon's sharp restrung to sweeter melody than its own original, and have drunk in "the loves of the angels," and refuse to Ireland all credit for poetry. He may gaze upon the names of Burke and Canning in Westminster, and deny that Ireland ever produced a statesman. He may listen to the still living echoes of Grattan's, Curran's, and O'Connell's voices, walk heedlessly over the ashes of Tone, Emmet, and Fitzgerald, or sit in the solitude of Van Dieman's Land with Mitchell, Meagher, and O'Brien, and deny to Ireland the virtue of patriotism; but he cannot, no man can, see in history Brian at Clontarf, O'Neill at Ballinabewee, Owen Roe at Benburb, Sarsfield at Limerick, Wellington at Waterloo, Gough and Napier in India, Montgomery at Quebec, Jackson at New Orleans, Shields at Cerro Gordo, Meade at Gettysburg, or Sheridan along the Shenandoah; he cannot, no man can, follow Con, and Nial and Dathi over Gaul and the Continent, read through the wars of Cromwell and William, the continental wars; through our own revolutionary struggle, the second war, the conquest of Mexico, and the battles for the Union; he cannot, no man can, trace through history's pages the bloody records of Cremona and Fontenoy, I care not how prejudiced, and say that the Irish Celt lacked courage, showed want of military genius, or failed in heroism, whether the green flag, the tricolor, the fiery cross, or the radiant stars and stripes floated over him on fields where he bravely conquered or undaunted fell!

I have before me a letter from Winfield Scott, in which he says of the Irish under him in the Mexican war, of whom there were over two thousand, that "not one ever turned his back upon the enemy, or faltered in advancing to the charge." I have also before me a letter written by one of the most distinguished generals in our late war, who had many opportunities of witnessing the bravery of the Irish brigade, the Corcoran legion, and other Irish brigades or regiments, in which he says:

"My admiration of the Irish as soldiers is unbounded." * * * "No race in the world is superior to them."

I have, too, before me a letter of John Quincy Adams, in which he says:

"I cannot, however, deny myself the pleasure of thanking you for the testimonial which you have borne to my long-cherished, deeply-rooted respect and affectionate attachment to the people of Ireland and the cause of their national independence, a respect and attachment coeval with the fall of Montgomerie before the walls of Quebec in the war of our Independence, confirmed and cemented by the virtues which I have witnessed through the course of a long life by personal acquaintance with numerous natives of the Emerald Isle."

What the Celt has done in history, or what he will do for this country, I have not time to tell nor daring to prophesy. Twenty-two of the signers of the Declaration of Independence were natives of or descendants from Celtic countries. So, too, were many of the framers of the Constitution. The heroes of our Navy and Army, O'Brien, Barry, Blakely, McDonough, Perry, Stewart, Shaw, Porter, Farragut, Montgomery, Wayne, Sullivan, Knox, Moylan, Stark, Clinton, and many others whom I might enumerate, were Celts. I believe Major General Benedict Arnold was an Anglo-Saxon, and was not descended from Irish ancestry!

Sir, I have been accused of speaking too often in this House in favor of Ireland and of Fenianism. The records of this House will show that during the time I have been in Congress I have not even once said a word on Fenianism. I have introduced no bill, offered no resolution, made no remarks on Fenianism. Nor have I said a word upon Ireland, except a speech of some fifteen minutes, at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. BANKS,] on a resolution from that committee expressing the sympathy of the American people with the people of Ireland and Crete, which afterward passed the Senate with Ireland left out. I have spoken frequently, not however too often, on the protection we owe to our citizens traveling abroad; but that is neither an Irish nor a Fenian, but a great American question. But, sir, if I had found time to say a word for Ireland, after attending to all matters in which my constituents were interested, why should I be censured for it? What has Ireland done, that for one of her sons in Congress,

"'Tis treason to love her, and death [political] to defend."

I trust I shall never forget to say a good word for Ireland, if I have time, after discharging my duties to my constituents. Why, sir, my district, for intelligence, wealth, industry, education, schools, and churches, for merchants, ministers, the medical and legal professions, is perhaps the best district in the United States, equal to almost any in all characteristics mentioned. The population of that district is perhaps less than one fifth of New England birth or origin, less than one fifth of English and their descendants. The remaining three fifths or more are German and Irish by birth and descent. By the last State census of 1865, which is generally believed to be lower than the facts would warrant, in Kings county, of which my district embraces about one half, there were 197,243 persons natives of the United States, and 112,869 persons natives of foreign countries, with about 1,000 born at sea or at places unknown; in all 311,090. Of these 59,444 were born in Ireland, 28,310 in Germany, 15,555 in England, 2,797 in Scotland, 1,461 in Canada, 1,195 in France, 241 in Holland. Of the voters in Kings county there were 29,950 native-born and 28,274 naturalized, in all 58,224 votes, while there were 53,435 aliens, unjustly kept so by the law requiring five years' probation. Let me say also that 1,482 Irish, 1,000 Germans, 364 English, 812 Scotch, and 782 aliens, and 1,216 of unknown birth, mostly perhaps aliens and generally Irish, enlisted in the armies of the Union. Consequently in 1865 there were 12,367 widows to 3,135 widowers in my county, showing that many had fallen in battle in defense of the flag of the Union. There were 13,297 families in the county without a single child, 13,418 families with one child each, 12,530 with two children each. The remainder of the 63,146 families ranged from three to twenty-two children in each family.

Now, whichever race has the most children in each family commands the future of Brooklyn. But take it as it is, whom do I represent as member of Congress chosen by this mixed population? I am proud of the New England minority in my district, but I am not ashamed of the Irish majority. Those seven hundred and eighty-two aliens who rushed to the defense of the country which had no claim upon them, those thousands of widows whose husbands fell on many a Union battle field, deserve to be remembered by Brooklyn's Representative on this floor. Surely, the fifty-nine thousand four hundred and forty-four natives of Ireland in my city who pay taxes, work, and fight for the country ought not to be ignored or obscured or eclipsed by the much smaller number of New England's sons. All the other States in the Union do not furnish to Brooklyn half as many of her population as she receives from Ireland alone. If I have therefore attended reasonably well to the general interests of my constituents I should not be blamed for saying a word for Ireland, from which more than one half of my constituency springs, and which is loved to-day as no nation except the United States ever was loved by all her sons, except a very despicable and recreant few.

Nor would it have been out of the way for me to have said a kind word of the Fenians if I had time after attending to my other duties. If I did not speak for them it was not because I was afraid to espouse their cause, but because they did not want speaking. They believe more in work than in talk. They would rather fight than speak. They would prefer to be reckoned men of deeds rather than men of words. But when they need defenders no man need be ashamed to become their advocate. Their cause is the cause of freedom through all ages, climes, and countries. Every tyrant dethroned, every bad Government revolutionized, was but an exhibition of Fenianism, and every one of their defenders shouted something as offensive as the cry of Fenianism.

It was Fenianism that watched the cradle of Moses and directed the footsteps of Pharaoh's daughter to the doomed infant's side. It perched upon the banners of the Israelites fleeing from their oppressors through the divided waves of the Red sea. It flashed through the pillar of fire and fringed the curtain of cloud by which the oppressed were guided and guarded. It tempered and strengthened and brightened "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon." It sanctified the sword in the hand of Agamemnon and inspired the muse of Homer to hymn his praise. It stooped with Samson between the main pillars of the temple and danced for joy upon the ruins in which the tyrants were buried. It aided Lycurgus to offset kings with senators and made Sparta a nation of soldiers. It throbbed in the heart of David, the youthful patriot, nerved his arm and guided the stone from his sling which smote down the Philistine oppressor of his race. It builded with Solomon, prophesied with Isaiah, and wept with Jeremiah over the oppressions of the people. It flung to the breeze the banner of rebellion and freedom under Aristomenes, whom defeat and treachery could not conquer nor adverse fortune overcome. It inspired Solon to substitute his own for Draco's infamous laws. It flamed before the astonished eyes of Belshazzar, in the royal palace of Babylon on the deserted banks of the Euphrates, the Fenian motto, "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." It inspired Cleisthenes to oppose Isagoras and to secure for Athens a complete democracy in place of an aristocracy. It inspired the Athenian triumvirate to oppose the Persian hordes whose armaments darkened the stormy Ægean, crowned the cause of freedom with victory through Miltiades at Marathon, deified defeat under Leonidas at Thermopylæ, and scattered the hosts of despotism by Themistocles and Eurymachus at Salamis, Platea, and Mycale. It seized the spies and heralds of Darius, demanding earth and water from Athens and Sparta as insignia of submission, and threw them into the wells and ditches to find there the elements demanded. It "wielded at will that fierce democracy" of Pericles against Cimon and his aristocracy. It inspired the tongue of Lucretia to accuse Tarquin with whom the tyrant was banished and royal dignity abolished. It attacked and expelled through Thrasylus the thirty tyrants from Athens, and restored democracy to the city; it struck successfully for Theban independence by Epaminondas at Leuctra; it marched with the advance of the younger Cyrus and covered the Anabasis of Xenophon; it fired the tongue of Demosthenes against Philip and Alexander, roused Macabæus to drive the Syrians from Judæa as it would now drive the oppressors from Ireland; it inscribed upon the banners of the Scipios that other Fenian motto, "Delenda est Carthago!" It instigated Cicero against Verres and Cataline, and was suspected of complicity with Brutus and Cassius in the conspiracy against Cæsar. It nerved the arm of Boadicea in her gallant but disastrous struggle for her country's independence. It inspired Alfred to drive the Danes from England. It preached the Crusades through Peter the Hermit, and roused the lion in the heart of Richard at Acre. It was the chief baron who wrung Magna Charta from John at Runnymede. It guided the arrow of Tell which clove the apple without touching a hair on the head of his darling boy, and winged the other for the heart of Gesler, through whose fall the independence of Switzerland was secured. It laid "the proud usurpers low," and tyrants fell at every blow, with William Wallace at Falkirk and with Robert Bruce at Bannockburn. It welcomed "to their gory bed or to victory" every Scotchman whose blood dyed the heather for the freedom of the soil on which it grew. It clothed itself in beauty in the young Maid of Orleans, and multiplied itself into everlasting maledictions upon England for her cowardly and cruel taking off. It stood at the helm and filled the sails of Columbus. It rebelled with Wat Tyler and stirred up O'Neill against Elizabeth. It preached through Milton and sung through Shakespeare. It crouched under the bridge which trembled beneath the hoofs of Charles's troopers and slept in the cave of West Rock with the regicides, inscribing over its entrance that Puritan Fenian motto, "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God." It tipped with diamond the pen of Jefferson to write the great Fenian creed in the Declaration of Independence for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It baptized in flame the tongues of Hancock and Adams and Patrick Henry, and flashed its lightning from the sword of Washington. It stirred up the rebellion of '76 and gave us Washington and Jefferson. It stirred up the rebellion of '98 and gave us Fitzgerald and Emmett and Wolf Tone. It kindled the fire on Prague's proud arch and crimsoned the waters murmuring below it, and shrieked through freedom at the fall of Kosciuszko. It flew in murmurs along the banners and whispered "vengeance or death" as the "watchword and reply" where its devotees and martyrs fought and fell for Sarmatia. It mounted the scaffold with Robert Emmett, and from the dying words of its chosen champion prophesied the resurrection of his country in whose morning effulgence the radiant epitaph on his monument, written if need be in the crimson of the hearts of tyrants, shall be read by all men. Just half a century afterward it stood beneath that same scaffold with Thomas Francis Meagher, "within one heart-beat of eternity," and poured upon his tongue the most affluent prodigality of its eloquence with which he preached the evangel of liberty. It inspired O'Brien of Maine, the first American naval hero, and his four brothers, the original Fenians of Maine, to seize and man a lumber sloop, our first war vessel, and with pickaxes and pitchforks to board and take the British armed schooner, and with the armament thus taken to fit out the sloop Liberty with which to take the schooner Diligence, and with the Diligence and Liberty to take the enemy's fort in New Brunswick, capturing its garrison, guns and ammunition. It inspired another American-Irish Fenian, John Barry, the first commodore of the American Navy, to attack and capture on the Delaware with four small row-boats an English vessel of ten guns. It filled the sails of the Bon Homme Richard while her gallant commander, Paul Jones, an American-Scotch Fenian, swept the seas to the terror of the whole British nation. It locked the Protector and the Admiral Duff yard-arm to yard-arm, kept time by the watch for an hour while the battle lasted, and then blew up the Duff, but saved the men. It so animated Hull, of our Old Ironsides, that he burst his garments as he shouted his command for that terrific "fire" which almost literally annihilated the Guerriere; and it spoke through our gallant Lawrence from the deck of the Chesapeake that immortal Fenian motto, "Don't give up the ship." It heralded the coming morn of a nation's independence at Lexington and Bunker Hill and Quebec. It marked out Washington as "the boon of Providence to the human race." It retreated with him from Long Island, crossed with him the Delaware, mounted sentinel and gave the watchword at every headquarters. At Brandywine and Germantown, at Monmouth and Camden, at Ticonderoga and Saratoga, at Trenton and Princeton, where Washington triumphed and Mercer fell, whether the sun of victory or the eclipse of disaster shone or brooded on our banners, Fenianism was there, and on the field of Yorktown it counted the arms which the army of Cornwallis stacked upon that field where monarchy surrendered then as it shall again surrender to Fenianism. It was Fenianism that inspired every patriotic emotion in its original home in Ireland, from Fionn McCool down to the latest champion of freedom through long centuries of oppression, cruelty, and wrong. It rallied its forces at Ballinabewee, Benburb, Limerick, and Ballinahinch. It made the Geraldines more Irish than the Irish themselves. It gave the light of hope through the long ages of despotism which brooded over Ireland to O'Neill, O'Donnell, O'Doherty, and O'Toole, to Sarsfield and Tone and Fitzgerald and Emmett and Curran and Grattan and O'Connell and Meagher and Smith O'Brien and Mitchell; and as the despot led his victims to the scaffold at Manchester it breathed its noblest prayer from the lips of the martyr O'Brien, "God save Ireland." It consecrated the scaffold with their names, and clothed the cause in which they died with aglorious immortality. It sometimes worked out its own ends through kings and tyrants, and used them for their own destruction. Sometimes it was for Sparta, sometimes for Thebes, sometimes for Athens, sometimes for and against the same Power, but always for liberty. It is the oxygen of the universe which feeds the flame of freedom everywhere. It is the electricity which shakes and purifies the atmosphere, which but for its presence would be the inspiration of death. It crouches to-day beneath the throne of every despot throughout the world and lines with the garment of Nessus the crown of every tyrant. It is oxydizing the iron of every prison bar. It sits with every prisoner in his lonely cell, softens into down the stoniest pillow which the tyrant puts beneath his head, and fills his soul with music sweeter and more heavenly than ever breathed or died in sickening sentimentality in the palaces of kings and the castles of nobles. It marches round the world to-day keeping step to

"Earth's heavenliest music, the breaking of chains."

It breathes consolation in the ear of every political prisoner in Kilmainham, Mountjoy, Pentonville, and every other bastille throughout the world, and whispers to O'Donovan-Rossa, McCafferty, and Halpin that the hour of their deliverance is approaching, while it conducts Warren and Costello again to liberty. With drooping wing and soiled plumage it perches to-day on the Dome of our national Capitol and laments the Circean sorcery which seems to lull the manhood of our people's representatives into worse than Lethæan forgetfulness of the rights and sacredness of American citizenship. It floats down the Rhine and up the Danube. It sleeps upon the Shannon, murmurs in the ripples of the Seine, flashes freedom's light upon the Tagus, and dances in the rays of the sun shooting from every wave-let's crest upon the Ægean; and even on the Thames with bated breath and closed nostrils it waits for the breeze of purification. It soars with the eagle, sings with the lark, foams on the ocean, flows with the rivers, shoots with the meteors, flashes with the lightning, peals with the thunder, and dances in the stars:

"Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Gives undivided, operates unspent."

"And what shall I more say? For time would fail me to tell of" all those who through the faith of Fenianism "subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens," "and others were tortured not accepting deliverance," "and others had trial of cruel mockeries and scourgings; yea, and moreover of bonds and imprisonments. They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented; of whom the world was not worthy. They wandered in deserts and in mountains and in dens and caves of the earth."

Mr. Speaker, I am not ashamed of the record I have made here. "Solitary and alone" and amid the sneers of an unthinking press "I set this ball in motion." March 4, 1867, I first took my seat on this floor. In 1842, twenty-seven years ago, I had prayed the attention of Congress through Henry Clay, (see Senate Journal, second session Twenty-Seventh Congress, page 176,) in a long petition embracing the points in the bill passed into law by this Congress and in the treaties made with Prussia and other Powers, and with England, now pending in the Senate of the United States. In 1848 I urged the attention of the authorities here to the outrages perpetrated upon Bergen and Ryan and other American citizens imprisoned without cause in Ireland in that year, and we succeeded in securing their release. On the 7th of March, 1867, within three days after taking my seat here, I made my first motion on this subject, calling for information on the imprisonment of our citizens. That resolution was answered March 20, 1867, and the information refused. I followed the matter up in committee and in the House. July 10, 1867, I had up the case of Meany and Nagle, since released. On November 21, 1867, Congress came together, and I again brought the question before the House the first day of its meeting, and on the 21st and 25th of November and the 2d day of December, 1867, I made speeches on this question. It is somewhat curious now to look at the reception given by the press to this subject.

The Washington Daily Chronicle of November 22, the day after my first formal speech upon it, says:

"The irrepressible representative of the Fenians, Richelieu ROBINSON, of New York," *
* "desired to talk, but failed to get permission."

The New York Times of December 3, the day after my second speech, says:

"ROBINSON opened his batteries." * * *
* "The House is already tired of this subject, and listened with impatience."

The Brooklyn Union of December 10, 1867, begged that—

"Honest citizens, who prefer to attend to their own business, free from embarrassment arising from the acts of their disorderly adopted fellow-citizens, which they are not willing to and will in no case incur," &c.

I might go on and quote columns of such ridicule with which we entered upon this great struggle. Nor was this ridicule worse than the indifference manifested by the leading newspapers. Not one of them, so far as I saw, for weeks had a single editorial of encouragement. The New York Herald, of all the great dailies, was the only paper to speak favorably of the subject I had introduced, and showed that it was neither Fenianism nor Irish affairs, but the great American question of protection to American citizens which I was urging. Ridicule and neglect, however, had no influence on me; I continued the agitation, as the reported proceedings of this House will show. In the meantime the weekly press, particularly the Irish-American papers, had taken up the subject. Thousands of speeches, by myself and others, in pamphlet form were circulated over the country. Immense mass-meetings were called in Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Chicago, and St. Louis, and all the large cities throughout the Union, and were addressed by Governors of States, Senators of the United States, and other distinguished men. Many of the State Legislatures indorsed the movement by joint resolutions. The authenticated proceedings of these meetings and Legislatures, duly signed by the officers—in some of which my name was favorably mentioned—to the number of sixty or seventy, came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Public attention was aroused. Congress passed a law embodying the right of expatriation and protection to our citizens, though not in as good a shape as it left the House. Treaties followed with Prussia and other continental Powers, and finally England yielded her long-cherished doctrine of perpetual allegiance, and accepted the American doctrine.

In closing my speech on December 2, 1867, I said:

"I can only say that when this thing is accomplished, when the true doctrine which we announce here to-day, and will hereafter insist upon, shall become incorporated in international law, and its vitality shall be recognized throughout the world, though I may have departed before that time, my memory may live among those who have advocated it."

I knew how long cherished this doctrine of perpetual allegiance was to Europe. I knew we had gone to war upon it, and had concluded a peace with England without settling it. I knew what apathy had seized the press, what lethargy had deadened the people. I felt the ridicule which from all quarters came pouring upon us, but beyond the cloud we saw the sunshine. We believed that this Congress would declare the inalienable right of expatriation, and felt that in five or ten or twenty years Prussia and England, the two countries from which we had most to fear, the latter having even then over a hundred American citizens in her prisons, and the former imprisoning on their return all our naturalized citizens born in her dominions, for military service due to her, would acquiesce: but in two years England and Prussia accept our doctrine! The United States has by bill declared the doctrine which she will maintain against the world. Prussia has already ratified a treaty with us, and emptied her jails of our citizens, and England has surrendered her centuries wrong to America's right. And Meany and Nagle, Warren and Costello are to-day released from British dungeons.

Am I not pardonable if I am now a little egotistical? While I have attended to every public matter of tariff, taxes, Hell Gate obstructions, suspension bridges, appropriations, river and harbor improvements, and general political and financial legislation, I have been somewhat instrumental in carrying this the greatest triumph of the age, which will live when the petty struggles of party over impeachment, reconstruction, and other measures of the day will be forgotten, or remembered only to be deplored. Might I not say that, as additional duty, I have helped a work which the future millions of Brooklyn will be proud to say was urged forward to success by one of Brooklyn's Representatives.

Why, just compare results! There are many distinguished men who claim that the freeing of four million colored people from nominal slavery is worth all the life and treasure expended during our recent war. One million of American citizens dead on the field of battle, hundreds of thousands crippled and diseased through life, $3,000,000,000 squandered, debts incurred, and taxes imposed under which the country will stagger for generations to come; and four millions colored people nominally freed from slavery! This measure has cost no increase of national debt, no battles have been fought, no lives lost, and yet it emancipates one hundred-millions of men from slavery quite as galling as that of African slavery—a slavery which denied to man the right of locomotion, the right to call himself his own, and to go where he pleased, and punished with imprisonment and other severe penalties the fugitive slaves returning within reach of their former masters, and all this accomplished for the Caucasian race—the race which has produced Milton and Shakspeare, Burns and Moore, La Fayette, Kosciusko, Tell, and Washington.

Sir, I regret nothing that I have done here. Had I ignored the rights of our adopted citizens I might have secured a reelection. The two acts charged against me and working the defeat of my nomination to next Congress were casting my vote for the present Speaker and talking so much on Ireland and Fenianism. As for my vote for Speaker, we had no party caucus regularly called. I had known the present Speaker as a friend of Ireland's nationality. I had read his speeches on that subject in Chicago, and willing to show my respect for a friend of Irish nationality, when I betrayed no principle nor trust of my party, I acted as I did. The other Republican officers of this House were elected unanimously. Recently the present Republican Doorkeeper received all the Democratic votes on this floor. Tomorrow, this Speaker will receive a unanimous vote of thanks from the Democrats of this House. Wherein was my crime greater than theirs? Even this I do not regret, and I am free to say that whenever I can show my friendship for any advocate of Ireland's cause without betrayal of or detriment to my party, I will do so wherever I may be placed. On the other question my only regret is that I have not talked and done more for Ireland. I am more than repaid in the consciousness that throughout the world, wherever a true Irishman lives who has heard my name, in him I have a friend; and that many regrets are to-day entertained that in the coming Congress one voice, always faithful to Ireland, will be silent when her name is spoken.

Among all the words of commendation I had in this cause none were so encouraging as those I received from the late James T. Brady. Among his expressions of approbation of my course was this letter written to one whom he knew felt keenly every ribald joke against the cause in which I was so earnestly engaged, and whose heart he knew would thrill with gratitude at every kindly word spoken in its favor:

WILLARD'S HOTEL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 18, 1867.

MY DEAR —: Last Sunday I was kept in my bed afflicted with a headache. Some consolation was afforded me by reading "Rob's" speech. *
* I think nothing ever was said or could be said more appropriate or effective than that which emanated from our "mutual friend." When he spoke the other day he called it a question of "privilege," but proved it to be a matter of right, not merely right of speech to him, but national right in all who claim to be Americans by birth, service, or adoption.

I know that Rob and myself have often made speeches which more illustrated the genius and fluency of our race than the logic of our subject. But just now he has made a hit, and just as sure as you and I live what he advanced in his brief and pointed speeches has become a great and an eternal national question. I mean "eternal" until we have given Ireland her rights and degraded her oppressors.

In haste, yours, most respectfully,
JAMES T. BRADY.

It is a melancholy pleasure to me to-day to summon him who wrote those words for a moment from the gloom of the grave in which I have seen him laid, and to try to realize the loss which every good cause has sustained in the death of its ablest and truest champion, and to dedicate a few words to his memory:

"Romance and reality blended, in sooth,
The firmest of manhood the freshest of youth
In honor's most beautiful form.
Not even to save the whole cargo of truth
Would he cast out a part in the storm!

Gloom! gloom!
The firmness and freshness are nipped in the bloom,
Broad and dark is the shadow that falls from his tomb.

"Go—mix with the crowds where his praises are spoken:
Go—watch the wet eyes that hang over each token
His genius hath given of its birth.
Would millions in one common grief be combined
If some spell-work embracing the heart and the mind
Of man in its magical girth
Were not left, like a scroll from his spirit behind,
To circle and gird up the earth?"

I have said that I did not neglect my constituents in attending to the rights of American citizens abroad. There was no question that I neglected to advocate or condemn according as I believed it was for the good of my constituents or otherwise. Even this day the Brooklyn bridge bill was taken up out of its order on my urgent entreaties and passed, which otherwise might have been lost in the hurry of the closing hours of this Congress. In all I have done, which I shall not attempt to enumerate, I considered it my duty, and I seek no praise for discharging it, but I claim to have been faithful to my constituents and true to the party electing me in all things in which they were properly interested.

And now, sir, what of the future of this new

Ho. OF REPS.

Ireland—these United States? We have no need of fear from the immediate reception and admission to citizenship of all who come from Ireland or Germany. They have ever been and ever will be true to your flag and loyal to your cause. They have always bled freely and fought well for this country. There were more soldiers in proportion to their numbers from our foreign-born than from our native population in the late war.

In closing an address which I delivered at Hamilton College before the Psi Upsilon Fraternity, composed of graduates and undergraduates of Yale, Harvard, Union, Amherst, Dartmouth, and other colleges, on the 22d of July, 1851, I stated the number of soldiers, native and adopted, that would rush to the rescue of this country whenever its safety was periled. This was eighteen years ago. Who then believed that any one living would ever see an army of one hundred thousand Irishmen in the field to sustain our flag and Union? With an extract from that speech expressive of my feelings then and of my feelings now, as well as of the feelings of every Irish or German immigrant landing on our shores, I shall close my remarks on this occasion. I quote from the New York Daily Tribune of July 30, 1851:

"This Union shall not fall. It shall stand, for the prayers and hopes and sympathies of a world are gathering around it. In the veins and hearts of its sons there is blood red as its stripes, and patriotism pure as the light of its stars, ready for its defense. Its enemies shall be met and conquered on the ocean, and no foot of a foreign invader shall ever desecrate its soil. Around its borders, on every inlet, are instruments of brass and steel, whose music shall charm away all invaders. There are four millions of citizen soldiers whose every heart is a citadel, whose every body is a shield around and over it; and around the citadel of liberty shall rise ramparts of bodies, and shall flow a deluge of blood, before its safety is periled or its throne shaken. From the exiles from one country alone, whose sons, flying from oppression there, found shelter here, we could raise an army of one hundred thousand fighting men, as brave, as irresistible, as their countrymen who fought at Cremona or Fontenoy. Within sound of the City Hall bell of New York we could raise an army of Irishmen larger than either General Scott or General Taylor had under his command at any time during the war with and conquest of Mexico; and in the right arm of every one of them is a twitching sensation of desire to avenge upon European monarchies, and particularly on that of England, the oppression and sufferings of centuries. The world in arms could not successfully invade this country, guarded by the Irish and German soldiers alone, who would run to its defense."

"I would as soon think of doubting my father's integrity, my mother's honesty, or my wife's fidelity as doubt the stability and perpetuity of my country. There should be 'no such word as fail' in the lexicon of this Republic. Washington's wisdom, Montgomery's blood, the blessings of the past, the promise of the future, the hopes of the world, are mingling with the folds of its flag and dancing in its stars."

"Those who talk of disunion have little faith in man's wisdom and less in God's providence. They have but a faint idea of our bright destiny. The light of that flag shall burst like a sun upon the falling ruins of oppression throughout the world."

"Many an eyesick and sunken shall revive to gaze upon the increasing constellation of its stars. There shall be no Gibeon on which the sun of her glory shall stand still, no valley of Ajalon over which the moon of her beauty shall be staid."

"For him who shall attempt to fire the temple of American liberty, who would pale a star or blot a stripe from its glorious flag, time shall be too short for repentance, Heaven too indignant for forgiveness, and the woe of the doomed too merciful for the punishment of his crime. He shall perish from among men, his name shall not bluster on the page of history."

"The curl of woman's ruby lip shall gather up red malisons for his memory. The curse that sometimes will flutter even on the tongue of angels will be hurled upon his head."

"My young friends, unto you is given this day a glorious inheritance. Beneath the shadow of your eagle's wings lives and grows a Power greater than that ever swayed by a Caesar or an Alexander. You are born or adopted to an inheritance approaching nearer that for which the Christian hopes hereafter than any temporal blessing, an inheritance eternal as earth's foundation, enduring as time. Cherish it as you would your life, your honor. It shall soon commit itself to your hands for good or evil. See that its laws are made in justice and obeyed with fidelity, looking for light to conform to that Supreme Wisdom which the wise and good of all nations acknowledge, for it is the fool who saith in his heart even that there is no God. Live in the light of your own history, following the examples of your fathers; so shall you enjoy blessings never elsewhere vouchsafed to man, and transmit them unimpaired to your children and your children's children forever. Such is the country and such I trust her destiny soon to commit her interests to your care. Who would not die to save her and think his lot divine? This is the stone which the monarch-builders despised and which has now become the head of the corner.

The poet prophet of Israel seems to have described this country and its glorious career in the volume of Revelations:

"And the Gentiles shall come to thy light and kings to the brightness of thy rising. Thy sons shall come from far and thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side, because the abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee, all they from Sheba shall come; they shall bring gold. Who are these that fly as a cloud and as the doves to their windows? Surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first to bring thy sons from afar, their silver and their gold with them; and the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee; therefore thy gates shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night; that men may bring unto thee the forces of the Gentiles, and that their kings may be brought. The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee; and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet. I will make thee an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations."

"Would that I could see the prophecy applicable to my country as the inspired pen further wrote it:

"I will also make thy officers' peace, and thine exactors' righteousness. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls salvation and thy gates praise; thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light. Thy people also shall be righteous; they shall inherit the land forever."

"The Gentiles have indeed come to this great western light. This nation's adopted sons have indeed come from far. Look at this cloud of Anglo-Saxon-ridden poverty, flying as doves to the windows or ports of our country, where safety and rest wait for them. Ships, compared to which those of Tarshish were as canoes to a man-of-war, bring our sons and gold and riches from lands unknown to Sheba or Jerusalem. The walls of our cities are literally built up by sons of strangers. Night and day our gate-way ports are open, and the strength, force, and flower of monarchies crowd in. And the sons, too, of England, the great afflictor of our fathers, are coming bending to the starry flag; and those Norman nobles that despised us and found their highest literary enjoyment in the low billingsgate of their cockney tourists, are bowing themselves down at our feet and trying to drown the echo of their former curses in the sycophant servility of their present flattery."

"And oh! as we look to what we have been, what we are, and what we will be, what son, native or adopted, does not look back to the Father of his Country with thankful heart and grateful emotions? Spotless and pure as ever human nature was was our own dear and revered father; pure and incorruptible as the gold, firm as the granite foundations, and vast in comprehension as the extent of his country. All human praise short of a violation of the first two commands of the Decalogue be his. Reverence the most profound, praise the most exalted, be rendered unanimously to him, as to him it must be rendered, while a posterity springs up or a wave of immigration rolls to these shores worthy to inherit the country which his wisdom established on such sure and liberal foundations. Cold, treacherous, traitorous will be that American heart in which the blood circulates not more quickly; dull, dead must be the eye which will not kindle with a nobler pride at the mention of the name of Washington. As I follow him back and forward from North to South of our country, the interests of a continent, the freedom of millions of unborn generations, the hopes and fears of a world gathering around him and centering in him, the sufferings of his army, the successes and excesses of the Anglo-Saxon enemy, the want of supplies, the doubts and suspicions of some, the open threats of revolt, the secret plottings of treason, all weighing upon and crushing his big heart; yet still bearing up under all till his bright, untarnished sword, which freed a people from tyranny, was laid down at the feet of that people's representatives. I cannot but think that it would be treason, not only to our Constitution, but to the impulses of every true heart, to even think of separating States wren together by his sacred footsteps printed on their soil and guarded against disunion by his dying words."

"A city set upon a hill, all nations come to receive their light from us. Beneath every flag, dark or paling, they come, attracted by the increasing stars and glowing brightness of our own. On every wave, wherever ocean permits the amorous air to kiss his curling lip or recline on his swelling bosom, they come. Amid the deluge of suffering and tyranny that inundates the earth, till the highest mountain tops of human hopes are submerged, this country appears the Ararat on which the ark of humanity finds sure foundation and peaceful rest."

"Shall such a country be destroyed? Shall the shadow of a great rock in a weary land be taken away? Shall the noble tree be destroyed which gave us protection alike from the drenching rain and the burning sun? No, the good old oak shall stand. Its roots are deep in the people's affections; its branches wave beneath the guardian smile of Heaven, the daily, hourly, constant worship, beneath its thick green shade is the grateful incense of a people's love. "So forever be it; and as each new wave of population, ebbing from the shores of Europe, flows in to swell the flood rising on our own, as the immigrant catches the first glimpse of our shore, when from the folds of our Union's flag floating from masthead or flag-staff he drinks in to intoxication the light of its stars, as a babe's eye drinks in the light of its mother's he will exclaim as I exclaimed:

"Hail! brightest banner that floats on the gale!
Flag of the country of Washington, hail!
Hed are thy stripes as the blood of the brave,
Bright are thy stars as the sun on the wave,
Wrapt in thy folds are the hopes of the free,
Banner of Washington, blessings on thee!

"Mountain tops mingle the sky with their snow;
Prairies lie smiling in sunshine below;
Rivers as broad as the sea in their pride
Border thine empires, but do not divide;
Niagara's voice far out-anthems the sea;
Land of sublimity! blessings on thee!

"Hope of the world! on thy mission sublime,
When thou didst burst on the pathway of Time,
Millions from darkness and bondage awoke;
Music was born when liberty spoke;
Millions to come yet shall join in the glee;
Land of the pilgrim's hope! blessings on thee!

"Empires shall perish and monarchies fall;
Kingdoms and thrones in thy glory grow pale!
Thou shalt live on, and thy people shall own
Loyalty's sweet, where each heart is thy throne,
Union and freedom thine heritage be;
Country of Washington! blessings on thee!"

Resumption of Specie Payments.

SPEECH OF HON. T. CORNELL,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

MR. CORNELL. So much time has already been consumed in the discussion of questions pertaining to the financial condition and wants of the country, so much experience and ability brought to bear upon them, that he who can now justify himself in the attempt to shed new light upon the subject must be endowed with more than ordinary wisdom and cherish implicit confidence in the correctness of his own views. To such wisdom, let me say in the outset, I lay no claim. On this, as on other questions involving the interests of the people, I have, indeed, earnest convictions, but they are not such as lead me to believe in the perfect infallibility of my individual opinions. In submitting a few reflections I am conscious of the delicacy of the undertaking, especially in view of the able and eloquent speeches to which it has been my privilege to listen in this House. At this advanced stage of the discussion it were useless to attempt to add new theories to those already before the House and the country. The field has already been well traversed by those who have gone before. The full harvest has been gathered, and to us who appear at this late hour there seems to be nothing left to do but to gather here and there the few fragments that may have escaped the notice of our predecessors.

This subject of finance and currency has been one of anxious solicitude to most of the nations of the earth. In time past it has received the attention of the ablest minds of both France and England, and in our own history this is not the first instance in which we have been called to the adjustment of questions of this nature.

Some countries have confined themselves exclusively to the use of gold and silver. But nothing is clearer than that they have not enjoyed that degree of prosperity, financial and commercial, which has fallen to the lot of other nations who, in addition to these, have also employed a paper currency. Perhaps our own country furnishes one of the best illustrations of the fact that something more than coin is requisite to the transaction of a large and successful business. The early settlers, a people so justly celebrated for their ambition and energy in the prosecution of their purpose to found here a Government to honor God and to elevate man, finding themselves possessed of but little gold and silver, were under the necessity of agreeing upon something which should represent them in the form of paper currency. And from that time till this, such currency has been in use, attended, it is true, with certain disadvantages in the form of losses arising principally from the want of proper security, but such disadvantages being greatly overbalanced by the conveniences and benefits which it has always conferred. In accounting for the unexampled prosperity which has attended us in the past, this fact has too frequently escaped us. To paper currency as a means of exchange we are greatly indebted. Without it your great West had remained a wilderness till this day, and your arts and sciences been far behind their present attainments. Instead of being the first, we should probably be the third or the fourth among the nations of the world.

But I have said such currency has been attended with disadvantages. It has been fluctuating. The want of some system which secures the billholder has been felt by all, and gradually for years have we sought to attain this end. We have made many and great improvements; but we have not yet arrived at perfection. "Necessity," it is said, "is the mother of invention." So it proved to be in this regard during the recent war. As that war progressed we were absolutely forced to invent some system which should be as sound and enduring as our national life, and the management of which should be left with the people, where it properly belongs. Such system was finally discovered and is now embodied in our national currency act. Nothing superior to it, nothing equal to it, exists in any other nation. And yet with all its excellencies it has some defects, as we well know. It ought and can be so amended as to answer fully the end for which it was designed. As it now stands it does not go far enough to secure to the billholder one hundred cents to the dollar. And this is no trivial defect, for the value of a national bank bill should be the same in all parts of the country. In other words, the bank issuing the bill and not the billholder should pay the cost of its redemption. But how, it is asked, can this be accomplished? For my own part I should accomplish it in the following manner, provided no better method can be proposed:

So amend the national bank act as that the banks can make their bills par and at the same time benefit their interest account. For example, authorize and direct the national banks of each State to establish jointly and in proportion to their respective capital a clearing-house, which shall be located at the money center of the State, and the management of which shall be in their own hands; to deposit in such clearing-house one half of their reserve, as required by the act, the other half to be retained in the form of gold at the bank itself; to keep here their deposits after the manner of those banks designated as "corresponding banks," the clearing-house to loan money on call only and only upon Government security; to pay the cost of redemption of bills belonging to all national banks located in their respective States; to defray the expense of such redemption as also of their own management out of the interest received on loans, and the balance, if any, to be distributed among the several banks of the State in proportion to their several amounts of reserve and deposit. Thus the billholder would be protected against discount, each bank being obliged to receive the bills of all the others, with the right to return them to the clearing-house whenever they might wish. This would be one step in the right direction, but I should recommend another.

The nation itself, like the States of which it is composed, has its financial and commercial center. At this point authorize and direct in like manner the establishment of a general or national clearing-house, which shall be under the joint direction and control of all the national banks of the several States; the State clearing-houses to keep here one half their average deposits; all loans to be made in the manner already indicated, and in no case to exceed one half the deposits; the accruing interest to be employed in defraying the expense of conducting the institution and in the redemption of bills as between itself and the State clearing-houses; these latter to receive their proportionate share of the profits, and in turn to distribute in like manner among the several banks in their respective States. By this or some similar modification of the act bills would be at par in all sections of the country, redemption would be greatly facilitated, and town and city banks would be on the same footing, the former receiving, as in justice they ought, a small per cent. on deposits. The difficulties and losses which would thus be obviated must be patent to every mind. But this is only a brief and imperfect outline, the details of which I will not stop to unfold.

And now, sir, a few words on the all-absorbing question of specie payments. I approach it with a degree of hesitation, because it is a vital question, and because in the opinions I may advance I shall be compelled to differ from the majority of those who have so ably addressed the House. Unlike them I have no definite system of legislation to submit which contemplates a return to the specie basis within a given period, and for the simple reason that I believe no such system can be safely adopted as the policy of the Government. The end we seek is not attainable in that way. However elaborate such system may be, however near or distant the day fixed upon by it for resumption, the country, when the period arrives, would be substantially where it was at the outset. Some have proposed their favorite systems of gradual contraction, asserting that resumption is impossible until the volume of currency now afloat is in great measure withdrawn. In some respects the theory is plausible, but in others it is dangerous in the extreme. To my own mind there appears no method more direct of inducing a financial paralysis from which it would require years to recover. There are others, too, who have seriously proposed the very opposite of this as the wisest course to pursue. They would have the currency expanded, and for the same purpose. Certainly one or the other of these systems is essentially false, and with all deference to the judgment of their respective advocates I think they are both false.

Why, sir, two years have not yet elapsed since an effort was made by the Secretary of the Treasury to realize the advantages of cautious and gradual contraction. The lesson which experience then taught us ought not to be forgotten now. Our circumstances at that time, in so far as they differed from the present, were such as to favor the experiment. But what was the result? Some thirty-five or forty millions of the currency were quietly withdrawn before the people were fairly conscious of the nature of the movement; but no sooner did the active business of the fall require an increased amount of the circulating medium than it was suddenly discovered that the amount in the country was inadequate to our business wants. Then followed a condition of feverish excitement. Fear and distrust prevailed everywhere, and but for the timely interposition of the Secretary directing the immediate suspension of his previous order we should have witnessed universal panic. Such an issue some of us ventured to predict at the time, but we were spared the calamity which seemed inevitably to threaten us only because the experiment was abandoned. The designation of any particular day in the future on which the Government by legislative enactment shall commit itself to resumption, meantime contracting the currency, must, as it seems to me, be attended with incalculable embarrassment, and possibly disaster to the business interests of the country.

It has been asserted by some that early resumption would seriously affect the values of all American products and manufactures. It seems to have been overlooked that such values are regulated by the law of supply and demand, and not so much by the price of gold. Nothing, therefore, is more surprising than the apparent desire of the West to defer resumption on this ground. We have passed through a war of unparalleled magnitude, which consumed the productions of the country as fast as they could be furnished. That war summoned from the active pursuits of industry a million men. They ceased to produce, but continued to consume, requiring food and raiment as before, and in addition to these, unlimited material for the destructive purposes of war. When after four years the contest ceased we found the country in an abnormal condition. The natural working of the great law of supply and demand had been disturbed, and has remained so until now. Time alone can restore it, and year by year is that change gradually coming about. Sooner or later the supply of all staple articles will be in excess of the demand, and when that time comes prices must fall. Increase the price of gold if you will, but it cannot avail you, for when the market is overstocked the unavoidable consequence is decrease of values. Hence I say the West is laboring under a great mistake. It is permitting the opportunity to resume on high prices to pass away. Farmers, we are told, are hoarding their crops. This they may do for a time, but eventually they will be obliged to sell, and in all probability at great sacrifice.

In proof of the statement that values conform to supply and demand and not to the price of gold it is only necessary to refer to facts in our own experience familiar to all. Who has not seen wheat and flour lower with gold at 285 than when it had fallen to 135, and coal quoted at seven dollars a ton with gold at 285 and at eleven dollars a ton when gold stood at 135? Nor are these isolated cases. Take the general course of trade and you find the same facts existing in all its departments. The idea, therefore, that resumption will so vitally affect values is entirely without foundation.

Another objection frequently urged against resumption is our bonds now held in Europe. How, it is asked, can we provide for them? Were this the only obstacle in our way I should conclude we had reached resumption now. We are told that these bonds will be sent home and we have not the gold to redeem them. Those who urge this objection must have been educated to pay their debts fifteen years before they are due or it could have no force. Why, sir, if our bonds should be sent home and there should be no market for them there will be no alternative but to recall and retain them till they are due, when I have no doubt we shall be abundantly prepared to redeem them, paying principal and interest in gold. But who can reasonably suppose that the European who has taken our bonds at seventy-five cents will send them home because they have advanced to ninety or one hundred cents, when in that very rise he finds the positive assurance that they will advance to one hundred and ten cents? So far from this, resumption would be followed by such demand for our bonds as we have not yet witnessed, and in this would we find one of the means by which resumption, when once commenced, could be successfully continued.

On this point it seems to me many are oversensitive. They would have our bonds, so far as possible, retained in our own country. This theory I cannot indorse. To a certain extent the greater the amount of our bonds held in Europe the better, as in that case we have the more ready money for the transaction of our home business. Every investment in bonds here, with the exception of those deposited for the redemption of bank bills, locks up so much money in the vaults of the Government for a time, and thus removes it from the channels of active trade. For my own part I see no valid objection to Europe holding all the bonds we can spare beyond those necessary to our banking interests. But pay-day we are told will come, and how even then shall we meet our obligations? I answer, I have no fear of the ability of the Government to meet its indebtedness. Americans, with their characteristic energy, industry, and enterprise, might almost earn with the money received from European capitalists in exchange for bonds means sufficient to cancel that indebtedness at the proper time. Beneath the surface of our soil and soliciting our acceptance is wealth enough to meet these obligations at maturity. And in contrast with all this is the condition of Europe. Her coal and copper mines have been worked for centuries, the various sources of her wealth are being rapidly exhausted, and it is no rash prediction that before the maturity of our bonds we may be called upon to supply her workshops and firesides with coal. So, too, continued immigration to this country is sadly affecting her industries, and must be felt more and more in years to come. As the legitimate result of all this the price of labor and of all staple articles must increase in the East and decrease in the West, until America at last shall become the great workshop of the world. Sir, there is no limit to the power and resources of our people to accomplish in this respect what they wisely undertake to do.

These bonds, I repeat, are no obstacle to resumption. Only let the Government make public proclamation of its purpose to return at the earliest possible moment to specie payments and the holder of an American bond, be he in London, Paris, or Frankfort, will cling to his treasure with a firmer grasp; the doubts and fears which now exist as to our ability and disposition to redeem our pledges would then vanish, and our securities, as if by magic, rise to their true value in all the markets of the world.

But the opponents of early resumption do not stop here. They present an array of objections whose combined force they believe it difficult to overcome. They call upon us not simply to provide for our foreign obligations, but also for our legal tenders. The issue of these notes was a necessity of the war, and in all probability without any clear, authoritative sanction in the Constitution. But however that may be, they were issued in good faith, and for this reason if no other I hold that no part of our debt is more sacred. On every principle of justice and honor the Government is now bound faithfully to adhere to its pledge. Sir, on this point I have deep convictions. Just what might be my feelings had these notes been issued under other circumstances and for another purpose, I do not know, but issued in our extremity and in defense of the nation's life I cannot waver. These are "the people's bonds," and the justice and validity of their claim are sealed in blood. We have laid in the grave half a million brave men. Thousands upon thousands of them are buried within sight of this Capitol. Their widows and their orphan children are found in every city and village and hamlet from ocean to ocean. Desolate hearts and desolate hearthstones confront us wherever we go, and all these adjure us to fulfill our promises and preserve untarnished our country's honor.

But these issues known as "legal tenders," even admitting that they have no sanction in the Constitution, might by judicious legislation be the means of aiding us to resumption, and I shall be glad to know that the Supreme Court, at whose bar the question of their constitutionality is now pending, shall suspend their decision until Congress and the country may be prepared to receive it. To declare these notes unconstitutional now would greatly add to the embarrassments under which the country is already laboring. In so far, however, as legal tenders are related to the resumption of specie payments they cannot be regarded as a serious obstacle. Now held in the form of a forced loan, the Government being professedly unable in its present condition to redeem them, no attempt to reestablish its faith, however unsuccessful, could further depreciate them in the estimation of the people. In a certain sense they are already repudiated, and nothing can raise them from their fallen state short of immediate and positive assurance on the part of the Government of its purpose to redeem them without delay. It can be done, and I believe will be, according to the letter and spirit of the contract.

As to the effect of resumption upon our national banks, many are needlessly alarmed. Were a day fixed upon which to resume, these banks would doubtless deem it prudent to curtail their loan accounts, and possibly to dispose of some of their securities in order the more effectually to encounter the change. In this regard, however, they would but exercise upon themselves a healthful influence. That a return to specie payments would seriously disturb them I do not believe. It is to be remembered that we have now a basis of bank circulation radically different from that which formerly characterized the State banks. Then our issues were corporate obligations, while now they are both corporate and Government obligations, and therefore known to be good. Hence there is no necessity of returning bills to the banks that may have issued them, except in case of a surplus on hand. The only possible difficulty is to have on hand the amount of currency that may be requisite to the business of the country, and even here there can be no ground of apprehension, inasmuch as after resumption a national bank bill would be substantially as good as gold for all the ordinary transactions of business, the Government agreeing to pay and becoming responsible for the payment of gold.

Our national banks are a power for good in our country. They are the very life of our business, and it is highly proper that we undertake nothing that will tend to destroy or cripple them. But I have yet to discover any possible respect in which as the consequence of resumption they are likely to be endangered. So far from this, I believe it was in our power to resume six months after the close of the war. Never were the people so well prepared for it as then, never will they be again. We owed but little one to another, we conducted our business for the most part on the cash principle. There was little commercial paper afloat, and as if inviting us to resume, gold fell to 120. What prevented resumption then? One thing and one only: our great financial head had little confidence in the people and apparently none at all in the boundless resources of our country. For his neglect at that time to avail himself of the opportunity presented he can never make adequate apology, for the result of it has been not merely inestimable loss to the people, but also humiliating disgrace to the nation. We were ready for the issue. We were imbued with the patriotic ardor that inspired us during the war, and then more than ever because victory was perched upon our banners, and if required or encouraged so to do would have presented to the world the sublime spectacle of a nation evincing while yet comparatively in its infancy a degree of recuperative energy which enabled it to return to a specie basis on the very heels of a war which stands without a parallel in ancient or modern history. Resumption could have been effected then, and would have made American securities not only the most desirable in the market but the wonder and admiration of the world. Instead of funding at a sacrifice our short obligations we should have saved twenty-five or thirty per cent. to the people.

It is by no means easy to understand why financial embarrassments resulting from war should be more difficult to overcome than those resulting from other causes. Such embarrassments, though of less magnitude, we have frequently encountered as the result of over-trading. The money market is disturbed and suddenly tightens, confidence in business circles is shaken, and failures are reported from all sections of the country. For a time all minds are agitated, many give up in despair, and thousands feel that they are hopelessly bankrupt. What course in such cases do we pursue? We pursue the course of the skillful physician, whose first aim is to dispel fear and restore confidence to the mind of the patient. In this consists half the cure. The Government is now in the condition of an embarrassed corporation whose creditors have lost in a degree their confidence in its integrity and resources. Let that confidence, so far as possible, be immediately restored. Let the Government not merely acknowledge its obligations, but evince its disposition to meet them fairly and justly. Such assurance would be welcomed and appreciated by the people, and would be met by that manly forbearance, that generous sympathy, and earnest, faithful co-operation for which all true Americans are so justly celebrated.

But it is objected by our opponents that in advocating immediate or early resumption we are going contrary to all precedents. We are reminded that both France and England failed to resume for many years after their great European wars. Particular reference has been made to the condition of the English finances during and succeeding the revolution of 1688, and to the depreciated condition of the English currency subsequent to the general peace of 1815. But we are not informed by those who would have us walk in the light of English precedent how much earlier by a different financial policy England might have attained to that secure position reached at last after long years of anxious and painful solicitude. But, sir, I am not disposed to compare the past experience of England, much less her financial policy, with the present condition and resources of our own country. Even our fundamental principles of government are essentially different from hers. Both France and England are controlled by the one-man and one-woman power, while here we are free, and every citizen has a voice in the affairs of the Government. The precedents of these nations are by no means the embodiment of all wisdom, nor are we the inferiors of our ancestors, that in all our difficulties we should submissively seek their counsel. Besides, sir, we have already had quite enough of these precedents. Gladly would England have witnessed our defeat in the late war; most heartily would she have rejoiced in the permanent dissolution of our glorious Union. Not to her sympathy, counsel, or encouragement are we indebted for the ultimate triumph of our arms, but rather to the justice of our cause, to the wisdom of our own counsels, to the skill and courage of our noble Army, and to the guidance and favor of Him who presides over the destinies of nations.

But, sir, after all the elaborate theories, speculations, and precedents that have been advanced, resumption is nothing more nor less than the will of the people. There is no other principle or basis of action that will avail us. The question to be determined is whether the people desire to resume. If they do, it can be done, and done quickly. But who is to be benefited by non-resumption? Chiefly two classes, the gold speculator and the importer. The first of these we can afford to dispense with, and the second we can certainly dispense with for a time. In other words, it would be for the interest of more than nine tenths of the people to resume without delay; and such would be their verdict should the issues be fairly presented. And inasmuch as resumption whenever reached must be attained through their will and co-operation let the methods proposed for its accomplishment be such as the masses can comprehend and appreciate. It is in vain that you attempt anything without their sanction. They hold, and justly hold, the balance of power in this country. There is no class to whom we are so highly indebted or who are more entitled to our respect and gratitude than those we denominate the "common people." It is they who have dug our canals and built our railroads, cleared our forests and fought our battles, and, in a word, made us the great nation we are to-day. It is with their approval and by their assistance we must resume; and hence the plainest and most direct way to the object we have in view is to frame our plans with practical simplicity, and thus secure their confidence and support. To this end I would have the Secretary of the Treasury, having fixed upon a time to resume, issue to "the people of the United States," at least three months before the time shall arrive, a circular apprising them of his purpose and requesting their earnest and immediate coöperation in the work; this circular, by a system of congressional distribution to be placed in the hands of every citizen, and also to be published in every newspaper throughout the length and breadth of the land. I would also recommend the issue of a circular to the national banks requesting them to make all necessary preparation to resume at the time specified.

A movement such as this would have a tendency to facilitate resumption by making it popular. It will be remembered that when it became necessary to dispose rapidly of our bonds it was deemed prudent to take this course, and the result more than justified our expectations. No sooner were the circulars issued and the aid of the press called into requisition than the people came forward en masse and invested in bonds. For the success of this plan Jay Cooke & Co. received the credit as also the pay, while the work might have been done with equal success by the Secretary of the Treasury and without expense to the people. It is necessary, however, that in a matter of this nature the Secretary be a man in whom the people have implicit confidence. He must be earnest and enthusiastic in the work. With all due respect to the present incumbent of that office, he has failed thus far to resume, and with his term of office almost expired has now no time to accomplish the work. But further, having notified the people and secured their coöperation, let Congress, if it be deemed expedient, prohibit by severe penalty the sale of gold at a fictitious value.

Next authorize a loan of $200,000,000 of five-thirty six per cent. bonds, payable principal and interest in Europe, and to be employed by the Secretary of the Treasury, under proper limitations and restrictions, in the redemption of the legal tenders within the ensuing two years. I propose that the rate of interest shall be six per cent., because the loan to be taken at once must be made attractive, and because it will be found more prudent and economical to pay six per cent. for five years than eight per cent for thirty years.

The next step I should propose would be to create on or before the day designated for resumption $600,000,000 of gold or its equivalent, by making legal tenders receivable for all duties on imports except goods then in bond, and for all Government debts except interest on the gold certificates and bonded debt; and, furthermore, to be employed in the redemption of national bank bills for the period of three months from the date of resumption. At the expiration of three months fifteen per cent. of all these payments to be made in gold and the balance in legal tenders, and so increasing fifteen per cent. every three months in the gold payment till we come at last to the full payment in gold. In entering upon resumption we should thus have, in addition to the gold now on hand, the $200,000,000 realized from the sale of bonds, and also the legal tenders.

This would serve to destroy the premium on gold, and by this means the legal tenders, as already intimated, would contribute to the end in view.

But in order to reduce importations, and thereby diminish our foreign obligations, I should increase the tariff, say twenty per cent., for the term of one year, to take effect on the day of resumption.

Furthermore, in order to provide for the deficiency in circulation arising from the hoarding of legal tenders, I am of opinion it would be good policy to increase the national bank circulation $50,000,000 on the day resumption begins, and increase it afterward in proportion as the legal tenders are redeemed and destroyed by the two hundred million loan. When resumption is successfully established the national bank act should be made free to all.

I am further of opinion that there should be created a twenty-five year loan at four per cent. of $2,000,000,000, principal and interest payable in gold, and exempt from Government, State, and municipal tax. A loan of this nature would absorb a large proportion of our present bonded debt, and greatly facilitate the establishment of new national banks.

And now a single word in regard to the funding of this bonded debt. It seems to be ignored by some that these bonds were voluntarily taken by the people, and at a time when, to say the least, it was extremely uncertain whether principal or interest would ever be returned. And yet such was the confidence of the people in the integrity and stability of the Government, and such their determination to preserve the Union, that they did not hesitate to make the investment. And, sir, after all this, again and again have they been reproachfully denominated the "bloated bondholders," and all manner of propositions submitted to the House to compel the premature return to the Government of these very bonds. Such compulsion, in whatever form presented, is repudiation, and repudiation in any form would be disgraceful to the Government.

Sir, while I deplore the present unsettled condition of our finances, I find it difficult to avoid the conviction that in great measure it is without excuse. We might and ought to have reached a specie basis long ago. We shall prove recreant to our trust if we longer delay. Thus far the people have evinced their characteristic patience, but the time has now come when patience ceases to be a virtue. The presidential contest is over; the work of reconstruction is almost complete; conflict is about to cease and harmony be restored in all the departments of the Government; the victorious commander of our Army, who has never known defeat or failure, is about to take his seat in the presidential chair, and all that now remains is for us, the Representatives of the people, to prove faithful to the important trust they have committed to our care.

Representative Reform.

REPORT

FROM THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON REPRESENTATIVE REFORM.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

March 2, 1869.

(To accompany bill S. No. 772.)

Mr. BUCKALEW, from the select Committee on Representative Reform, submitted the following report:

The bill referred to the committee, and now reported by them, presents a question which deserves deliberate examination both because it is important and because it is new. It proposes to secure fair and complete representation to every important political interest in the country; to strike an effectual blow at corruption in popular elections; to secure more of harmony and contentment than now exists among the people, and to improve the composition of the popular branch of Congress by facilitating the introduction and continuance of men of ability and merit in that body. That these results may to a great extent be secured by it is by the friends of the measure most positively affirmed. If the claim made by them on its behalf be substantially true or true to any considerable extent, and the plan be capable of convenient application, it will merit strong commendation and prompt adoption.

THE PLAN.

Representatives being assigned to a State under the constitutional rule of distribution, each elector in the State shall possess as many votes as there are Representatives to be chosen. He shall possess his due and equal share of electoral power as a member of the political body or State. Thus far we deal with familiar ideas which have heretofore obtained. It is next proposed that the elector shall exercise his right of suffrage according to his own judgment and discretion, and without compulsion of law. He shall bestow or distribute his votes upon or among candidates with entire freedom, and shall be relieved from that legal constraint to which he has been heretofore subjected. He may select his candidate or candidates anywhere within the limit of his State from among all its qualified citizens, and he may exert his political power upon the general representation of his State instead of the representation of a particular district within it. Here is unquestionably a large and valuable extension of privilege to the citizen, a withdrawal from him of inconvenient and odious restraint, and a more complete application of that principle of self-government upon which our political institutions are founded. And what is material for consideration is, that while all the advantages of a plan of election by general ticket are secured, all its inconveniences and evils are avoided.

FORMER PLANS—THEIR IMPERFECTIONS.

Formerly when elections of Representatives in Congress were had by general ticket a great inconvenience resulted which became at last offensive and intolerable. For a political majority in a State, organized as a party and casting its votes under a majority or plurality rule, secured in ordinary cases the entire representation from the State, and the minority were wholly excluded from representation. To avoid this inconvenience and evil which had become general throughout the country Congress interposed, and by statute required the States to select their Representatives by single districts; that is, to divide their territory into districts, each of which should elect one member. This contrivance, dictated by congressional power, ameliorated our electoral system, mitigated the evil of which general complaint had been made, and was an unquestionable advance in the art of government among us. But retaining the majority or plurality rule for elections, and restricting the power and free action of the elector, it was imperfect in its design and has been unsatisfactory in practice. It has not secured fair representation of political interests, and it has continued in existence in a somewhat mitigated form the evils of the plan of election by general ticket which it superseded. Still one body of organized electors in a district vote down another, electoral corruption is not effectually checked, and the general result is unfair representation of political interests in the popular House of Congress. Besides, the single district plan has called into existence inconveniences peculiar to itself and which did not attach to the former plan.

It excludes from Congress men of ability and merit whose election was possible before, and thus exerts a baneful influence upon the constitution of the House. Two causes operate to this end. In the first place no man who adheres to a minority party in any particular district can be returned; and next, great rapidity of change is produced by fluctuation of party power in the districts.

Again, the single district system gives rise to gerrymandering in the States in the formation of districts. Single districts will almost always be unfairly made. They will be formed in the interest of party and to secure an unjust measure of power to their authors, and it may be expected that each successive district apportionment will be more unjust than its predecessor. Parties will retaliate upon each other whenever possible. The disfranchisement suffered through one decade by a political party may be repeated upon it in the next with increased severity; but if it shall happen to have power in the Legislature when the new apportionment for the State is to be made it will take signal vengeance for its wrongs and in its turn indulge in the luxury of persecution.

MODES OF VOTING DESCRIBED.

The manner in which the right of suffrage shall be exercised, always a question of high importance, is one of difficulty also. It has been regulated in various ways in our States and in foreign countries, but must be considered in many respects as still open to debate. We have pretty generally adopted the vote by secret ballot for popular elections, but whether votes be given in secret or open ballot or by voice a question will remain as to the manner in which they shall be bestowed upon or distributed among candidates. Where but one Representative or other official is to be chosen by a constituency it is readily understood that a single vote is to be given by each elector to the candidate of his choice, and such is the uniform regulation. But where more than one person is to be chosen by a constituency the manner of bestowing votes upon candidates is a question of more difficulty, and various regulations have been made or proposed concerning it. Several of these it is necessary to mention and describe before proceeding to the main matters to be examined in this report.

THE VOTE BY GENERAL TICKET.

By the general ticket plan of distributive voting the elector has assigned to him a number of votes equal to the whole number of persons to be chosen, and is authorized to bestow them singly upon a like number of candidates. Upon this plan presidential electors are chosen in all the States except Florida.

THE VOTE BY SINGLE DISTRICTS.

By the single district plan the general constituency is divided into parts by territorial lines, and each part constituted a sub-constituency to vote separately and choose one person. The voter casts a single vote for his candidate and has no participation in the action of the general constituency beyond the giving of his district vote. Upon this plan, prescribed by statute, Representatives in Congress are now chosen.

THE LIMITED VOTE.

The limited vote obtains where the voter is forbidden to vote for the whole number of persons to be chosen by the constituency, but is authorized to give single votes to each of a less number or a single vote to one.

THE CUMULATIVE VOTE.

The cumulative vote is the concentration of two or more votes upon one candidate or upon each of a greater number. It may obtain when the voter has assigned to him more votes than one and is permitted to cast them otherwise than singly among candidates.

UNRESTRICTED OR FREE VOTE.

The unrestricted or free vote obtains where the voter has assigned to him a number of votes equal to the number of persons to be chosen by the constituency, and is permitted to cast them according to his own discretion and choice without legal restraint. In such cases he may bestow them all upon one candidate, or distribute them singly among candidates, or cumulate them upon more candidates than one, or cast a part of them singly and a part of them upon the principle of cumulation, precisely as his judgment may direct him and the possibilities of the case may permit.

SUPERIORITY OF THE FREE VOTE.

Now, it will be seen that the unrestricted or free vote is more comprehensive and flexible than the others, and that it includes many of their features and may be used to accomplish their objects. It involves or includes the vote by general ticket without the restriction that but one vote shall in any case be given to a candidate. It may be used to accomplish the purposes of the limited vote and of single district voting in a just, effectual, and popular manner, and it includes completely the cumulative vote with which it is in character closely allied. In brief, it combines the advantages of other plans without their imperfections, while it is not open to any strong objection peculiar to itself. The ingredient, however, of greatest value and importance contained in it, and the one particularly fitted to regenerate and give credit to elections is the principle of the concentration of votes. In fact for practical purposes in dissertation or argument upon the question of electoral reform, the terms "cumulative vote" and "free vote" may be interchangeably used, though the latter is most appropriate and accurate to indicate a plan which commonly involves distribution as well as concentration of votes, and sometimes even the giving of single votes to particular candidates.

HOW FAR IT CAN BE APPLIED.

The bill now reported by the committee applies the unrestricted or free vote to the selection of Representatives in Congress from the several States, and the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States reported by the committee on the 29th of January will, if adopted, empower Congress to apply that vote (or some other proper reform) to the selection of electors of President and Vice President of the United States.

By the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution power is clearly conferred upon Congress to pass a bill regulating the manner of holding elections for the choice of Representatives. The times, places, and manner of holding such elections are to be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations. This power was exercised by the passage of the act of Congress which provides that Representatives shall be chosen in the several States by single districts instead of by general ticket, which had been the general practice before, and it is equally competent for Congress to prescribe a still different manner for choosing them, subject only to such other provisions of the Constitution as may relate to the same subject. The free or cumulative vote or other like reform may therefore be introduced simply by the enactment of a statute. No constitutional amendment will be necessary for the purpose. But as to the choice of presidential electors the case is different, as before stated. The first section of the second article of the Constitution provides that each State shall appoint electors "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and fix a uniform day on which they shall give their votes, but cannot prescribe the manner in which they shall be chosen. To accomplish any reform in the manner of choosing them through the instrumentality of an act of Congress, an amendment to the Constitution will be necessary. That such amendment is desirable, and that it is necessary also to the introduction of any reform whatever in the manner of choosing electors, will be hereafter shown.

ARGUMENTS FOR ITS ADOPTION.

Recurring now to the question of representative reform raised by the bill reported by the committee, we will proceed to state those grounds of argument which recommend the adoption of the unrestricted or free vote.

ITS SIMPLICITY AND CONVENIENCE OF APPLICATION.

The first consideration to be taken into account is the simplicity and convenience of this plan of reform. It is easily understood, convenient of application, and will readily adapt itself to all new or changed conditions of political society. It is self-adjusting, and requires no law whatever to enforce it or afford it a sanction beyond the act which shall simply call it into existence. The number of Representatives to which a State shall be entitled being first ascertained under the rule of distribution contained in the Constitution, the law will simply declare that each voter of the State shall have as many votes as there are Representatives to be chosen from his State, and at that point will stop, leaving him perfectly free to cast his votes according to his own judgment and discretion.

The voter then may exercise his right according to any of the plans relating to the distribution or concentration of votes which have heretofore been the subject of discussion, including those which have and those which have not been prescribed by legal enactment. But inasmuch as our political communities will always be divided into political parties, (or so long as our free institutions remain to us,) it must happen that the voter will exercise his right with direct reference to his party associations, to the interests of the party to which he shall belong. He will vote (as he votes now) as a party man and for candidates who have been selected by some form of nomination, by some agreement or concert of action among men of common views and common interests. The inevitable result will be that political parties and the voters who compose them will obtain fair and complete representation by distributing or concentrating their votes in such manner as to secure it, and nothing can be more certain than that they will be better judges of their own interests than the law maker possibly can be; for they will act with a full knowledge of all the facts which pertain to an election, of the relative strength of parties at the time, the probable amount of the aggregate vote to be polled, and generally of the effect of their voting in any particular manner. Of all these matters the law maker must be profoundly ignorant, or must conjecture or assume them at random. He cannot foreknow the future, nor adapt his arrangements to the ever-changing conditions of political society.

It is for this reason that imperfection will always attach to the limited vote as a general plan to be applied to popular elections. The law maker cannot know that his arbitrary limitation will operate justly and secure his object at some future time. If he could know the exact relative strength of parties in future years he might apply his limitation to a constituency with confidence. Adjusting it to the facts he could obtain a proper result. As this cannot be the limited vote can be but partially applied to elections, and must in most cases be unsatisfactory. It has rarely been applied to constituencies selecting more than three Representatives, and can never be accepted as a plan for extensive use and application.

The unrestricted or free vote, however, is not open to these observations. It will adjust itself to all cases, and it will have the most important and effectual sanction, for it will be put under the guardianship of party interest, always active and energetic, which will give it direction and complete effect to the full and just representation of the people.

ITS CONFORMITY TO REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES.

The unrestricted or free vote is in strict conformity with democratic principles, and realizes more perfectly our ideas of popular government; for by it the whole mass of electors are brought into direct relations with Government, and particularly with that department or branch of Government—the principal one in power, if not in dignity—which makes the laws. All will participate really in choosing Representatives, and all will be represented in fact. Now the beaten body of electors choose nothing, unless it be mortification, and are not represented at all; for the theory that they are represented by the successful candidates against whom they have voted, that those candidates when installed in office represent them, is plainly false. An elected official represents the opinions and the will of those who choose him, and not of those who oppose his selection. As to the latter he is an antagonist and not a representative, for his opinions are opposed to theirs, and their will he will not execute. And this must always be the case where political parties act upon elections, and a majority or plurality rule assigns to one party the whole representation of the constituency. Our present system of representation is therefore essentially partial and imperfect, and our great object in reforming it must be to make it full and complete. If we cannot secure this object perfectly it will be our duty, as it should be our pleasure, to approach it as nearly as possible.

Now, inasmuch as by extending to the elector that freedom of choice and of selection which the law has heretofore forbidden we can strike from our system of representative elections almost entirely the element of disfranchisement and bring the whole electoral body into direct and useful relations with the representative body, we may congratulate ourselves that our reform, while it will be rich and fruitful of results in the purification of elections, in imparting energy and wisdom to government and contentment to the people, will also be strictly republican in character and democratic in principle, and will apply more perfectly than ever before those ideas of self-government which inspired our ancestors when they established our political institutions.

THE FOUR GREAT REASONS FOR IT.

But we proceed to state the main reasons for the unrestricted vote without dwelling upon introductory points or upon those secondary reasons which, while they may commend this plan of reform to us, will not alone command its adoption. Those great reasons—which speak with imperative voice to statesmen and to free constituencies everywhere—are four in number, and they will be mentioned in their proper order.

1. It is just.

The unrestricted or free vote should be permitted because it is just. That this quality pertains to it in a high degree and constitutes one of its main characteristics is beyond all question. It gives an equal voice to every elector of a State, secures the elector from the peril of utter disfranchisement, and affords to him also that freedom of choice which is indispensable to his complete and useful exercise of his right. A vote at any point or place in the State is precisely as valuable and as important as at any other point or place; location of the voter is immaterial as affecting his right or his consequence in the electoral body, and no preference in privilege or power is given or advantage allowed to one elector over another. Besides, (and this is the great consideration,) any material disfranchisement of electors is rendered almost impossible; for every political interest of any considerable magnitude in a State will have the complete opportunity afforded it of concentrating its vote upon a proper number of candidates, and those candidates will be chosen, not merely because they have more votes than other candidates, (as under our present system,) but because they are the recipients of an adequate support. One mass of voters will not vote down, defeat, or disfranchise another. One candidate will not beat another in the ordinary sense of that expression. The full comprehension of this point may require reflection by those to whom it is new, but no reflection is necessary to perceive the justice of a plan which will substantially strike disfranchisement from our electoral system. Lastly, it is but just that the elector should have a greater freedom of choice than is now allowed him; that his judgment should have freer action, that he should enjoy all possible facilities for performing his duty to his country in exercising his right of suffrage. At present he is hedged about and constrained by legal regulations which, while wholly unnecessary to the public order and peace, cripple and impede him in the performance of his duty. He is held responsible for the character and action of the Government, for in theory he controls it by his vote, and yet he does not possess all those facilities and rights the possession of which will justify that responsibility and enable him to discharge all its obligations.

In the matter of selecting Representatives from his State to Congress—perhaps the most important of all electoral operations known in our country—he is allowed to participate in the selection of but one out of the whole number. The State may be entitled to six, to twelve, or to twenty Representatives, but the judgment of the elector can be exercised upon the choice of one only. As to all the rest he is excluded from taking part in their selection. Besides, his choice of a single Representative must be exercised within and for a particular district arbitrarily established by law, with such boundaries, population, interests, and political complexion as may happen to be convenient or agreeable to a majority in the Legislature of the State. And practically he must select his candidate from among the men of the district and is excluded from all choice beyond it. And when to all this we add that the elections held in single districts are necessarily subjected to a majority or plurality rule, which very commonly renders a large part of the votes cast unavailing for the purpose for which they are given, we have the case fully presented as one of inconvenience and hardship upon the elector. The law has been busy where it should have been inactive, and the voter is bound by inconvenient and injurious restrictions, which he can neither evade nor defy. It is time that the hand of power be lifted from the citizen and he be permitted to perform his electoral duties with all possible freedom.

The justice of the proposed reform is therefore evident. It extends popular power upon a principle of equality, limits disfranchisement, and provides the voter with necessary facilities for the exercise of his right.

With good reason, therefore, did the London Times, in speaking of clause nine of the reform bill of 1867, (triumphantly carried in both Houses of Parliament upon full debate, and similar in principle to the proposition before us,) declare "that the idea of modifying our electoral machinery so as to secure in three-membered constituencies the proportionate representation of both the great divisions of party, has made its way by its inherent justice."

2. It will check corruption.

The unrestricted or free vote will greatly check corruption at elections. It will take away the motive to corrupt, and thus strike an effectual blow at the source of a great evil.

Now, money and patronage are usually expended upon elections to secure a majority or plurality vote to one or more candidates over one or more other candidates, and are directed or applied to the comparatively small number of electors in the constituency who hold the balance of power between parties. Those persons being bought or seduced, victory is secured. The importation of voters into a State or district or their fraudulent creation within it is with a like object. And such corrupt influence or practice when resorted to by one party provokes like conduct in an opposing one, until both become tainted with guilt and unfitted for vindicating the purity of elections. This evil grows in magnitude yearly, and it will continue to increase until those motives of interest which produce it shall be weakened or destroyed.

A new right to the elector, whether in the form of the free or cumulative vote or of personal representation, or a new protection to him in the form of the limited vote, will check corruption; but of these remedies the first is the most practicable and effectual. The limited vote, as will be hereafter shown, cannot have extensive application, and it is but a rude contrivance. Personal representation is a scheme of great theoretical merit; it has been tried partially in Denmark, and it has received elaborate vindication from authors of distinction in England, in Switzerland, and in France. But it may be put aside from the present discussion, because it is comparatively intricate in plan and cumbrous in detail, because it assails party organization, and because some of its most important effects cannot be distinctly foreseen. It is so radical in character, so revolutionary in its probable effects, that prudence will dictate that it should be very deliberately considered and be subjected to local experiment and trial before it shall be proposed for adoption upon a grand scale by the Government of the United States.

But why will the cumulative or free vote check corruption? It will have this certain effect, it will operate efficiently to this end, because it will render any ordinary effort of corruption useless and unavailing. The corruption of voters will not change the result of an election. It will elect no candidate and defeat no candidate in contested States or districts, unless, indeed, it be carried on and carried out upon a gigantic scale, beyond any ordinary example of the past or probable occurrence of the future.

An average or common ratio of votes for a Representative in Congress, taking the whole country together, is now twenty-five thousand, and it will be much greater in future times. Assume, then, that six hundred thousand votes are to be cast in Pennsylvania at an election, of which each political party has one half, and that twenty-four Representatives are to be chosen. This is a supposition very nearly conformed to actual numbers in that State. Now it is evident that either political party, by resorting to the cumulative vote, can elect twelve Representatives, and thus secure to itself exact and just representation, and no art or effort of the opposite party can prevent it. But suppose further that corruption shall assail the election, and that some thousands of votes shall be changed thereby, or that in the interest of one of the parties so many as ten or twenty thousand voters shall be imported into the State, or be fraudulently created or personated within it, in either case there will be no effect produced; the result will be unchanged; in short, in the case supposed, a fraudulent increase of its vote (and of the total vote) by a party, to the extent of twenty thousand, will not give to it any advantage, nor will its corrupt acquisition of five or ten thousand votes from the opposite party. It follows that corruption will in no ordinary case be resorted to; it will be effectually discouraged and prevented. And even in the extreme case of the corruption of a large number of voters in a State, the resulting evil will be reduced to its minimum.

What has been said concerning the choice of Representatives will apply with equal, if not greater, force to the choice of presidential electors. If the representative presidential electors were chosen in the several States—save those which have but one—upon the plan of the cumulative vote, there would be as to them due representation of the people in the electoral colleges, and the elections for choosing them would receive a much needed purification. Millions now expended upon those elections would be kept out of the hands of political agents and be applied to better and nobler uses.

That freedom of the vote will have the effect claimed for it will more clearly appear from considering the manner in which the present plan of elections operates to invite and produce corruption. By considering the evil which exists we will be better able to judge the merits of the remedy proposed. Popular elections in the States for Federal or national purposes are either by a general ticket for the whole State, or by a single ticket in district divisions. As before stated, the former obtains in the choice of presidential electors; the latter, in the choice of Representatives to Congress. But to both is applied the plurality rule and a struggle invited between candidates and parties for preponderance of vote.

Whichever can be made to outnumber an opposition upon the return will win the whole result and will wield the entire power of the constituency in an Electoral College or in Congress. Antagonism is thus made an essential element of the proceeding, and the result presents to us the spectacle of victor and vanquished, the former crowned with honor and exultant in strength, the latter humiliated and powerless. And it is important to observe that the successful party does not obtain merely a power proportioned to its vote, does not merely obtain full representation for itself, but obtains the whole power of the constituency. The whole vote cast against it or withheld from it is virtually counted to it and added to its true vote.

An issue thus made up for popular elections must be one portentous of evil; and so far as it is unnecessary to secure popular representation, must be denounced as plainly unjust as well as injurious.

* 3. It will be a guarantee of peace.

The free vote will be a guarantee of peace to our country, because it will exclude many causes of discord and complaint and will always secure to the friends of peace and union a just measure of political power. The absence of this vote in the States of the South when rebellion was plotted, and when open steps were taken to break the Union, was unfortunate, for it would have held the Union men of those States together and have given them voice in the electoral colleges and in Congress. But they were fearfully overborne by the plurality rule of elections and were swept forward by the course of events into impotency or open hostility to our cause. By that rule they were largely deprived of representation in Congress. By that rule they were shut out of the electoral colleges. Dispersed, unorganized, unrepresented, without due voice and power, they could interpose no effectual resistance to secession and to civil war. Their leaders were struck down at unjust elections and could not speak for them or act for them in their own States or at the capital of the nation. By facts well known to us we are assured that the leaders of revolt, with much difficulty, carried their States with them. Even in Georgia, the empire State of the South, the scale was almost balanced for a time between patriotism and dishonor; and in most of those States it required all the machinery and influence of a vicious electoral system to organize the war against us and hold those communities compactly as our foes.

In those same States the free vote will now allay antagonism of race, and will substitute therefor the rivalry of parties formed with reference to the policy of the General Government. The tendency of party is to form upon national issues and not upon State ones, and this tendency will operate more strongly if causes of offense between races shall be removed or lessened. And what can accomplish this more perfectly than the free vote? For under it one race cannot vote down and disfranchise the other; each can obtain its due share of power without injustice to the other, and there will be no strong and constant motive (as now) to struggle for the mastery. This fact—the importance of which cannot be overestimated—will allay animosity and prevent conflict. And because the free vote will have this certain effect it will nationalize parties in the South, and will be to the whole country an invaluable guarantee of order and peace.

In extending suffrage largely, in extending it to include many hundreds of thousands of voters of another race than our own, it will become us to look to our electoral machinery and to amend it in those parts which have been found defective, or which do not seem well adapted to the new strain to be put upon it. Unquestionably there is a large mass of honest opinion in the country opposed to colored suffrage, and many of those who support it in Congress and out of Congress put their support of it upon the ground of necessity—upon the ground that in order to secure the fruits of emancipation it is necessary that the emancipated be armed with the power of self-defense. A majority of this committee hold that colored suffrage is allowable and expedient, that the objections to it are to a great extent misconceived, and that the fears felt and expressed by many as to its results will not be realized. But all must agree that this great experiment of extended suffrage, being once determined upon, should have a fair trial; that all the conditions proper to its success should, as far as possible, be established by the Government. And those who sincerely believe that the experiment will have bad results must approve a plan of voting which will certainly mitigate its possible evils. But the salutary effects of the free vote as a guarantee of peace, though well illustrated by the southern States, will not be confined to them. Everywhere it will decrease the violence of party contests and create more amicable relations than now exist among our people.

4. It will improve the character and ability of the House.

The unrestricted or free vote will secure men of ability and experience in the House of Representatives. It is believed that changes are now too frequent in that House, and that the public interests suffer detriment from this cause. The committee give their unqualified approval to that provision of the Constitution which assigns short terms of service to members of the House. But frequency of election does not necessarily involve rapidity of change. Popular power may be retained over the House, and yet the great part of its members be continued by reelection for a considerable period of time; in other words, frequent elections and permanent membership are not incompatible.

But, in point of fact, the members of the House are frequently changed so that members of less than four years' service always constitute a large majority, and it is a rare case that a member continues beyond a third term. Under such a system or practice of rapid change the average character of the House for ability cannot be high. Two and four year men can know but little of the business of Government, can be but imperfectly qualified to curb abuses in the executive department, and to expose or comprehend the true character of most questions of domestic and foreign policy.

There are several reasons which account for frequent change in the membership of the House, of which the single-district system is chief. The fluctuations of party power is next in importance, but is intimately connected with the former. The single-district system has carried the idea of local representation to excess, and has produced a class of inconveniences peculiar to itself. The idea of assigning a Representative by law to a special district within a State is naturally supplemented by the idea of rotation in the representative privilege among the localities within the district. Hence, very commonly party nominations are made in turn to the several counties, parishes, or other municipal divisions of the district, which necessitates the frequent selection of new men for representative nomination. The claim of locality becomes more important, and is often more regarded than the claims or fitness of candidates in making party nominations, and this although there is no diversity of interest among the people in the different parts of the district. The other cause which we have mentioned coöperates with this, though subordinate to it in effect. Changes of party power in districts, where one party does not largely predominate over another, are at all times likely to occur, and to defeat the member of the House from the district, although his own party may desire to continue him in the public service.

These causes of change would have but slight operation if delegations from States were elected by general ticket, and would have still less if they were selected upon the plan of the cumulative or free vote; and the general ticket system being quite inadmissible, upon the reasons which apply to it, we are driven to the cumulative or free vote as the practicable and effectual measure of reform. It will continue members of merit for long periods of time in the House, because it will relieve them and those who support them from the causes of change above-mentioned. They can be re-elected with certainty so long as the party whose Representatives they are desire their continuance in service, and it may be reasonably expected that some men of distinction and intellectual power will always be found in the House whose period of service counts by twenty or thirty years. They will be the great representatives of party, and will give luster and power and usefulness to the House, while they will be the objects of profound attachment and of honest pride in the States they represent. Congress will become, much more than at present, a theater of statesmanship and a fit representative of a great people, whose extended territory, diverse populations, and varied interests demand great ability and wisdom in the enactment of the laws. Our present system, admirably calculated to repress merit and lift mediocrity, will be supplanted by one which will produce precisely the opposite result.

At present a member of the House holding his seat insecurely cannot devote himself to public business with that zeal and confidence which his position demands. He is involved all the time in a contest for official existence, and his energies are thereby absorbed and wasted. If he has a just ambition to serve the people he must repress rivals at home, must overcome a rule of rotation in his district, and fortify himself against fluctuations of party power. It will be expected of him that he shall distribute the patronage of the Government to men who will be efficient in his support for reelection; and thus appointments to office and Government contracts are to be his peculiar study, and their distribution a leading object of his labor. And he must be liberal in his expenditure of money upon elections to retain his popularity and place; and the more of political contribution from abroad he can obtain to influence elections in his district the more admired and the more secure he will be.

In brief, his time and his efforts instead of being expended for the public must be expended on personal objects if he desires to remain for any considerable time a Representative of the people. Undoubtedly many of the best men of the country must be deterred from entering upon a congressional career, continuance in which requires such sacrifices to an evil system, so much of unpleasant effort, attended with uncertainty and probable mortification.

But freedom to the elector has one special advantage, hitherto unnoticed, over single district voting. Under the district system a large part of the men of a State are absolutely barred from election to Congress. They cannot be chosen in districts where their party has not a preponderance of vote. The difference in strength between parties may be slight, but it will virtually constitute a rule of exclusion which will always be rigidly enforced. But the cumulative or free vote opens the doors of the people's house to any citizen of a State whenever those who agree with him in opinion in his State will give him a competent support. They can elect him to Congress regardless of State or district majorities. This is an advantage of immense value if republican principles be true, and republican institutions be worthy of being carried to their utmost limit of perfection as fit and proper for the use and enjoyment of mankind.

Representative Reform—Report.

EXAMPLES OF REFORM.

But let us turn from general argument upon electoral reform to particular cases which will illustrate its application. And first of cases in our own country:

In Pennsylvania and in other States inspectors of elections are chosen upon the plan of the limited vote. Each voter is authorized to vote for but one inspector, and yet two are to be chosen. Thus, whenever the minority party in an election district can poll one third of the whole vote they can secure one of the inspectors, and obtain representation in the election board of the district. This arrangement protects elections from fraud and injustice, and is everywhere within the States which have adopted it strongly sustained by public opinion. In fact, even in districts where the majority has more than a two-thirds vote the attempt is rarely made by them to choose the second inspector.

In Pennsylvania also jury commissioners in the several counties are chosen upon the same plan. But one is voted for by each elector, and yet two are chosen.

For selecting delegates at large to the New York constitutional convention in 1867 a similar plan was adopted. Upon the recommendation of Governor Fenton the Legislature provided that thirty-two delegates at large should be chosen by the people in addition to the delegates from the representative districts, and that in choosing them each voter should vote for but sixteen. The consequence was that each political party obtained sixteen of the delegates at large, many of whom could not have been chosen upon a district plan or upon a general ticket devised in the ordinary way.

These instances in our country illustrate the principle of reform now in question, and many others might be cited. They show distinctly that successful attempts have been made by our people to break away from an unjust system of voting and to secure to themselves those advantages which full representation is so well calculated to produce.

ENGLISH REFORM.

But English authority and example may be called in to aid the argument in a still more effectual manner. The papers appended to this report, from British authors and statesmen of high standing who have in recent years examined this subject of popular representation with great fullness and power, may be consulted with profit by any one desirous of understanding the general grounds of argument in favor of reform. And the debates and proceedings in Parliament during 1867 upon the reform bill may also be examined in connection with the returns of parliamentary elections in 1868 for further and most valuable information.

On the 4th of July, 1867, Mr. Lowe (the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Gladstone administration) moved the following amendment to the reform bill in the House of Commons:

"Power to distribute votes.—At any contested election for a county or borough represented by more than two members, and having more than one seat vacant, every voter shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of vacant seats, and may give all such votes to one candidate, or may distribute them among the candidates as he thinks fit."

This amendment (which was for the free vote including the principle of cumulation and applicable generally to elections where more than one member was to be chosen) was debated on the day when offered and on the day following, and received the very handsome support of one hundred and seventy-three votes—a large vote for a new proposition upon its first trial of strength. Mr. Lowe's amendment was identical in principle and almost identical in terms with the bill now reported by this committee. The English proposition applied to the election of members of Parliament, the American applies to the election of members of Congress; but in both a free vote, including the right of cumulation, is the essential idea, and the object in view more complete and just representation of the people.

On the 30th July, 1867, the reform bill being under consideration in the House of Lords, Lord Cairns moved to insert the following new clause, to come in after clause eight of the bill:

"At a contested election for any county or borough represented by three members, no person shall vote for more than two candidates."

This amendment, after an elaborate debate, was adopted by a strong vote: contents 142, not contents 51; and an additional amendment was then also adopted without a division that "at a contested election for the city of London" (which is entitled to four members) "no person shall vote for more than three candidates."

The success of those amendments (which were concurred in by the House of Commons on the 8th of August) constituted an important event in the history of representative institutions, for they recognized and gave application to a principle of justice which will endure the test of trial and of time—a principle which will hereafter receive indefinite extension, and wherever extended will purify elections, insure contentment to constituencies, and elevate the character and improve the action of free government.

Mr. Gladstone, speaking in the House of Commons and confining his attention to his own country, declared that the proposition or principle contained in those amendments if adopted at all must be adopted with the certainty that "it must unfold and expand itself over the whole country and completely reconstruct the system of distribution of seats." And generally those who supported it in both houses of Parliament foretold and rejoiced in the prospect of its future expansion.

Those amendments constitute the ninth and tenth clauses of the reform act of 15th of August, 1867, and their effect is illustrated by the parliamentary elections of 1868. We give the returns for certain districts:

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS, 1868.

Herefordshire, three members. Average Tory vote, 3,360; average Liberal vote, 2,074. Two Tories and one Liberal elected.

Cambridgeshire, three members. Average Tory vote, 3,924; average Liberal vote, 3,310. Two Tories and one Liberal elected.

The Liberals also obtained the third member in each of the Tory counties of Oxford, Bucks, and Dorset.

Liverpool borough, three members. Average Tory vote, 16,404; average Liberal vote, 15,198. Tory majority, 1,206.

In Liverpool the second seat, previously held by the Tories, was attacked by the Liberals; the result was a failure, as shown by the above vote. But the third member was most justly secured to the Liberals under the certain operation of the limited vote, provided by clause nine of the reform act.

Under the operation of the same clause the Tories obtained the third member for Leeds, and they carried members also in Manchester and London.

Blackwood's Magazine, a Tory organ, (it has called itself "the oldest of the Tories,") although it admits that its party has suffered loss to the extent of at least four seats by the minority clause, says:

"That to the principle of that clause, fairly and consistently worked out, it has no objection whatever."—Blackwood's Magazine, January, 1869.

This expression of opinion by a leading organ of the party which suffered somewhat under the minority clause is a valuable testimony in favor of the principle of electoral reform, which that clause was intended to promote.

DIFFICULTIES OF ENGLISH REFORM.

Mr. Disraeli, in debate on the 5th of July, 1867, pointed out one great practical obstacle to the adoption of the cumulative vote in England which does not exist in this country. It happens that the Scotch and Welsh districts are nearly all one-member districts with Liberal majorities. The proposed reform is, therefore, inapplicable to those parts of the kingdom as at present organized for election purposes, and if it were applied to England alone, upon an extensive scale, it might give undue influence and power in the House of Commons to Scotch and Welsh members. They would control the House upon all party questions. Full representation in England would tend to equalize the strength of parties in the House, and then the Scotch vote cast wholly on one side would always turn the scale.

But putting this consideration aside and taking the English districts as they stand, we find that most of them are not adapted, or well adapted, to the cumulative vote. A great part of them are boroughs electing one member each. In schedule A of the reform act are no less than thirty-eight such boroughs added to those which existed before, and in schedule B nine additional. Other boroughs choose two members each, as do divisions of counties, thirty-five of which are fixed in the reform act, schedule D. The triangular districts, those which elect three members each, are not numerous, and we are not aware that any district elects a greater number save London, which elects four. The limited vote is now, however, applied to London and to all the triangular districts, whether boroughs or counties, and it is to be expected that by the reorganization and consolidation of districts hereafter reform will be greatly extended.

REFORM IN THE UNITED STATES.

But the difficulties and obstacles which exist in Great Britain do not exist with us. Our States are well suited to the application of the free vote. There are now only six of the whole number to which it will not apply as a plan for representative elections, to wit, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, and Oregon. They constitute the one-member States, and would be unaffected by the new plan. But from this class Kansas will pass at the next apportionment, leaving but five States out of thirty-seven to compose this class; and as they would select but five Representatives out of about two hundred and fifty who will constitute the House, their influence upon general results would be unimportant if not inappreciable. It is to be remarked, also, that these States, in common with all the other States, might come under the operation of the free vote if that vote should be applied to presidential elections, because each of them will be entitled to choose three electors.

THE TWO-MEMBER STATES.

The two-member States are Rhode Island and Minnesota, and both will probably change their position at the next apportionment of Representatives. Rhode Island will fall off to one member and Minnesota rise to three. Other States, however, two or three in number, may take their place, and hence it will be worth while to consider the position of two-member States with reference to the plan of the free vote. It has been sometimes said, without due reflection, tion, that the cumulative vote is not suited to elections where two persons are to be chosen by a constituency, because if it have practical effect it will give equal representation to the majority and minority. But the frequent application of the limited vote to dual elections—as in the cases of inspectors of elections and jury commissioners in Pennsylvania—may cause us to pause and examine this objection with some care before we accept it as a sound one. Carefully examined it may turn out to be more specious than solid, and we may further discover that in the case of the representation of our States in the Federal Government there is an important fact which bears upon this objection and deprives it of any appearance even of strength or force.

In the first place let us test the objection and illustrate its futility by a supposed case. Take a constituency of 32,000 electors, 20,000 of whom are Tories and 12,000 Liberals, entitled to elect two members to Parliament. As there are 32,000 voters and two members to be chosen the full ratio or number of votes for a member is 16,000. Assign now one member to the Tories and the just demand of 16,000 Tory voters is complied with and exhausted. They can have no further claim to representation. What have we left? Why, on the one hand 4,000 Tory voters, and on the other 12,000 Liberals, and the simple question for us to determine is whether the 4,000 or the 12,000 shall have the second member. The cumulative or the free vote will give that second member to the 12,000 Liberals; unjust voting will give him to the 4,000 Tories.

But let us cite cases of actual parliamentary elections in 1868, for two-member districts, in further illustration: northeast Lancashire, two members; average Tory vote, 3,615; average Liberal vote, 3,458.

Two Tories elected upon a majority of 157. The ratio for a member was 3,586, so that 79 Tory voters obtained the second member, while 3,438 Liberals were disfranchised.

Take next two districts in Kent. Mid Kent, two members; average Tory vote, 3,245; average Liberal vote, 2,873. West Kent, two members; average Tory vote, 3,389; average Liberal vote, 3,279.

Two Tories were chosen from each district. In Mid Kent 186 Tory votes carried the second member, and in West Kent, 55; while in the two districts 6,152 Liberals were entirely disfranchised.

East Derbyshire, two members; average Liberal vote, 2,069; average Tory vote, 1,974. Yorkshire, West Riding, (south,) two members; average Liberal vote, 8,032; average Tory vote, 7,935.

In these districts four Liberals were elected; in one the second member was carried by 48 and in the other by 49 votes; while 9,909 Tories were wholly disfranchised.

Where, then, a minority in a two-member constituency exceeds one third the whole number of voters therein it does not seem unreasonable to assign to them the second member, and thus, in fact, an equality of representation with the majority. It is a case where complete or exact justice is impossible; there must be disfranchisement to some extent; but that disfranchisement should be reduced to its minimum and made to press as lightly as may be upon the constituency. What, then, can be said as to two-member constituencies is this, that any rule of voting for them must (in the very nature of the case) be imperfect in result; but that the cumulative vote, or an equivalent plan applied even to them, will be one of reform and improvement.

But an important consideration remains to be mentioned. Our States are represented in both Houses of Congress, and not merely in one; a fact which changes entirely the character of this question in the two-member States. In Great Britain there is no representation of the people, or even of districts, in the upper house of Parliament. Compensation to a constituency for loss of political power in the House of Commons cannot be obtained by them in the House of Lords. With us the case is widely different. The political majority in a State will ordinarily have both the Senators from the State; in other words, the whole representation of the State in the Senate. If, then, in two-member States they have but one half the representation of the State in the House (as against a minority of one third or upward) the aggregate of their representation in Congress will still be many times over what it should be upon any principle of justice or of numbers.

THE THREE-MEMBER STATES.

It is agreed pretty generally that the cumulative or free vote is admirably suited to three-member constituencies. The States which now elect three members each are Arkansas, California, New Hampshire, Vermont, and West Virginia. In such States the majority will always have two members, and the minority, if it exceed one fourth the whole constituency and one third of the majority vote, can obtain the third. Upon constituencies or districts of this class—called indiscriminately "three-handed," "three-cornered," or "triangular"—much of the debate in Great Britain as to reform in popular voting has been expended. The question as to them in particular is fully expounded in the papers (drawn from British sources) which are appended to this report.

THE GREAT STATES.

Having exhausted the list of States which elect less than four members we find that twenty-four remain. Of these Connecticut, South Carolina, and Texas each elect four members and the remainder various numbers, up to New York, which chooses thirty-one. They may be taken together in this examination as an additional, though by far the most important, class of States. They choose two hundred and eighteen out of the two hundred and forty-three members of the House. In this class all the great States are before us and all of secondary rank, challenging the wisdom of Congress to reform and amend our political system in some effectual manner; for our country has in some respects outgrown the system provided for us by the care of our ancestors; new necessities press upon us; great evils afflict us, and it has become the duty of statesmen not merely to administer or to carry on our plan of government, but to amend it also; and to this end we are to invite and welcome the best thoughts of men abroad and at home upon political reform, and give them, as far as possible, application and practical effect.

Now, there can be no question that if parties in the great States obtain representation according to the number of their votes one of the greatest possible reforms in a republican government will be secured. All the arguments heretofore mentioned apply to those States with special force, because they contribute the main body of members to the House, and a defective plan of election operates within them with extensive effect. As to them reform will be most important and useful, and no reasonable effort should be spared in attempting to apply it.

We have in fact as to the great States no point left for examination except the single one of practicability. Will the free vote work and work well in the great States? Those who distrust popular intelligence and judgment may deny, while those who confide in the people will affirm, the practicability of the plan. But there is one leading consideration which, in the judgment of the committee, is decisive upon this question. It is that where free action shall be permitted each political party will pursue its own interests with activity, intelligence, and zeal, and will inevitably obtain for itself its due share of representative power. Thus where a party shall have one third of the popular vote of the State it will cumulate its vote upon one third the number of Representatives to be chosen. Where parties are nearly equal in strength in a State the weaker one will cumulate its vote upon one half the number of persons to be chosen, or within one of that number. Where a party has a small majority in a State, and particularly where it is increasing in numbers, it will cumulate its vote upon one or two more than one half the number of candidates. And finally, in States with large delegations a party with so small a vote as one fourth or one fifth the whole number will cumulate its vote upon the small number of one, two, three, or more Representatives, according to the proportion which its vote shall bear to the total vote of the State. The due working of the plan is secured by the selfish interests with which it deals, and we may congratulate ourselves that under the plan the very efforts of parties to secure power for themselves will result in justice; that is, in the division of power between them according to their respective numbers.

Now, it is idle to say that voting in the great States will be confused and uncertain. On the contrary, it will run according to party organization at all times, and will adjust itself naturally and inevitably to all changes of opinion and organization in the political body. And as political parties constantly divide society into parts, the relative strength of which can at any time be approximately stated, there need not be uncertainty or confusion in the polling of votes. And even in times of transition and change, when popular power is departing from one party and attaching itself to another or when some third party takes ground upon a particular issue or faction diverts a fragmentary vote from a great party, the amount of disturbance and consequent uncertainty produced will not be considerable, and can be readily estimated for all practical purposes in fixing the number of candidates which any party shall support. The merit or practicability of a rule of elections is not to be judged upon a supposition which is unlikely or exceptional; but even in the cases supposed the elements of error and mistake will be reduced to their smallest possible quantity. Where the relative strength of party is uncertain—that is, cannot be exactly known or estimated—or where the boundary of power between them is near the dividing line between ratios of representation, it will rarely happen that a mistake will be made beyond the extent of one member, and the general result for the State will be but slightly disturbed.

THE CHOICE OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States regarding the choice of electors of President and Vice President of the United States, reported by this committee on the 29th of January, (adopted by the Senate subsequently, but lost upon disagreement between the two Houses,) deserves distinct examination, particularly as full debate upon it in the two Houses of Congress could not be had when it came up for consideration, for want of time. That amendment is as follows:

"The second clause, first section, article two of the Constitution of the United States shall be amended to read as follows: Each State shall appoint, by a vote of the people thereof qualified to vote for Representatives in Congress, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust and profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector; and the Congress shall have power to prescribe the manner in which such electors shall be chosen by the people."

The amendment has two objects: first, to secure to the people at all times the right of choosing electors themselves; and second, to authorize Congress to prescribe the manner in which this popular right shall be exercised. In other respects the amendment follows the language of the existing Constitution and introduces no change. At present electors are to be appointed as the Legislatures of the several States may direct, and there is no uniform rule for the whole country. Although in most of the States the practice has been to choose them by a popular vote, this has not been a matter of constitutional right in the people, but of legislative permission and liable at any time to be taken away. That the authority to appoint electors should be fixed in the Constitution by a uniform rule, and not be left to legislative discretion, is, we believe, a general opinion, and it rests upon good grounds of reason and experience. South Carolina formerly chose her electors by a vote of her Legislature, and the people had no voice in the proceeding; but by her present constitution formed under the reconstruction laws their appointment must be directly by the people. It may be questioned whether a State constitution can take away the discretionary power vested in the Legislature by the Constitution of the United States, which is "the supreme law of the land," but this action by South Carolina shows that popular right requires a constitutional guarantee against the caprice, ambition, or corruption of legislative bodies. Florida has by law placed the appointment of her electors in her Legislature, and a recent attempt in Alabama to fix a similar arrangement in that State was only frustrated by an Executive veto. It may be apprehended that in some future election of President and Vice President closely contested the Legislature of a State or the Legislatures of several States may take to themselves the appointment of electors, prevent their choice by the people, and change the result of the election. This is a danger to be carefully guarded against, to be wholly removed from our electoral system, not only because it contains an element of injustice but because it may provoke convulsion and civil war.

Representative Reform—Report.

The next provision of the amendment that Congress may prescribe the manner in which electors shall be chosen by the people is most important and valuable. It is true that this clause only permits and does not require congressional action, but its necessity for the introduction of any reform in the manner of choosing presidential electors is perfectly certain, as will be presently shown. The objection that because this clause will take power from the Legislatures of the States and vest it in Congress, or rather will authorize Congress to interpose and control the action of State Legislatures, it will increase Federal power and tend to consolidation, ought not to prevail against the amendment, and that for several reasons. In the first place, the choice of presidential electors is a Federal question as much as the choice of members of Congress, and may properly be subjected to similar regulation as to the manner in which it shall be performed. In the next place, the original design of the electoral colleges has wholly failed. They were intended to be bodies for deliberation and free choice; in other words, to exercise judgment and discretion in giving their votes to candidates for President and Vice President. It was expected that they would not in form and theory merely, but in fact and truth choose the two principal executive officials in the Government of the United States, and it is to be noticed that the "manner" in which they shall choose is carefully "prescribed" by the Constitution. They are to meet on a fixed day in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, (one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves,) and shall make distinct lists of their votes, signed and certified, and transmit them under seal to the President of the Senate. But the manner in which the electors themselves should be chosen was not prescribed (or authority conferred upon Congress to prescribe it) for two reasons: first, because the convention did not determine what authority should appoint them; and second, because the actual choice of President and Vice President was intended to be in the colleges themselves, whose "manner" of choosing was distinctly fixed.

These considerations are now of no force. On the contrary, when it is expressly provided that the people shall choose the electors; and it is understood that the colleges shall simply represent them and execute their will, the regulation of the manner in which the electors shall be chosen falls, as before stated, within the same reason which applies to the regulation of the manner of choosing Representatives in Congress; and it falls also within the reasons which originally induced the regulation of the manner in which the electoral colleges were to exercise their powers. The amendment therefore is in conformity with principles already contained in the Constitution, and does not introduce any "portentious novelty" into our system.

But the most important reason in favor of this branch of the amendment remains to be mentioned. It is absolutely necessary to secure reform in the manner of choosing electors. They are now chosen by general ticket in nearly all the States, and the only practical alternative to this plan is legislative choice, which is still worse, and struck at by the prior clause of the amendment. Now, the general ticket plan is very objectionable, as is well known, and yet the States cannot change it. Theoretically, by virtue of an express clause of the Constitution, the State Legislatures may direct the manner in which electors shall be appointed at their pleasure, but practically they cannot or will not exercise that power in the direction of reform. Always, whenever they have not taken to themselves the power of appointing electors, they have provided that they should be elected by the people upon the general ticket plan, and that plan, so long as they allow a popular vote at all the presidential elections, they will not abolish or amend. The explanation of this is not difficult, and it will be easily understood by any one familiar with our political history and with the character of our political parties.

By the general ticket a political majority in a State can wield the whole power of the State in an electoral college, not merely a power proportioned to their own numbers, but a power proportioned to the joint vote of their own and of an opposing party. They obtain not only the power appropriate to themselves, but also the power appropriate to their opponents or rivals. Now it is not to be expected that a party in a State will voluntarily surrender such an advantage, though tainted with odium and injustice, or that their representatives in the State Legislature will surrender it; for it is a law of party to obtain all the power possible, and to yield no advantage except upon compulsion or for adequate compensation.

But if considerations of justice and the general good could have weight with the State Legislatures, and overrule with them the suggestions of selfish interest, still reform could not be secured. A change in order to operate fairly should be uniform throughout the whole country and be applied in all the States at the same time. But State action in the way of change must be successive, extending over a period of years, and would not probably be uniform or universal. And so no State could well venture to take the initiative, as its political majority would make a certain sacrifice for an uncertain or imperfect reform. If a political majority in the Legislature of Indiana should desire to have electors chosen by single districts they could not afford to adopt the plan alone. For they would discover at a glance that if other States did not adopt it they would weaken their party without any possible compensation. While they would divide power in their own electoral college with an opposing party, that opposing party, by holding on to the general ticket plan in another State (Kentucky for instance) would obtain an advantage which might determine the general result of the presidential election. Upon the whole, then, we must conclude that without an amendment of the Constitution any reform whatever in the manner of choosing presidential electors is impossible.

But it is said by many that the electoral colleges should be abolished and the people be permitted to vote directly for President and Vice President. An amendment of the Constitution to effect this purpose has been often proposed, but has never been submitted to the States for adoption, and for a very good reason, which is, that they would have rejected it. Nor is it now possible to obtain the ratification of such an amendment by three fourths of the States. The reason is a plain one. All the small States and all the States of secondary rank are interested largely in retaining their representation as States in the electoral colleges. They have now each two electors without regard to population, whereas under the plan proposed they would be confined to the principle of numbers and would influence the result of an election only in proportion to their actual votes polled. No less than twenty-four States out of thirty-seven would lose from about one fourth to two thirds of their present political weight in presidential elections by the change. This fact is decisive. Instead of ratifications by three fourths of the States there would be prompt rejections by a majority of them if this proposition should be submitted.

But although the electoral colleges cannot be abolished by constitutional amendment they may be greatly reformed. They may be made to represent more truly the will of the people and the States, or of the people alone, by an amendment of the Constitution which shall prescribe, or shall authorize Congress to prescribe, the manner in which their members shall be chosen. It may be provided that the two electors of each State, commonly called senatorial electors, who represent the principle of State equality, shall be chosen in one manner, and the remaining electors of the State, who represent the principle of numbers, in another, or that all the electors shall be chosen in the same way. If the former plan should be preferred the senatorial electors might be chosen by general ticket, and then as to them there would be no change from the present practice. But it could be provided that the representative electors in the one case, or all the electors in the other, should be chosen by single districts, or upon the principle of the free vote. The single district plan would be a very great improvement, and it would be free from some of the objections which lie against it when applied to the choice of Representatives in Congress; but the free vote would be infinitely preferable to it, because it would be more convenient, because it would prevent corruption, and because it would secure a more full and just representation of the people in the electoral colleges.

It is the opinion of the committee that under their amendment as reported Congress would be authorized only to prescribe uniform rules for choosing electors; rules applicable to the whole country and operating equally in every State. But if this opinion should be questioned a slight change of phraseology in the amendment would remove all doubt.

To the suggestion that Congress might attempt itself to district the States in order to perpetrate party injustice there are several answers. In the first place, it is not at all certain that Congress would form districts more unfairly than they would be formed by State Legislatures. In the next place, it is not at all likely, and hardly possible, that Congress would undertake this work, which would be to it both inconvenient and odious. It possesses now the same power of controlling the manner of choosing Representatives which it is proposed to confer upon it in regard to choosing electors; and yet it has never undertaken to district the States for Representative elections, in which it is more directly interested than in those for electors. But again, if thought expedient, the amendment might be modified so as to exclude the direct action of Congress in the formation of districts. It is hardly necessary to add that the adoption of the free vote for the choice of electors would avoid this and all similar questions of debate.

The committee refer to the paper upon electoral colleges prepared by Colonel Wheeler, of the Treasury Department, and appended to this report, for interesting information upon the subject of presidential elections and for timely suggestions on the question of reform.

CONCLUSION.

The committee must now conclude their examination of a most important subject. They have not been able, on account of the pressure of other duties, to fill up completely the argument in favor of the free vote or to answer in form the possible objections which may be made to its adoption. But they have endeavored to present fairly the main arguments which should weigh with Congress and with the people in its favor, and by due explanation of its purpose and character to vindicate it against misconception and cavil. As to the objections which may be made that it would delocalize representation, that it would introduce some degree of confusion, that it would decrease political activity, and that it is opposed to the doctrine that the majority shall rule, they must content themselves with declaring that in their opinion none of these objections are well taken or well suited to undergo debate, and that they were thoroughly answered in the two houses of Parliament in 1867. The last one in particular is preposterous, for it is one of the main merits of reformed voting that it will secure the true rule of the majority and give to it a sanction it does not now possess. The whole mass of the electoral population being represented by reformed voting in the representative body the vote will be there taken upon any question in controversy and the voice of the majority duly pronounced; but at present minority rule may obtain, for in the first place all minorities in popular elections are struck out of the returns, and next the minority vote in the representative body is overruled when a decision is there made, so that we have, in fact, the rule of a majority of a majority, which very likely represents only a minority among the people, particularly when a plurality rule is applied to the popular elections.

The argument for reform may be summed up in a few words. By it we will obtain cheap elections, just representation, and contentment among the people; by it we will also secure able men in the people's House; by it our political system will be invigorated and purified; by it our country will "take a bond of the future" that our Government shall be a blessing and not a curse; that our prosperity shall be enduring; that our free institutions "shall not perish from the face of the earth."

Senate Bill No. 722.—(Fortieth Congress, Third Session.)

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 13, 1869.

Mr. BUCKALEW asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill entitled "A bill to amend the representation of the people in Congress;" which was read twice, and referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. BUCKALEW, ANTHONY, FERRY, MORTON, WARNER, RICE, and WADE.

MARCH 2, 1869.

Mr. WADE, from the select Committee on Representative Reform, reported the bill without amendment, as follows:

A bill to amend the representation of the people in Congress.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in elections for the choice of Representatives to the Congress of the United States, whenever more than one Representative is to be chosen from a State, each elector of such State, duly qualified, shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of Representatives to be chosen from the State, and may give all such votes to one candidate, or may distribute them, equally or unequally, among a greater number of candidates; and the candidates highest in vote upon the return shall be declared elected.

APPENDIX.

It has been thought proper and is found convenient to place in an appendix various citations of authority in favor of representative reform from parliamentary debates and from the writings of English authors. These evidences of the progress of thought abroad upon one of the most important and interesting questions which relate to representative government it is believed are worthy the attention of both statesman and citizen in this country—of all who desire the progress and improvement of free institutions and a satisfactory issue to our great experiment of democratic government.

A few general observations may fitly precede what follows. In the first place it is to be remarked that reform in Parliament as secured in 1867, in regard to the mode of popular voting, broke through the lines of party and was obtained independent of party support.

In both houses of Parliament Whigs and Tories, Liberals and Conservatives, Independents and Radical members, were found together in support of an amendment which was intended to do justice to the people and improve the representative body. In the upper house of Parliament in fact the opposition became at last narrowed almost to the ministry and their immediate dependents—a fact which induced the chief minister of the Crown in the lower house to abandon the opposition which he had at first proclaimed. In this country also the question of reform in the manner of popular voting is not one of a party character, and cannot be made such. It appeals to all good citizens and to all thoughtful men, in whatever political organization they may be found, and demands of them an independent and patriotic support. Already men of different opinions upon ordinary questions of party, and others of independent views, have stood forward among us as urgent advocates of reform. Of these, outside of Congress, honorable mention is to be made of Mr. J. Francis Fisher, Mr. Greeley, Mr. D. G. Croly, and Mr. Samuel Stern. Mr. Greeley's proposition in the New York constitutional convention of 1867, for the division of his State into fifteen senatorial districts, each of which should elect three senators upon the principle of the cumulative vote, was one of much merit, and will deserve upon some future occasion to be revived, and will also deserve to be imitated in other States.

ARGUMENTS IN PARLIAMENT.

In the House of Commons, July 4, 1867, Right Hon. Robert Lowe, on moving his amendment for the cumulative vote to the reform bill, addressed the house at length. He said:

"That he must not be understood as coming forward to argue for any protection to the minority," "but between the members of the constituency there should be absolute equality; the majority should have nothing given to it because it was a majority; the minority should have nothing taken away from it." "Let each voter have an equal number of votes not dependent upon the use he makes of them; let him be at liberty to dispose of them as he likes."

"The tendency of the present system was to make that stronger which was already strong, and that weaker which was already weak. By an arbitrary and unreasonable rule it strengthened the majority; by the same arbitrary and unreasonable rule it weakened the minority. On abstract justice, therefore, the present rule could not be maintained. The proper way to alter it was to give each elector as many votes as there were vacancies, and leave him absolutely free to dispose of them as he pleased—to give all to one person, one to each of three, or two to one, and one to another. By that means they would be doing nothing unjust or unfair to the majority or to the minority. They would be merely putting them on a level, and leaving them on perfectly fair ground. That was the abstract argument. There were different ways by which the end might be accomplished. Some proposed to give only a single vote to each elector; others recommended that when there were three candidates each elector should have two votes. He proffered to give each elector three votes, and allow him to dispose of them as he pleased.

"The objection to the two first proposals was that they would operate in the way of disfranchisement, and would take away something people already possessed; because on the supposition that there were three candidates they had already three votes. The system he proposed had greater flexibility and better adapted itself to the general purposes of elections." "They would find that in this way opinion in constituencies would ripen. Opinion in that House would ripen to changes, and the House would become a more delicate reflex of the opinions of the constituencies. The existence of such a system of gradual growth, not only of opinion but in the representation of opinion, would, to a great extent, prevent the necessity of external agitation, and be a great discouragement to it. There was nothing more worthy of the attention of statesmen in the new state of affairs than anything which would have the tendency to prevent that violent oscillation which they now witnessed. What happened in the United States? The minority of thousands might as well not exist at all. It is absolutely ignored. Was their country (England) in like manner to be formed into two hostile camps, debarred from each other in two solid and compact bodies? Or were they to have that shading off of opinion, that modulation of extremes and mellowing and ripening of right principles which are among the surest characteristics of a free country, the true secrets of political dynamics and the true preservatives of a great nation? He said then that what he proposed to the house was in itself just, equal, and fair, founded on no undue or unfair attempt to give a minority an advantage they were not entitled to exercise, and that it was peculiarly applicable to the state of things on which they were entering." "He might justly add that the principle of the amendment was large enough to include boroughs returning two members as well as those which had three, and if it were worth while he was prepared to contend that upon abstract principle it ought to be applied to both classes of boroughs."—188 Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, 3d series, pp. 1037-41.

In the House of Lords, July 30, 1867, Lord Cairns spoke at length in support of his amendment for representation of minorities in three-membered constituencies. He said he would state the advantages of the system he had proposed:

"These must obviously be looked at from three points of view—the advantages to the general legislation of the country, the advantages to the members who would be selected under an arrangement of this kind, and the advantages to the constituencies themselves. Now, with regard to the legislature the advantages which I think would be gained by this system would be these: you would obtain in the persons of those who would be the representatives of the minority in these large constituencies a body of men of great intelligence and of great independence; you would have those elements of advantage which exist in the representation of small boroughs, and at the same time you would be perfectly free from the disadvantages and defects of the small borough system."

"Questions are constantly arising which in one aspect are questions of general political interest, but which are more or less connected with local interests, and bear upon local claims; and thus a question which, in a general point of view, is of political interest to the whole country is sometimes colored and affected in many ways by the way in which it is viewed in different localities. No doubt, in discussing general questions of political interest, it would be of the greatest possible advantage to hear how those questions were viewed not merely by different localities but by different bodies of men in the same locality. That result you would obtain by the plan which I propose."

"I will pass to the consideration of the advantages which would be gained by the representatives of those large constituencies themselves."

"You would have from the same constituency two members representing the majority and one representing the minority, communicating freely with each other, and without the slightest tinge of jealousy or apprehension that the interests of one would jar or conflict with the interests of the other in the constituency."

"Again, with regard to the constituency itself—and this is one of the most important views of the case—observe the advantages which would be gained: first, I believe you would gain the greatest possible local satisfaction; there is nothing so irksome to those who form the minority of one of those large constituencies as finding that from the mere force of numbers they are virtually excluded from the exercise of any political power; that it is vain for them to attempt to take any part in public affairs; that the elections must go in one direction, and that they have no political power whatever. On the one hand the result is great dissatisfaction, and on the other it is disinclination on the part of those who form the minority to take any part in affairs in which it is important they should take a prominent and conspicuous part." "In addition to that, it would do much to soften the asperities of political feeling which sometimes, though not often, prevails in large constituencies."

"Of this I am sure, (and although some treat it as an objection I think it a great advantage of the scheme,) that contests would be very much diminished in large constituencies where contests are most expen-give, so expensive that the mind almost recoils at hearing the sums which they cost. Contests practically would come to an end; and, as they did, so would danger of bribery and corruption. You would have great constituencies divided into great component parts; you would have each portion well represented; you would have freedom from expense, freedom from the irritation of political feeling, and from the curse of all elections, bribery."—189 Hansard, 3d series, pp. 433-41.

The views of Earl Russell in favor of dividing the representation of large constituencies between parties have been often expressed. In debate in the House of Commons upon the reform bill of 1854 he spoke as follows:

"Now it appears to us that many advantages would attend the enabling the minority to have a part in these returns. In the first place there is apt to be a feeling of great soreness when a very considerable number of electors, such as I have mentioned, are completely shut out from a share in the representation of one place. But in the next place I think that the more you have your representation confined to large populations the more ought you to take care that there should be some kind of balance, and that the large places sending members to this House should send those who represent the community at large. But when there is a very large body excluded it cannot be said that the community at large is fairly represented."—156 Hansard, 3d series, p. 2062.

In his essay on the English constitution, (edition of 1865,) he wrote as follows:

"If there were to be any deviation from our customary habits and rooted ideas on the subject of representation I should like to see such a change as I once proposed in order to obtain representatives of the minority in large and populous counties and towns. If, when three members are to be elected, each elector were allowed to give two votes we might have a Liberal country gentleman sitting for Buckinghamshire and a Conservative manufacturer for Manchester. The local majority would have two to one in the House of Commons, and the minority would not feel itself disfranchised and degraded."

In the House of Lords, in 1867, he gave a vigorous and able support to the Cairns amendment, which now constitutes clause nine of the reform act of that year. He said:

"I believe by means of such a plan you would introduce into the House of Commons men of moderate views whose influence would tend to reconcile parties on those occasions which now and then arise when neither extreme is completely right, and when the influence of moderate men is of much use in allaying the heat of party passion."

"Suppose a town has twenty thousand voters, and that twelve thousand are of one side in politics and eight thousand of the other, would not that town be better represented if both the twelve thousand and eight thousand were represented than if only the twelve thousand were represented? The gentleman who first impressed me with those opinions as to three-cornered constituencies mentioned to me that in a great manufacturing town where there was a very considerable Conservative minority men of the greatest respectability, men of wealth, and men of education were in such a state of political irritation from the fact of feeling themselves reduced to the position of mere ciphers at elections, that they were sometimes ready to support candidates of even extreme democratic opinions." "I can well understand men who are extremely intolerant and exclusive in politics objecting to give any voice to those whose political views are distasteful to them; but I cannot understand such an objection being urged by those who are in favor of having public opinion fairly represented."—189 Hansard, 3d series, pp. 446-47.

Upon the consideration of the reform bill of 1881 in the House of Commons Mr. Praed, distinguished as speaker and poet, expressed himself as follows:

"If we desire that the representatives of a numerous constituency should come hither merely as witnesses of the fact that certain opinions are entertained by the majority of that constituency our present system of election is certainly rational, and members are right in their reprobation of a compromise, because it would diminish the strength of the evidence to a fact we wish to ascertain. But if we intend, as surely we do intend, that not the majority only, but the aggregate masses of every numerous constituency, should so far as is possible be seen in the persons and heard in the voices of their representatives—should be, in short, in the obvious literal sense of the word "represented" in this house—then, sir, our present rule of election is in the theory wrong and absurd, and in practice is but partially corrected by the admission of that compromise on which so much virtuous indignation has been wasted."—2 Hansard, v. 1362.

THE CUMULATIVE VOTE.

By Earl Grey.

"The first of the reforms of a conservative tendency which I should suggest, and one which I should consider a great improvement under any circumstances but quite indispensable if any changes favorable to democratic power are to be admitted, would be the adoption of what Mr. James Marshall has called the "cumulative vote;" that is to say, the principle of giving to every elector as many votes as there are members to be elected by the constituency to which he belongs, with the right of either giving all these votes to a single candidate or of dividing them, as he may prefer. The object of adopting this rule would be to secure to minorities a fair opportunity of making their opinions and wishes heard in the House of Commons. In order that it might fully answer this purpose, the right of returning members to Parliament ought to be so distributed that each constituency should not have less than three representatives to choose. Supposing that three members were to be elected together, and that each elector were entitled to three votes, which he might unite in favor of a single candidate, it is obvious that a minority exceeding a fourth of the whole constituency would have the power of securing the election of one member. It is probable that in general three members would be thus returned, each representing a different shade of opinion among the voters.

"The advantages this mode of voting would be calculated to produce, and the justice of making some such provision for the representation of minorities, or rather the flagrant injustice of omitting to do so, have been so well shown by Mr. Marshall in the pamphlet I have already referred to, and by Mr. Mill in his highly philosophical treatise on representative government, that it is quite needless for me to argue the question as one of principle. But I may observe that, in addition to its being right in principle this measure would be in strict accordance with the lessons of experience if read in their true spirit. One of the most remarkable peculiarities of the British House of Commons as compared with other representative bodies is, that it has always had within its walls members representing most of the different classes of society and of the various and conflicting opinions and interests to be found in the nation. Much of the acknowledged success with which the House of Commons has played its part in the government of the country has been attributed, I believe most justly, to this peculiarity. The changes made by the reform act, and especially the abolition of the various rights of voting formerly to be found in different towns, and the establishment of one uniform franchise in all the English boroughs, (with only a small exception in favor of certain classes of freemen,) tended somewhat to impair the character of the house in this respect. The greatly increased intercourse between different parts of the country and the rapidity with which opinions are propagated from one extremity of the kingdom to another have had a similar tendency; and there is no longer the same probability as formerly that different opinions will be found to prevail in different places so as to enable all parties to find somewhere the means of gaining an entrance to Parliament at least enough of their adherents to give expression to their feelings.

"Hence there is a danger that the House of Commons may cease to enjoy to the same extent as formerly the great advantage of representing the various classes and opinions to be found in the nation. That danger would be greatly aggravated by rendering the constituencies more nearly equal than they are; but the simple change involved in adopting the cumulative vote would do much toward guarding against it, since with this mode of voting it would be impossible that any considerable party in the country should be left unrepresented in Parliament. The tendency of the alteration would be conservative in the best sense of the word, while at the same time in many cases it would have the effect of relieving liberal politicians from a disadvantage to which they are unfairly subjected. On the one side it would prevent the representation of the large town constituencies from being monopolized, as at present, by candidates ready to pledge themselves to the support of democratic measures. Even in the metropolitan boroughs we might reasonably expect that some members would be returned really representing the higher and most educated classes of their inhabitants, who are now practically without any representation at all except that which they obtain indirectly by means of members chosen by other constituencies. Thus in the large towns it would put an end to the unjust monopoly on the part of radical politicians; and on the other hand, in those counties where a Conservative majority now excludes a strong Liberal minority from any share in the representation it would correct a similar tendency in the opposite direction. In both cases this system of voting would be calculated to give more weight to the Independent electors who are not thorough-going partisans on either side, and to favor the return of candidates deserving their confidence."—Parliamentary Government Considered with Reference to Reform, edition of 1864, p. 203.

LIMITED AND CUMULATIVE VOTING.

By John Stuart Mill.

"Assuming that each constituency elects three representatives, two modes have been proposed, in either of which a minority amounting to a third of the constituency may, by acting in concert and determining to aim at no more, return one of the members. One plan is that each elector should only be allowed to vote for two, or even for one, although three are to be elected. The other leaves to the elector his three votes, but allows him to give all of them to one candidate. The first of these plans was adopted in the reform bill of Lord Aberdeen's government; but I do not hesitate most decidedly to prefer the second, which has been advocated in an able and conclusive pamphlet by Mr. James Garth Marshall. The former plan must be always and inevitably unpopular, because it cuts down the privileges of the voter, while the latter, on the contrary, extends them; and I am prepared to maintain that the permission of cumulative votes—that is, of giving either one, two, or three votes to a single candidate—is in itself even independently of its effect in giving a representation to minorities the mode of voting which gives the most faithful expression of the wishes of the elector. On the existing plan an elector who votes for three can give his vote for the three candidates whom he prefers to their competitors; but among those three he may desire the success of one immeasurably more than that of the other two, and may be willing to relinquish them entirely for an increased chance of attaining the greater object. This portion of his wishes he has now no means of expressing by his vote. He may sacrifice two of his votes altogether, but in no case can he give more than a single vote to the object of his preference. Why should the mere fact of preference be alone considered and no account whatever be taken of the degree of it? The power to give several votes to a single candidate would be eminently favorable to those whose claims to be chosen are derived from personal qualities and not from their being the mere symbols of an opinion; for if the voter gives his suffrage to a candidate in consideration of pledges or because the candidate is of the same party with himself he will not desire the success of that individual more than any other who will take the same pledges or belongs to the same party. When he is especially concerned for the election of some one candidate it is on account of something which personally distinguishes that candidate from others on the same side. Where there is no overruling local influence in favor of an individual those who would be benefited as candidates by the cumulative vote would generally be the persons of greatest real or reputed virtue or talents."—Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform, second edition, 1859.

OF TRUE AND FALSE DEMOCRACY—REPRESENTATION OF ALL AND REPRESENTATION OF THE MAJORITY ONLY.

By John Stuart Mill.

"It has been seen that the dangers incident to a representative democracy are of two kinds: danger of a low grade of intelligence in the representative body and in the popular opinion which controls it; and danger of class legislation on the part of the numerical majority, these being all composed of the same class. We have next to consider how far it is possible so to organize the democracy as, without interfering materially with the characteristic benefits of democratic government, to do away with these two great evils, or at least to abate them in the utmost degree attainable by human contrivance.

"The common mode of attempting this is by limiting the democratic character of the representation through a more or less restricted suffrage. But there is a previous consideration which, duly kept in view, considerably modifies the circumstances which are supposed to render such a restriction necessary. A completely equal democracy in a nation in which a single class composes the numerical majority cannot be divested of certain evils; but those evils are greatly aggravated by the fact that the democracies which at present exist are not equal, but systematically unequal in favor of the dominant class. Two very different ideas are usually confounded under the name democracy. The pure idea of democracy, according to its definition, is the government of the whole people by the whole people equally represented. Democracy, as commonly conceived and hitherto practiced, is the government of the whole people by a mere majority of the people exclusively represented. The former is synonymous with the equality of all citizens; the latter, strangely confounded with it, is a government of privilege in favor of the numerical majority, who alone possess practically any voice in the State. This is the inevitable consequence of the manner in which the votes are now taken to the complete disfranchisement of minorities.

"The confusion of ideas here is great, but it is so easily cleared up that one would suppose the slightest indication would be sufficient to place the matter in its true light before any mind of average intelligence. It would be so but for the power of habit, owing to which the simplest idea if unfamiliar has as great difficulty in making its way to the mind as a far more complicated one. That the minority must yield to the majority, the smaller number to the greater, is a familiar idea; and accordingly men think there is no necessity for using their minds any further, and it does not occur to them that there is any medium between allowing the smaller number to be equally powerful with the greater and blotting out the smaller number altogether. In a representative body actually deliberating the minority must of course be overruled; and in an equal democracy (since the opinions of the constituents, when they insist on them, determine those of the representative body,) the majority of the people, through their representatives, will outvote and prevail over the minority and their representatives. But does it follow that the minority should have no representatives at all? Because the majority ought to prevail over the minority must the majority have all the votes, the minority none? Is it necessary that the minority should not even be heard? Nothing but habit and old association can reconcile any reasonable being to the needless injustice. In a really equal democracy every or any section would be represented, not disproportionately, but proportionately. A majority of the electors would always have a majority of the representatives, but a minority of the electors would always have a minority of the representatives. Man for man they would be as fully represented as the majority. Unless they are there is not equal government, but a government of inequality and privilege. One part of the people rule over the rest. There is a part whose fair and equal share of influence in the representation is withheld from them, contrary to all just government, but above all contrary to the principle of democracy, which professes equality as its very root and foundation.

"The injustice and violation of principle are not less flagrant because those who suffer by them are a minority; for there is not equal suffrage where every single individual does not count for as much as any other single individual in the community. But it is not only the minority who suffer. Democracy thus constituted does not even attain its ostensible object—that of giving the powers of government in all cases to the numerical majority. It does something very different, it gives them to a majority of the majority, who may be and often are but a minority of the whole. All principles are most effectually tested by extreme cases. Suppose, then, that in a country governed by equal and universal suffrage there is a contested election in every constituency, and every election is carried by a small majority; the Parliament thus brought together represents little more than a bare majority of the people. This Parliament proceeds to legislate and adopts important measures by a bare majority of itself; what guarantee is there that these measures accord with the wishes of a majority of the people? Nearly half the electors, having been outvoted at the hustings, have had no influence at all in the decision; and the whole of these may be, a majority of them probably are, hostile to the measures, having voted against those by whom they have been carried. Of the remaining electors nearly half have chosen representatives who, by supposition, have voted against the measures. It is possible, therefore, and even probable, that the opinion which has prevailed was agreeable only to a majority of the nation, though a majority of that portion of it whom the institutions of the country have erected into a ruling class. If democracy means the certain ascendancy of the majority there are no means of insuring that but by allowing every individual figure to tell equally in the summing up. Any minority left out, either purposely or by the play of the machinery, gives the power not to a majority, but to a minority in some other part of the scale.

"The only answer which can possibly be made to this reasoning is that as different opinions predominate in different localities the opinion which is in a minority in some places has a majority in others; and on the whole every opinion which exists in the constituencies obtains its fair share of voices in the representation. And this is roughly true in the present state of the constituency. If it were not, the discordance of the House with the general sentiment of the country would soon become evident. But it would be no longer true if the present constituency were much enlarged, still less if made coextensive with the whole population; for in that case the majority in every locality would consist of manual laborers, and when there was any question pending on which these classes were at issue with the rest of the community no other classes could succeed in getting represented anywhere. Even now is it not a great grievance that in every Parliament a very numerous portion of the electors, willing and anxious to be represented, have no member in the house for whom they have voted? Is it just that every elector of Marylebone is obliged to be represented by two nominees of the vestry, every elector of Finsbury or Lambeth by those who are generally believed to be the publicans? The constituencies to which most of the highly educated and public-spirited persons in the country belong, those of the large towns, are now in great part either unrepresented or misrepresented. The electors who are on a different side in party politics from the local majority are unrepresented. Of those who are on the same side a large proportion are misrepresented, having been obliged to accept the man who had the greatest number of supporters in their political party, though his opinions may differ from theirs on every other point. The state of things in some respects even worse than if the minority were not allowed to vote at all, for then at least the majority might have a member who would represent their own best mind, while now the necessity of not dividing the party for fear of letting in its opponents induces all to vote either for the person who first presents himself with their local leaders, and these, if we pay them the compliment which they very seldom deserve of supposing their choice to be unbiased by their personal interests, are compelled, that they may be sure of a mandate whom none of the party will strongly object to—that is, a man without any distinctive peculiarity, any known opinions except the shibboleth of the party.

"This is strikingly exemplified in the United States, where at the election of President the strongest party never dares put forward any of its strongest men, because every one of these, from the mere fact that he has been long in the public eye, has made himself objectionable to some portion or other of the party, and therefore not so sure a card for rallying all their votes as a person who has never been heard of by the public at all until he is produced as the candidate. Thus the man who is chosen even by the strongest party represents perhaps the real wishes only of the narrow margin by which that party outnumbers the other. Any section whose support is necessary to success possesses a veto on the candidate. Any section which holds out more obstinately than the rest can compel all the others to adopt its nominee; and this superior pertinacity is unhappily more likely to be found among those who are holding out for their own interest than for that of the public. Speaking generally, the choice of the majority is determined by that portion of the body who are the most timid, the most narrow-minded and pre-judiced, or who cling most tenaciously to the exclusive class interest; and the electoral rights of the minority, while useless for the purposes for which votes are given, serve only for compelling the majority to accept the candidate of the weakest or worst portion of themselves.

"That while recognizing these evils many should consider them as the necessary price paid for a free government is in no way surprising. It was the opinion of all the friends of freedom up to a recent period; but the habit of passing them over as irremediable has become so inveterate that many persons seem to have lost the capacity of looking at them as things which they would be glad to remedy if they could. From despairing of a cure there is too often but one step to denying the disease, and from this follows dislike to having a remedy proposed, as if the proposer were creating a mischief instead of offering relief from one. People are so injured to the evils that they feel as if it were unreasonable, if not wrong, to complain of them. Yet avoidable or not, he must be a purblind lover of liberty on whose mind they do not weigh who would not rejoice at the discovery that they could be dispensed with. Now, nothing is more certain than that the virtual blotting out of the minority is no necessary or natural consequence of freedom; that, far from having any connection with democracy, it is diametrically opposed to the first principle of democracy—representation in proportion to numbers. It is an essential part of democracy that minorities should be adequately represented. No real democracy, nothing but a false show of democracy, is possible without it.

"Those who have seen and felt in some degree the force of these considerations have proposed various expedients by which the evil may be, in a greater or less degree, mitigated. Lord John Russell, in one of his reform bills, introduced a provision that certain constituencies should return three members, and that in these each elector should be allowed to vote only for two; and Mr. Disraeli in the recent debates revived the memory of the fact by reproaching him for it, being of opinion, apparently, that it betrays a conservative statesman to regard only means, and to disown scornfully all follow-feeling with any one who is betrayed, even once, into thinking of ends. Others have proposed that each elector should be allowed to vote only for one. By either of these plans a minority equaling or exceeding a third of the local constituency would be able, if it attempted no more, to return one out of three members. The same result might be attained in a still better way, as proposed in an able pamphlet by Mr. James Garth Marshall, the elector retained his three votes, but was at liberty to bestow them all upon the same candidate."

The author proceeds to state his preference for the plan of personal representation propounded by Mr. Hare over other plans of reform as more effectual and complete, as securing more fully the objects and avoiding the mischiefs mentioned in his preceding remarks. He expresses regret, however, that none of those other plans had "been carried into effect, as any of them would have recognized the right principle and prepared the way for its more complete application."

His preference for personal representation arises from the fact that it would provide for all local minorities of less than a third in a constituency, and for all minorities made up from several constituencies. His views appear to be, to some extent, affected by the peculiar character of British districts, and the absence of great State organizations in the kingdom affording free play for the cumulative vote. As personal representation is a question not proposed for examination in the present report, or for exposition in the papers which accompany it, his remarks upon it are here omitted. But two additional extracts, relating to general considerations connected with reform in representation, are added below:

"The natural tendency of representative government, as of modern civilization, is toward collective mediocrity; and this tendency is increased by all reductions and extensions of the franchise, their effect being to place the principal power in the hands of classes more and more below the highest level of instruction in the community. But though the superior intellects and characters will necessarily be outnumbered it makes a great difference whether or not they are heard. In the false democracy which, instead of giving representation to all, gives it only to the local majorities, the voice of the instructed minority may have no organs at all in the representative body." * * * * "In the American democracy, which is constructed on this faulty model, the highly-cultivated members of the community, except such of them as are willing to sacrifice their own opinions and modes of judgment and become the servile mouthpieces of their inferiors in knowledge, do not even offer themselves for Congress or the State Legislatures, so certain is it that they would have no chance of being returned."

In every Government there is some power stronger than all the rest, and the power which is the strongest tends perpetually to become the sole power. Partly by intention and partly unconsciously it is ever striving to make all other things bend to itself, and is not content while there is anything which makes permanent head against it, any influence not in agreement with its spirit. Yet, if it succeeds in suppressing all rival influences and molding everything after its own model improvement in that country is at an end and decline commences. Human improvement is a product of many factors, and no power ever yet constituted among mankind includes them all. Even the most beneficent power only contains in itself some of the requisites of good, and the remainder, if progress is to continue, must be derived from some other source. No community has ever long continued progressive but while a conflict was going on between the strongest power in the community and some rival power—between the spiritual and temporal authorities, the military or territorial and the industrious classes, the king and the people, the orthodox and religious reformers. When the victory on either side was so complete as to put an end to the strife, and no other conflict took its place, first stagnation followed and then decay. The ascendancy of the numerical majority is less unjust and, on the whole, less mischievous than many others, but it is attended with the very same kind of dangers, and even more certainly, for when the Government is in the hands of one or a few the many are always existent as a rival power which may not be strong enough ever to control the other, but whose opinion and sentiment are a moral and even a social support to all who, either from conviction or contrariety of interest, are opposed to any of the tendencies of the ruling authority.

But when the democracy is supreme there is no one or few strong enough for dissentient opinions and injured or menaced interests to lean upon. The great difficulty of democratic government has hitherto seemed to be how to provide in a democratic society what circumstances have provided hitherto in all the societies which have maintained themselves ahead of others—a social support, a point d'appui for individual resistance to the tendencies of the ruling power, a protection, a rallying-point for opinions and interests which the ascendant public opinion views with disfavor. For want of such a point d'appui the older societies and all but a few modern ones either fell into dissolution or became stationary (which means slow deterioration) through the exclusive predominance of a part only of the conditions of social and mental well-being." * * *

"The only quarter in which to look for a supplement or completing corrective to the instincts of a democratic majority is the instructed minority, but in the ordinary mode of constituting democracy this minority has no organ."—Considerations on Representative Government, chapter 7, Harper's edition, 1862.

THE ARGUMENT OF LOCALITY.

It has been said that the free vote would delocalize representation, and in this respect would have an unfortunate effect. This may be called the argument of locality, and has been well answered in debate abroad both by Mr. Mill and by Mr. Lowe.

The argument of locality is fallacious, for localities would have representation under the new plan as much as under the present one. It is true that district majorities could not monopolize the whole representation of the State, and here is the true point of this objection, and the only one with which we need be concerned.

Now, the monopoly of representation by district majorities is the very thing complained of, the abatement of which will constitute an evident reform. The free vote admits of nominations by districts, or for district divisions of a State, (if that should be desired,) and, what is more material, it gives to each important interest or locality a power of self-defense which will prevent injustice. These considerations were pointed out by a member of the present committee in a speech made at Philadelphia, November 19, 1867, in the following language:

"It is said that a system of elections such as I have described would deprive particular localities of representation; that there would be a combination of great and powerful communities within a State against some particular districts, and those districts which now have Representatives would be disfranchised. This argument has been made in Great Britain. It is likely to be repeated here, and it is perhaps the only one deserving any considerable attention. Of course my political reading and political thought have been against the undue concentration of power at any particular point, whether Washington, Harrisburg, Philadelphia, or elsewhere, and I have been in favor of its distribution, as far as possible, into all the local communities into which the State or the country is divided; and this objection, from my point of view, deserves respectful treatment and respectful answer. I have to observe, then, that in my opinion particular localities within the State would have a due voice and due influence in the selection of candidates; that if they were selected by a common body, by a State convention, any attempt to disfranchise any particular section of the State would be met by a counter combination in the interest of fair play, and that the practical result would be that there would be on the whole a fair distribution of political power in the different parts of the State by the selection of candidates. If, however, any difficulty were apprehended on this ground there might be a rule adopted by which nominations should be made by districts, a thing very often done in counties and also in States. It would be a rule to a party in making its selection that there should be a distribution of its candidates according to district divisions, either those established for other purposes by some general State law or established by the particular party organization for its own purposes of selection or distribution.

"But the conclusive answer to the objection is this, that any important locality would have the power to defend itself against such injustice, and that is one of the merits of this system of cumulative voting. If there was an attempt to disfranchise the city of Philadelphia, to prevent her returning her four members to Congress, and the thing was gross and glaring, what could she do under a system of cumulative voting? Just combine her vote on her four men and elect them in spite of all the other electors in the State, and thus any attempt at injustice in any section of the Commonwealth might be resisted by the people aggrieved by cumulating their votes upon one or more local candidates of their own. They could defeat any such attempt at injustice and defend themselves against it, and the fact that they had such power of defense would always secure a just distribution of nominations."

THE ELECTORAL COLLEGES, THEIR DEFECTS AND FAILURE, AND REMEDIES PROPOSED.

By Colonel J. H. Wheeler, Statistical Bureau, Treasury Department.

"This nation has recently passed through an exciting election for President, and the electors have met at the capitals of each State and cast their vote."

"We propose to show that the present mode of election of President and Vice President does not guaranty a republican form of government, or carry out the intentions of the framers of the Constitution or the will of the people, which is the foundation of our form of government."

"We are aware of the reluctance which exists to disturb the provisions of the Constitution or the customs of the nation. But this very Constitution has been amended again and again, and once in regard to this very question."

"Under the second article of the Constitution the electors, appointed in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may direct, meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons; the person having the majority of the whole number of electors appointed shall be President, and the person having the next greatest number of votes shall be Vice President."

"By this mode the first President (Washington) was elected twice, (1788 and 1792), and John Adams (in 1796) once."

"In consequence of the violence to the popular will attempted to be done through this mode, this article was amended in 1804, (September 25), and the electors required to name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President. They are to make a list of all the persons voted for, and the number of votes for each, which they are to transmit to the President of the Senate, who, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall count the votes and declare who is chosen. Thus the matter now stands. We propose to show, as previously stated, that this mode as now used does not carry out the intention of the framers of the Constitution; that it is not a faithful indication of popular will, and therefore is subversive of the principle that lies at the foundation of our Government—that the will of the people lawfully expressed should be inviolate. If this is so this mode should be abolished."

"As to the intent of the framers of the Constitution we are not left in doubt. Alexander Hamilton, of New York, a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution, in No. 68 of the Federalist acknowledged that the mode as prescribed for the election of the President by electors chosen by the people was objectionable. He says:

"The Convention which formed the Constitution did not desire the appointment of President to depend on preexisting bodies of men who might be tampered with beforehand to prostitute their votes."

"The mode was suggested by the practice of the Germanic Confederation; and this was that the electors or people should choose as their representatives or electors men of high character, capable and honest, above influences of place or power—for no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States can be an elector—and these electors, unbiased by party partialities and prejudices, unawed by power, impervious to the seductions of place, but guided only by patriotism and virtue, should select some citizen of the nation, eminent from his services, virtues, and talents as Chief Magistrate."

"It thus be the true intent of the framers of the Constitution how widely does the practice differ from the intent! Any one who has ever witnessed the assembling of the electors of any State can but have felt the ridiculous mockery with which as mere automatons they carry out the edict which a caucus or convention has already dictated, and for an elector to vary therefrom or dare to follow the convictions of his judgment would be political suicide, although it is his constitutional right so to do. One case only occurs to our memory in the history of our Government where an elector has ventured to exercise this unquestioned right. In 1820 Mr. William Plummer, elected in New Hampshire as an elector to choose a President, voted for John Quincy Adams (who was not then a candidate or the nominee of any party) against James Monroe. He was doomed to political death. This incident was the more singular as it was the only vote cast in any electoral college against Mr. Monroe. This gave occasion to the caustic remark of John Randolph, of Virginia, in Congress, that 'Mr. Monroe came in by unanimous consent and went out of office by unanimous consent.'

"That the mode now used may be indication of the wishes of the people, may fail in many instances to carry out their will, and, in fact, be at variance with and in opposition thereto, the examples in our political history, as we will presently show, abundantly prove."

"In 1800 this mode had nearly placed in the presidential chair Aaron Burr, for which high position it is well known he did not receive a single electoral or popular vote."

"In 1824, under this mode, John Quincy Adams was placed in the presidential chair against the declared wishes of a majority of the people, for he was in a minority in both the electoral and popular vote. We have prepared a table of the popular and electoral vote. The electoral vote is given from the organization of the Government; the popular vote is only from 1824. This vote has no constitutional existence, and no Federal record officially presents it. Prior to the adoption of the amendment in 1804 the mode of choosing electors was so heterogeneous, by the Legislatures, by districts, and by the people, that no accurate or perfect compilation concerning its extent worthy of confidence. Even after the adoption of this amendment very many States continued to choose electors by the Legislature, (notably New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, and occasionally Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, and Vermont.) In the election of 1824 the electors for President and Vice President in Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, South Carolina, New York, and Vermont were chosen by the Legislatures of those States. Of the election of 1820, back to which the table of popular vote extends, Niles's Register of 18th November, 1820, has this item: 'In Maryland and Virginia the election of electors excites so little interest because there was no thought of opposition that very few votes were cast, only seventeen at Richmond.' Hence of the popular vote, as before stated, no complete record is extant. The following table is as complete as possible and worthy of careful study:

*In this election (ninth term) Pennsylvania, Mississippi, and Tennessee did not cast their full electoral vote.

†In this election (twelfth term) Maryland did not cast her full vote.

‡In this election (twentieth term) Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, South Carolina, and Virginia cast no electoral votes.

§In this election (twenty-first term) Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia did not vote, and in Florida electors were chosen by the Legislature, and not by popular vote.

"(It is to be remembered that the State of South Carolina continued to choose electors by her Legislature down to the time of the late rebellion in 1861; so that no popular vote from her is included in the above returns prior to 1868. As she is, however, a State of the third or fourth rank in population the absence of her vote does not greatly affect the completeness or accuracy of our exhibit.)

"An examination and analysis of this table and a comparison of the electoral with the popular vote will prove the positions we have laid down, that the mode of the electoral vote, as now used, does not carry out the popular vote and is not a faithful reflex of public opinion, and that therefore it should be modified or discontinued.

"Take the first case that occurs in this table where the popular vote appears, the vote in the election of 1824: General Jackson received 152,889 reported votes and John Quincy Adams only 105,321, yet by this mode of machinery the public will was violated and Adams chosen.

"The next election (1828,) while the popular majority for Jackson was 137,870 in a total vote of 1,162,180, his electoral majority was 95 in a total vote of 261; that is, the popular ratio was as 1 to 8, the electoral majority was as 1 to 24, a ratio three times greater.

"In the next election (1832) this disparity appears still more glaring. While Jackson's popular majority was 137,313 in a total vote of 1,237,691, or as 1 to 9, his electoral majority was 170, a ratio seven times greater.

"In the next election (1836) the popular majority for Van Buren was but 2,608 in a total vote of 1,541,318, while the electoral majority was 124 in a total vote of 294; that is to say the ratio of the majority of the popular vote was but 1 to 600, while the ratio of the electoral majority was less than 1 to 6, a ratio 100 as great.

"In the election of 1840 Harrison's popular majority was 145,900 in a total poll of 2,402,566, a ratio of 1 to 16, while his electoral majority was 174 in a vote of 294, or nearly ten times greater than the popular majority.

"In the next election (1844) Polk received but 31,000 majority in a total of 2,626,950, or 1 in 900, while his electoral vote was 65 out of 275, or 1 to 4—200 times the popular vote.

"In 1848 General Taylor was in a minority of the popular vote; his vote being 1,362,242, and Cass and Van Buren had 1,515,173; and yet he received a majority of the electoral votes.

"In 1852 Pierce's popular majority was 202,008, in a total vote of over 3,000,000, a ratio of 1 to 15, while his electoral majority was 192 out of 296 votes, a ratio ten times as great.

"In 1856 Mr. Buchanan was in a minority of the popular vote. He received 1,838,229, while the vote of Fremont and Fillmore was 2,216,789; and yet he received a majority of the electoral votes.

"In 1860 Mr. Lincoln was in a minority of nearly a million of popular votes. He received a total vote of 1,866,452, while the vote of Douglas, Breckinridge, and Bell combined was 2,813,741; and yet Mr. Lincoln received a majority of 123 in an electoral vote of 303. This election demonstrates in a most conclusive manner the fallacy of the electoral mode and the possible misrepresentation under it of the popular will. Lincoln received 180 votes and Douglas only 12 out of 303 electoral votes. In the popular vote Lincoln received 1,866,452, while Douglas received 1,375,157 votes.

"In 1864 Lincoln received 2,223,085 and McClellan received 1,811,754 of the popular vote, while in the Electoral College Lincoln received 212 votes and McClellan received 21; a ratio of 22 to 18 in one case to 10 to 1 in the other.

"In the last presidential election (1868) Grant received a popular majority of 309,716 in a total of 5,722,990; a ratio of about 10 to 9, while his majority of electoral votes was 134 in a total of 294; a ratio of 13 to 5.

"This analysis, carefully made, proves beyond all cavil and error that there is no analogy or community between the vote as expressed by the Electoral College and the will of the people as expressed at the polls. In every case they differ. Hence the mode by electors is unfair, since it misrepresents the popular will. Justice and truth demand its modification or abolition. By this cumbersome and circumlocutory process the electors may be compelled to elect a candidate rejected by the people or reject a candidate accepted by the people. The defeat of General McClellan was complete, for he carried only three States—Delaware, Kentucky, and New Jersey. The whole electoral vote was 233, of which a majority necessary for a choice was 117. Now, a change in the popular vote of thirty-five thousand from Lincoln's would have changed the vote of every State mentioned below, and carried their full electoral vote. These added to the vote he had received would have elected General McClellan.

"The change of 50,000 popular votes in New York in 1848 from Taylor to Cass, or giving one half of the votes thrown away upon Van Buren to Cass, would have thrown the 36 electoral votes of New York to Cass and elected him.

"We have shown that by the present electoral system a person may be made President by receiving a majority of the electoral votes who is in a minority before the people. We have shown that Lincoln, in 1860, in a popular minority of more than a million of votes, swept the Electoral College by an overwhelming majority; that Douglas, who received a popular vote equal to two thirds of Lincoln's, received only one fifteenth of his electoral vote; that Breckinridge, who was 500,000 votes behind Douglas, received six times as many votes in the Electoral College, and Bell, who was 800,000 votes of the people behind Douglas, received thrice his number of electoral votes.

"Can any demonstration be more complete and satisfactory as to the utter uselessness and impolicy, if not injustice and iniquity, of the present mode of election by electoral colleges?

"This defect in the machinery of our Government has been long seen by the statesmen of the nation. General Hamilton, one of the framers of the Constitution, acknowledges of this mode that it was objectionable; and when the amendment of 1804 was adopted he proposed another, as follows:

"To divide each State into districts equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives from each State in the Congress of the United States, and said districts to be as equal in population as possible, and, if necessary, of parts of counties contiguous to each other, except where there may be some detached portion of territory not sufficient of itself to form a district, which then shall be annexed to some other district."

"Thomas H. Benton, during his thirty years in the Senate, again and again brought this subject before Congress.

"General Jackson, in his first annual message, urged an amendment to the Constitution to secure the election of the President by a direct and immediate vote of the people. This he repeated in five subsequent messages. In his message of 1829 he says:

"To the people belong the right of electing their Chief Magistrate. It never was designed that their choice in any case should be defeated, either by the intervention of electoral colleges or by the agency confided in certain contingencies to the House of Representatives. I therefore would recommend such an amendment to the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of President and Vice President."

"President Johnson, in 1845, when a member of the House, and in 1860, when a Senator in Congress, urged similar views. As President, in a message to Congress, dated July 18, 1863, he fully sets forth the injustice and inequality of the present mode, as virtually denying the right of every citizen of the United States possessing the constitutional qualifications to become a candidate for high office, and also denying the right of each qualified voter in the nation to vote for the person he deems most worthy and well qualified."

"Senator WADE, of Ohio, now President of the Senate, at a recent session brought this question as to a direct vote of the people for President before the Senate, and defended the position by an able argument. In a recent debate on Senator BUCKALEW's amendment the present mode of electors was denounced by Senator SUMNER and others 'as cumbersome, effete, and inconvenient.' The scene which occurred recently in the counting of the electoral votes in the joint convention of both Houses of Congress shows that the system must be altered. Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, introduced recently (February 8, 1869) an amendment to the Constitution to allow the qualified voters of the respective States to vote directly for President. The amendment to the Constitution (Article XVI) of Senator MORRIS, adopted by the Senate February 9, 1869, is a proposition in the right direction—that the people shall select electors, and not the Legislatures, and that Congress shall have the power to prescribe the manner in which such electors shall be chosen by the people."

"Connected intimately with this subject as a useful remedy for the evils of the present system is the reform proposed by Senator BUCKALEW, of cumulative voting, which is that where there are more persons than votes to be chosen the voter shall possess as many votes as there are persons to be chosen, and the voter may bestow his votes at his discretion upon the whole number of persons to be chosen, or upon a less number, cumulating his votes upon one, two, three, or any number less than the whole. The plan introduced into Parliament as early as 1854, by Lord John Russell, is nearly similar; that in certain constituencies which return three members to Parliament each voter should be allowed only to vote for two. This plan was adopted in 1867, and is now the law of England. Still another plan is urged by John Stuart Mill, in his work on 'Representative Government,' (proposed originally by James Garth Marshall,) that the elector, having his three votes, should be at liberty to give all to one candidate, or two to one and one to another. This is similar to the plan introduced in the Senate January 13, 1869, by Senator BUCKALEW, and commended by Earl Grey in his work on 'Parliamentary Reform.' The more these works are studied the more clearly will appear the perfect feasibility of the plan, and its transcendent advantages. The allied plan of personal representation has also been highly commended. As presented by Mr. Hare in an elaborate work, it contains another great idea, that those who did not like the local candidates may fill up their ticket by voting for persons of national reputation. This is sometimes done in our country on important occasions of deep interest. In 1835 a convention was called in North Carolina to reform her constitution. It was the first convention for this purpose since 1776, and deeply excited the public mind. The ablest men of the State were chosen without regard to their location or politics.

"The natural tendency of representative governments, in the opinion of Mr. Mill, is to collective mediocrity. This will be increased the more the elective franchise is extended. Edmund Burke was repudiated by the electors of Bristol in 1780, for Parliament, for his advocacy of the cause of the American colonies. He was, however, returned by another constituency, and continued during life in Parliament, contributing to its debates and to the glory of the nation. In contrast to this, William R. Davie, who had been a gallant and successful officer in the war, Governor of the State, (1793,) envoy extraordinary to France, (1799,) was defeated in the popular elections in North Carolina when a candidate for Congress and for the Legislature by individuals without extraordinary merit or talent.

"There is hardly a State of our Union in which the congressional districts are not gerrymandered in the interest of party. This adds to the deterioration of our public service, so that Mr. Mill declares 'it is an admitted fact that in the American democracy, which is constructed on this faulty model, the highly cultivated members of the community, except such as are willing to sacrifice their own judgment and conscience to the behests of party and become the servile echo of those who are inferiors in knowledge, do not allow their names as candidates for Congress or the Legislatures, so certain it is they would be defeated.'"

FEBRUARY, 1869.

Claim of Miss Sue Murphey.

SPEECH OF HON. GARRETT DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

January 7, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the bill to pay the claim of Miss Sue Murphey for damages to her property during the rebellion—

MR. DAVIS said:

MR. PRESIDENT: I do not mean to discuss at length the important bill before the Senate, or the great principles which it involves. I have not bestowed that labor in examining this important subject which it merits; and if I had had the time and the disposition I confess my incapacity to do the work as the importance of the measure demands. I shall therefore not attempt to enter into any elaborate discussion of it. In the Committee on Claims I agreed that this bill should be reported, and in its principle it had the full sanction of my judgment; and I believe it is both a measure of high justice and the truest policy, and in both aspects it should receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

As I understand the case, Miss Murphey is a resident of the State of Alabama, and was during and before the war. She lives in the town of Decatur. The rebels previous to the taking of her property by our Army for its necessary and proper use held possession and sway of the particular district of country in which her property was situated. But before the property was taken the rebels had been driven away, not only from Decatur, but from the country contiguous to it for a considerable distance around.

Their military power in part of Alabama had been so struck and scattered by the Union Army as to render it wholly improbable that they should ever return to possess themselves again of Decatur. The military commander of the United States conceived that his duty and a proper regard for the military service of the country required him to fortify Decatur. A fort was erected; and in the course of constructing that fort it became necessary to use materials, and to obtain these materials in part it was deemed necessary and expedient to demolish the residence and other buildings of Miss Murphey, and to appropriate the materials to the construction of the fort. There was also another object of considerable importance, amounting, also, to a military necessity. The fort was so close to the house and other buildings of Miss Murphey that if left standing they would have afforded some cover for the rebels if they should attempt to repossess themselves of Decatur; and, according to the common suggestions of military caution and military administration, the houses were removed, that they should not shelter an advancing enemy and protect him from the guns of the fort.

This property, then, Mr. President, was taken for public use in two aspects; first, its destruction was necessary to make the operations of that fort complete and perfect by removing obstructions from the range of the guns; in the second place, the house afforded a large amount of material that was useful and necessary in the construction of the fort, and it was so appropriated. This lady was loyal to the Government and to her country. She had no sympathies with the rebellion. All the wishes of her heart, and all the moral influence which she could exercise, were thrown in the cause of her country and of its Government against the insurgents. The question arises, her property having been thus appropriated to public use, is she entitled to a reasonable compensation for it?

Now, Mr. President, I have been amused at the sophistry of the honorable Senators that oppose this bill. They produce not analogous or parallel cases, but cases totally different in fact and principle; and after overthrowing the supposititious cases which they bring up, they argue and conclude that this bill also cannot stand the test, and ought not to be passed. I will give an illustration: we are asked if there is any principle, constitution, law, or justice which requires Congress or the Government of the United States to pay for property that was destroyed by the enemy, to make compensation to the owner, even upon the concession that he was loyal. I answer no. There is not a Senator advocating this bill who has taken that position. The support of this bill is not based upon or attempted to be propped by that principle. The principle of this bill is thus plainly stated: that if the Government takes private property for public use the owner shall have just compensation for it. It is simply the quid pro quo.

The position that the property of a citizen who has performed every duty and discharged every obligation to his country and Government may have his whole property taken from him for the proper and necessary uses of that Government, for the common defense and welfare of the people of the United States, and is entitled to no compensation for it, shocks the universal sentiment of justice which our Creator has implanted in the human heart.

But, sir, I contend that the case is provided for by the law. It is provided for by the highest law of this land, by the Constitution of the United States, in these words:

"Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

That is the plain, explicit, comprehensive law that meets this case, and that ought to rule and control it in the Senate, before the courts, and everywhere. I ask the honorable Senators who oppose the passage of this bill if this provision of the Constitution does not cover the case. But Senators parry and evade by assuming that national law, the law of nations regulating independent and belligerent States, intervenes when there is an insurrection, a rebellion of a part of the people against the United States and their Government; that in such a state of case the law of nations applies, makes every citizen of the States in which the rebellion broke out the public enemies of the United States; that there is no exception, and that those who have rushed to their country's standard, the emblem of its union, Constitution, and laws, to uphold it against their insurgent neighbors, who would strike it down by hostile arms, that these true and courageous patriots, tried and not found wanting by the bloody treason which environs them and is panting for their destruction, are like the insurgents who are striving to murder both the Government of the United States and these heroic defenders. That defenders and traitorous assailants are alike public enemies of the United States is a proposition too monstrous to receive the assent of unperverted human reason. Whether or no it is indorsed by the authority of the Supreme Court I reject and scorn it; my mind, my soul, all that appertains to me which can reason or feel, instructs me that this monstrous position is as false in our political law as it is unjust, mischievous, and revolting in political morals. I feel that my position is true and impregnable, however unable I may be to maintain it. But I will try.

My first general proposition is, that where the Constitution of the United States expressly establishes a principle, or makes provision for any state of case, the fundamental law so written cannot be annulled, impaired, or modified by any implication from the Constitution itself, much less from the law of nations. It is a general principle of construction in England and the United States that any express provision in a statute, and in every instrument of writing, stands against all implication; and in reference to the Constitution this principle has the force of a truism. "Nor shall private property be taken without just compensation" is a part of the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, which every Senator has supported.

This, and every other provision of the Constitution, is, and continues to be, the supreme law of the land until changed by an amendment of the Constitution. It was made for times of war and peace, and it has no sliding scale, no faculty of expansion or contraction as the country may be at war or peace. The Government which it organizes, and all the powers vested, is by language whose words and sense and meaning are fixed and the same in seasons of war and peace. It creates and vests powers appropriate to both conditions, and there are peace powers unfit to be exercised in times of war, and especially are there war powers that it would be most unfit to exercise in peace; but all the powers of the Government were established and organized by the Constitution, at the time, by the language, and with the fixed meaning as our father's made it; those powers are dormant or active according to the condition of things. A state of war neither creates nor evokes any new powers; it only awakens those that were sleeping, and they are such, and such only, as the language of the Constitution, as understood by those who made it, had formed, fashioned, and established. This provision of the Constitution, that when private property is taken for public use the owner shall have just compensation, applies to times of both peace and war; the only difference is the much greater frequency and magnitude with which it operates in the one season than the other, and the vastly augmented importance of it in war. There is no other provision or principle of the Constitution, no necessary implication from it, that suspends or restricts the operation of this provision as to loyal citizens in times of war, either foreign or domestic and civil. That the principle is different and contrary in other nations proves nothing in ours. There are many provisions and principles in our Constitution in irreconcilable conflict with those of all other Governments; but ours prevail here, ours are the supreme law, and command the universal submission and obedience of the people of the United States, and none others can be brought into conflict with, much less to overthrow them.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States is sui generis. It was made by the original States, when each one was an independent sovereignty, and clothed with plenary political power. They divested themselves of a portion of sovereignty and political powers, most of which they delegated to a common Government; some they agreed not to exercise themselves, but inhibited to the Government they were forming. This limited alienation of inherent power, and delegation and organization of it into a common Government was most cautiously and deliberately performed by a written compact, which they denominated a Constitution, and invested with the authority, sanctity, and name of the supreme law of the land. The Government it created is a limited popular representative Government, of mixed principles, connected with, and in some of its essential parts and operations based upon, the States and their governments. All sovereignty and power which the States did not delegate to the new Government were retained by them. This was a self-evident truism; but our fathers were not satisfied that this principle should by the plainest logic be demonstrable to exist in the very structure of the Government. In their jealousy of the encroaching nature of power, and especially of a Government of the whole upon the separate governments of the several parts, they, in the shortest possible time, incorporated it into the Constitution as an amendment, in these words:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by this Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Our Government has no parallel. Its powers were all created by and are to be looked for in the Constitution, and nowhere else; and that is to be construed by itself, in the light of the defects of the Articles of Confederation, of the then condition and exigencies of the States, and of the interpretation of its different provisions by the conventions which framed and adopted it. Omissions and defects in it, real or supposed, are not to be supplied by those who administer it attempting to close them out or reform them by resorting to national or any other law. The Constitution, with the Government which it creates, must stand or fall by itself, with the life-continuing principle of amendment in the mode which it prescribes. This Constitution lies open before every Senator, and requires him, by the sanction of his oath, to support it, to vote the fair and loyal petitioner, Miss Murphey, just compensation for her property taken by the Government for public use.

I maintain, Mr. President, that the right of Miss Murphey to compensation for her property is fully sustained by the opinion of the Supreme Court, in the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony, (13 Howard's Reports, 134,) and by the Court of Claims, in the case of the United States vs. Grant. (1 Nott and Huntington's Court of Claims Reports, 41.) The first one originated out of a transaction during our war with Mexico, and the opinion in it has often been brought to the attention of the Senate by other members as well as myself. Mitchell was an officer of the United States Army in that war, and destroyed the property of Harmony in the Mexican province of Chihuahua to prevent it from falling into the possession of the enemy; and suit was brought by Harmony to recover the value of that property. I will read two short passages from the opinion of the court:

"Where the owner (of property) has done nothing to forfeit his rights, every public officer is bound to respect them, whether he finds the property in a foreign or hostile country, or in his own."

"There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may lawfully be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy; and also where a military officer, charged with a particular duty, may impress private property into the public service or take it for public use. Unquestionably in such cases the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner; but the officer is not a trespasser."—13 Howard's Reports, p. 134.

In the case decided by the Court of Claims the opinion was pronounced by the late Judge Wilmot, and nobody will contend that either he or his opinion was warped by any sympathy for the rebellion or the rebels. He was author of the famous proviso offered by him to a bill of the House many years ago, and which has become historical, and has always borne his name. I will first read his statement of the facts of the case, and then a syllabus of the principles ruled in the opinion:

"The claim in this case is for private property destroyed and abandoned in Arizona on the 15th of July, 1861, by order of Captain J. M. Moore, commanding United States troops in the vicinity of Tucson. Grant was a contractor with the Government for furnishing commissary and quartermaster supplies for the forts and military posts in Arizona, and in furtherance of his contract had expended large sums of money in the repair and erection of flouring mills, dwelling-houses, storehouses, shops, and corals. He had personal property also of considerable value, consisting in part of flour, wheat, corn, barley, beans, merchandise, furniture, &c. In the mills and storehouses of Grant were valuable supplies belonging to the Government. The people of Tucson were lawless adventurers and intensely hostile to the Government of the United States. Lieutenant Lord speaks of the citizens of the Territory as "traitors of the deepest dye," "that they openly talked secession long before the war commenced, especially those in the vicinity of Tucson." Captain Chapin, in his deposition, says: "Tucson was full of gamblers and murderers. Large numbers of the white people were southerners in feeling, and ready to take up arms for the southern cause. Exceptions to this rule were rare."

"A confederate flag was flying at Tucson; and when the property was burnt the people assembled in large numbers, armed, and with such threatening demonstrations as induced Lieutenant Lord to prepare for an expected attack on his train. Fort Breckinridge had been burnt and abandoned on the 10th of July, and Captain Moore had received information by express that Fort Buchanan was also to be abandoned and destroyed. He also had information that Texan rebel forces held Fort Union, and were determined to occupy the Territory and cut off the United States troops within it. With this information and the state of things as he knew them to exist at Tucson, Captain Moore directed Lieutenant Lord, commanding a company of dragoons, to destroy such Government stores as he could not transport, together with such private property of Grant as might be of value to the public enemy or to the disloyal people of Tucson. On receiving information that Fort Buchanan was to be abandoned he took an escort and reached that fort in advance of the main body. In his report to the War Department he says: 'On learning the urgency of the case I sent the inclosed written order to Lieutenant Lord, in command of troops en route from Fort Breckinridge. His report in the case I forward.' Neither the order nor the report here spoken of are before us. Lieutenant Lord, in his deposition, says: 'The property was destroyed in accordance with written orders given me by Captain J. N. Moore. I did make a report of the matter to Captain Moore, and he approved of it and said he would inclose it in his report to the War Department, and that I should be favorably mentioned for the manner in which I had acted.' Captain Chapin, in command at Fort Buchanan, says in his deposition: 'Captain Moore told me the day after he arrived at Fort Buchanan that he had ordered Lieutenant Lord, now Captain Lord, to destroy all the public stores and all provisions that had been stored by Mr. Grant for the use of the Government, Grant's mill, and all other property that could not be transported or which would be of any benefit to the people of that country.'—1 Nott and Huntington's Court of Claims Reports, pp. 41-42.

These are the general facts of that case, and now I will only read the syllabus, at the head of the opinion of the court, of the principles ruled by it:

"The officer of the United States commanding troops in the vicinity of Tucson, Arizona, orders his subordinate to destroy such Government stores as he cannot transport, together with such private property of the claimant as may be of value to the public enemy or to the disloyal people of Tucson. The subordinate officer, acting under circumstances of immediate and pressing necessity, notifies the claimant to save his papers, and in half an hour fires his mills and other property."

"The taking of private property for use or for destruction, when the public exigency demands it, by a military officer commanding any part of the public forces, is an exercise of the right of eminent domain."

"Whenever the officer is justified the Government is liable. The state of the facts as they appeared to the officer when he acted must govern the decision."

"There is no discrimination to be made between property to be used and property taken to be destroyed."

"It is no defense that the circumstances must have rendered the property valueless to the owner if the officer had not destroyed it. It is the imminence of danger that gives the State a right to destroy property; but the certainty of the danger does not relieve the State from liability for the property which it takes to destroy."

Now, Mr. President, I ask if the principles recognized by the opinions of the Supreme Court and the Court of Claims do not fully cover the claim of Miss Murphey and require the passage of the bill under consideration? Her's is a stronger case than that of Grant. He owned a mill and several contiguous buildings in Arizona. His mill had been grinding and his houses held commissary and quartermaster's stores for the supply of the Army of the United States. The rebels were dominant in Arizona, and particularly in that portion contiguous to and including Tucson, and were about to move upon the Union troops in such force as to put beyond doubt their conquest. His superior ordered the officer in command at Tucson to abandon the country, draw off his forces and the military material, and to destroy the mill, the houses, and their contents, including as well the private property of Grant as the stores belonging to the United States. The order was executed by the subordinate, the property was all destroyed, and Grant brought suit in the Court of Claims against the United States for his mill, houses, and personal property.

He owned a mill and various buildings in Arizona. The buildings and his mill were stored with his private property, grain, flour, &c. That country was in the possession of the rebels at the time. The authorities of the United States and the troops of the United States commanded by its officers were unable to resist the rebel element. The whole country was alive and excited by the furor of the rebellion. The authorities and armies of the United States could not maintain themselves there, but were driven by hostile demonstrations to abandon the country and to give it up to the rebellion. Under this state of affairs the highest officer in military command orders his subordinate, Lieutenant Lord, to destroy the mill, the house, and its machinery, and all the buildings in which the private property of Grant, the owner of the mill, was stored—everything which was liable to fall into the hands of the enemy and to be of any use to them. This order is promptly and inexorably executed. The property is destroyed, that of a real as well as that of a personal or movable character—all is destroyed; and here is an account taken of the property amounting to sixty odd thousand dollars. The case comes before the Court of Claims for its adjudication; and that court, after full and patient examination and the collection of all the facts of the case, decides that the officer acted within the pale of his discretionary powers in the destruction of this property, both real and personal.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator from Kentucky allow me to inquire who was the judge of the Court of Claims that delivered the opinion in that case?

Mr. DAVIS. I have just stated it?

Mr. HOWARD. I was not able to hear the name.

Mr. DAVIS. It was Mr. Justice Wilmot; and I presume the honorable Senator from Michigan will not doubt his allegiance and fidelity to the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS. It was not delivered under the Wilmot proviso, either. That was offered to the House of Representatives more than twenty years ago; but this opinion was delivered under the Constitution, under that provision which I have read and upon which I rely for the Senate doing justice to this lady claimant, that her private property taken for public use shall be paid for by full compensation to the owner.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to make another inquiry. Does it appear in the report of that case that the Territory of Arizona where that property was destroyed was in a state of insurrection?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; fully.

Mr. HOWARD. By the proclamation of the President under any law?

Mr. DAVIS. It appears here by a recitation of the facts. I read the statement of the facts in the commencement of the opinion, that the Senate might be possessed of all the facts and features of the case and apply properly the principles of the Constitution and of the law to them.

Now, sir, let us contrast the condition of Tucson with that of Decatur. The rebels had been driven, scattered, disheartened, and demoralized; driven forever from Decatur. There never has been a rebel flag or a rebel foot making conflict with the authority and laws of the United States in Decatur since months before this property was taken from its owner and appropriated to the public use. The repossession, the reconquest, if my friend from Michigan prefers the phrase, of Decatur by the arms of the United States had become complete, absolute, permanent; and the question is, after it was thus peacefully, permanently, fully repossessed by the arms and the authority of the United States, and the private property of this lady was taken for the palpable and urgent military necessity of constructing a fort to make it an outpost and a guard against southern raiders, and the residue of these houses were swept away that cannon might play freely upon them if they returned to assault the place, whether property taken for this purpose forms a case in which the owner is entitled, under the imperative declaration and principle of the Constitution to have "full remuneration," in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, for the property thus taken.

Mr. President, there is a principle in this case. Gentlemen cannot destroy or overthrow or weaken this case by bringing up the case of property destroyed by rebels. There is no analogy in fact or principle between them. The cases are wide apart. My honorable friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] the other day said that it becomes necessary to take and destroy private property in battle. I admit it. Then he triumphantly asked will gentlemen contend that property of rebels destroyed in battle, in the conflict of arms, should be paid for? There is no analogy at all between the cases. Sir, that exercise of power has the explicit authority of the Constitution. It is not only the power but the bounden duty of the General Government to suppress insurrection and rebellion; yea, by force of arms; and whenever life or property is destroyed in this conflict of arms which the United States Government is authorized to wage in the suppression of rebellion it is property destroyed, literally, in obedience to the principle and command of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLEY. Will the Senator allow me to furnish him with another authority just in point?

Mr. DAVIS. With great pleasure.

Mr. WILLEY. I do so with only the greater pleasure to answer the question propounded to me by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] yesterday. I propose now to answer that question in the language of Vattel, page 402 of his work on the Law of Nations, where it will be found as follows:

"Is the State bound to indemnify individuals for the damages they have sustained in war? We may learn from Grotius that authors are divided on this question. The damages under consideration are to be distinguished into two kinds, those done by the State itself or the sovereign and those done by the enemy. Of the first kind, some are done deliberately and by way of precaution, as when a field, a house, or a garden belonging to a private person is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a town rampart or any other piece of fortification, or when his standing corn or his store-houses are destroyed to prevent their being of use to the enemy. Such damages are to be made good to the individual who should bear only his quota of the loss. But there are other damages caused by inevitable necessity, as, for instance, the destruction caused by the artillery in retaking a town from the enemy. These are merely accidents; they are misfortunes which chance deals out to the proprietors on whom they happen to fall. The sovereign, indeed, ought to show an equitable regard for the sufferers if the situation of his affairs will admit of it; but no action lies against the State for misfortunes of this nature, for losses which she has occasioned, not wilfully, but through necessity and by mere accident, in the exercise of her rights. The same may be said of damages caused by the enemy."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to say a word?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly; I give way for an explanation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from West Virginia to hold that that authority has any application to this case? That authority is simply this—which nobody in this Senate and no court in the world, I suppose, would ever dispute—that where a nation takes from its own citizen a locality in order to erect a fortification it is proper for it to pay for it. That is all of it. I will read it:

"The damages under consideration are to be distinguished into two kinds, those done by the State itself or the sovereign and those done by the enemy. Of the first kind, some are done deliberately and by way of precaution, as when a field, a house, or a garden belonging to a private person is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a town rampart or any other piece of fortification, or when his standing corn or his store-house are destroyed to prevent them being of use to the enemy."

Simply declaring that a nation should pay where it takes the property of a subject to erect a fortification.

Mr. DAVIS. I am much obliged to the honorable Senator from New Jersey for having so promptly after the production of this authority by the honorable Senator from West Virginia reread it to the Senate. The only effect is to imprint it doubly deep upon the understanding and the conscience of Senators. The case put by Vattel is precisely analogous to the one under consideration, as I will proceed to show by the facts. I was aware of the fact stated by Vattel, that in relation to the proposition whether a country was or was not responsible to its own people for the destruction of property by a public enemy the authorities were divided. Grotius lays it down explicitly that it is the duty of a Government to protect its citizens, and that that duty is not performed where the neglect of the Government permits the private property of a citizen to be destroyed, and therefore the Government is responsible for the value of the property so destroyed. I admit that we do not contend for that principle now; I admit that that principle is rejected by all the Governments of the earth; but I believe that the principle is sound and just, and ought to prevail here and everywhere, that Government ought to be constructed upon the principle of a mutual insurance company against foreign and domestic enemies; and wherever any member of this mutual insurance company is subjected to a loss by the destruction of his property by a foreign or domestic enemy he has a claim on the company for the value of his property, and there is no Government that gives complete protection upon any other principle.

The case put in Vattel is precisely analogous to the case under consideration. I ask any Senator who opposes this claim if Decatur was ever possessed or molested by the rebels after this property was taken? From a considerable time before the property was taken did not the authority of the United States, civil and military, prevail at and rule over Decatur and its vicinage for a very considerable area? Were not the Army and the authorities of the United States at the time in the undisputed, undisturbed, and peaceable possession of Decatur? Was there any conflict of arms raging in Decatur or around between the rebels and the United States Army? None. On the contrary, Decatur had been reduced to obedience; the authority of the Government, civil and military, was reestablished not only peacefully but permanently. That peace and permanence have never been disturbed to this day. The rule and the authorities of the United States were as fixed, as undisturbed, as permanent in Decatur then as they were in Washington city. All the facts and principles of law, constitutional, statutory, or private, that would have required the owner of property in Washington city at that time whose property had been taken for the public use to receive full compensation for it applied to Miss Murphey and to Decatur.

There is no principle announced in the prize cases or in the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton that is at all in conflict with that position; but, on the contrary, the reasoning and the principles conceded by the court in Mrs. Alexander's case fully authorize, and not only authorize but require the payment of this claim to Miss Murphey. What was it? There was a fort constructed by the rebels on the Red river between Alexandria and the Mississippi; I do not recollect the name of it at this time. General Banks and Admiral Porter made an invasion of the Red river country. They took possession of this fort, which was abandoned by the rebels; they penetrated the rebel country back some hundreds of miles, but eventually met with a reverse and a repulse that forced them to evacuate the country. From the time of their first invasion of and entry upon this country until they were forced by superior numbers to leave it was less than eight weeks. It was contended for Mrs. Alexander, or for the persons who claimed that property as her cotton, that this was a permanent reconquest and reoccupation of the country by the American armies, this temporary, uncertain, fugitive occupation of eight weeks; and the Supreme Court simply decided that that was not such a permanent, peaceable reoccupation of the country as changed its character from enemy's country to the country of the United States.

The honorable gentlemen who oppose this bill are guilty of another fallacy or self delusion. They hold, at least their argument so treats the subject, that the southern States were States in rebellion or unfriendly to the United States by their boundaries; that the whole of the State of Alabama must necessarily have been reduced to obedience to the laws and authorities of the United States to withdraw from it the character of enemy's country. The Supreme Court have established no such principle. The Supreme Court neither in the prize cases nor in the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton treat insurrection and rebellion by State boundaries, but they establish distinctly this principle: that wherever a State or any portion of a State, however small the part and fraction, has been taken possession of by the American arms and authority, to the extent that it is thus repossessed by the American Army and authorities it is not enemy's country, but the country of the United States. I ask the Senate to take note of that discrimination. Alabama was not an enemy's country, according to the reasoning and the positions of the Supreme Court, by its State boundary. It was only enemy's country as portions of it were occupied by the armies of the enemy and they were able to expel and exclude the authorities of the United States; and whenever and wherever the armies and authorities of the United States set foot upon Alabama, in Decatur or anywhere else, and held permanent possession—a possession that defied the assaults of the rebels, that maintained the laws and authority of the United States and excluded beyond all question all rebel authority—the Supreme Court decide expressly that that portion of the State is not enemy's country but is friendly country, the country of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, what was the state of facts in relation to Decatur and all north Alabama? The rebels had been expelled from the most of north Alabama. They were driven from it by the superior power of the Union arms. They no longer held sway there. Their armies, their civil authority, everything that appertained to rebeldom, had been swept from north Alabama. The rebellion was no longer present, much less ruling in Decatur. It had no power in Decatur, no influence there, no control, any more than it had in Washington city or in the State of Michigan; and the Supreme Court decided expressly in Mrs. Alexander's case that whenever a part of the country that had been in a state of insurrection and rebellion was thus reoccupied by the United States, and its possession and power was peacefully and permanently established, the laws of war were no longer applicable to that territory or its people. They say explicitly that if such a reconquest and reoccupation of Fort De Russey and of the country in that vicinity had been effected by the armies of the United States, it would have been such a reoccupation and would have so changed its relations to the General Government as to have made it friendly and not enemy's territory, and that a loyal citizen inhabiting the country thus reoccupied by the authorities of the United States would be entitled to compensation for property taken for public use.

Sir, that position is impregably established according to the false reasoning and principles of the Supreme Court. I am not now controverting the authority of that decision. I am taking it as settling the law of the case correctly and conclusively, from which I totally dissent; but upon the premises and the principles ruled by the Supreme Court itself Miss Murphey is undeniably entitled to full compensation for property taken in Decatur belonging to her for public use.

Having said thus much in relation to the case itself, I desire to add a few words in relation to the true principles that I think ought to govern such questions in the Supreme Court. That court are but men; and we are their equals in that respect. It is an august tribunal. It is clothed with grander and more important powers than any court that ever was organized on the face of the earth. It was presided over for more than thirty years by Chief Justice Marshall, one of the greatest if not the very greatest legal intellect that this country has ever produced. But even when that august and powerful intellect, with his boundless learning, legal and promiscuous, was presiding over that court he committed one of the most palpable errors that ever a judicial tribunal was guilty of. I will state it in a very few words.

Congress passed a law incorporating a lottery in the District of Columbia, and authorized it in general terms to establish offices for the sale of tickets. In Virginia there was a law of the State prohibiting the sale of lottery tickets and making it a penal offense to vend lottery tickets within the State and many of the other States had similar laws. The case of Cohens vs. The State of Virginia came up to the Supreme Court for adjudication. Cohens established a lottery office in Richmond. He was proceeded against, prosecuted, and fined under their State law for vending lottery tickets against that law. He brought the case up to the Supreme Court; and what was the position, not the principle, that Chief Justice Marshall ruled, and to an assent to which he cajoled the other members of the court? It was simply this: Congress has the power of exclusive legislation in all cases whatever in the District of Columbia. What is the power of Congress under that provision? It has just such powers within the District of Columbia as a State Legislature may properly exercise within the limits of each State; and yet Chief Justice Marshall ruled that under that provision, singly and alone, where Congress passed such a law as they did in that case it authorized the establishment of lottery offices in every State in the Union; and although any and every State might have laws making it penal and criminal to vend lottery tickets within their respective States, those laws would fall before the power of such an act of Congress! Sir, I say a more unsound and untenable opinion never was rendered by human reason.

Gentlemen find it very convenient to invoke the authority of the Supreme Court where it will sustain their principles, their policies, and their purposes; but whenever the Supreme Court has adjudged principles that are hostile to their purposes they are as prompt to repudiate and reject those decisions. I lay down this principle to my honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] who is an able lawyer, as well also to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims, [Mr. HOWE,] who is certainly one of the ablest lawyers in this body, that the only authoritative power of a superior court over an inferior court is in the case decided, and no other. The judgment of Chief Justice Marshall to which I have referred overruled the decision of the court in Virginia. Whenever a similar case arose that court in Virginia might reject the authority as established by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Cohens, and ought to do so, and in rejecting the authority of that case it would commit no contempt; it would violate no legal or constitutional obligation upon it. The only remedy for the second dissent of the inferior court from the principle of the previous case would be to take that identical case up to the Supreme Court and have the judgment in that particular case also reversed. That is the only legal, effective, authoritative power which any superior court has over an inferior court. It can only coerce obedience to its mandates, to its principle in a case directly coming up to it, where it certifies its decision in the particular case again to the inferior court.

I therefore say that the authority of the Supreme Court in the prize cases is against the Constitution; that the ruling and principles decided by the Supreme Court in the Alexander cotton case are against the Constitution. They ought not to be respected by the Senate; they ought not to be respected by any court; they ought not to be respected by any citizen. They ought only to be respected by the inferior court in another case of the same kind going up from the inferior court to the superior court and the judgment being pronounced in that identical case. That is certainly a sound principle.

Now, Mr. President, I have a few remarks to make upon general principles. Every political corporation has one common power, and that is the police power. It has the power to maintain order within its jurisdiction and to enforce the execution of such laws as it may enact. That is the great internal peace power of every political community. It exists in cities. It exists in Baltimore; it exists in New York. It exists in the States of the Union. It exists in a different form in the United States. Let me proceed to illustrate it. A mob rises, as it often has risen, in the city of Baltimore. It resists the execution of the city ordinances and laws and the authority of the city courts. It overthrows them for the time. It supersedes its regular and legal jurisdiction by an anomalous, irregular, and revolutionary jurisdiction. What is the police power of the proper government of Baltimore? It may summon to its aid military power, and by the assistance of arms it may reduce those who are resisting the city government to obedience to its law. It may meet them in battle. It may shoot them down in battle array. It may exercise all the powers and do all the acts in that particular service that two conflicting armies acting under any authority may do. But when the mutiny is subdued and the mutineers are reduced to obedience the power of the city government over the subject is exhausted and the former state of things is restored, as though there had never been such irregular and violent resistance.

Now, take the case of a State. There was an insurrection in Massachusetts when the Constitution was cradled, called Shays's rebellion. It obtained in Worcester and that portion of the State. It took possession of two or three counties. It expelled the government of Massachusetts and all of its tribunals and all of its laws and authority from those counties. The government of Massachusetts moved upon this rebellion with military power and with perfect authority to put down the rebellion by military power. The rebellion was put down. Shays himself was pardoned, and afterward became an applicant to Congress for pay for his revolutionary services, and had a bill passed to reward him. But so soon as the State government and authorities of Massachusetts put down Shays's rebellion their power ceased; it was exhausted. If Shays and his rebels were to be pursued afterward they were to be pursued as criminals under the statutory and civil laws of Massachusetts in her civil courts, who were vested with authority to try such offenses.

Mr. President, precisely analogous is the power vested in Congress by the Constitution to suppress insurrection and rebellion. They may do it by using the armies and calling out the militia of all the States. They may do it by force of arms, by the conflict of arms; and in that conflict of arms they may meet properly and constitutionally the insurgents in battle as though those insurgents were a foreign invading enemy; but the power of Congress is simply to suppress the insurrection, and when the insurrection is suppressed the power is exhausted as completely as the power of a State government is exhausted when it puts down a rebellion against the State, as in Rhode Island. Just as a city government may use the same means, an armed force to put down an insurrection against it, and as that whole power is exhausted when the insurrection is put down, so is the power of Congress and of the General Government in relation to the suppression of an insurrection exhausted when the insurrection is put down and the people have submitted fully and completely to the authority of the Government of the United States.

In addition to the police power in political communities some of them have the war power. The police power enables a city to suppress an insurrection against its government. That is not a war power. Boston, New York, and Baltimore have no power to declare war, to wage war, in the sense in which that term is understood when it is used in relation to conflicts between foreign States with beligerent obligations and duties. A State has no power to wage war. There is but one power to make war—the Government of the United States. I do not mean a mere contest, of course. That is the general phrase that characterizes all disputes by force of arms, whether by States, cities, or people; but I mean war as it is understood by publicists and by the law of nations. I say that war as thus defined and understood can be made in the United States only by one power, and that is the power of Congress. From whence is that power derived? From the Constitution. The Supreme Court years ago expressly decided, and in the prize cases decided, that the General Government has no power to declare war against a State. I go further than that: I say that the General Government has no power to make war against a State without a formal declaration or proclamation. It may be made in act and in fact without proclamation. The General Government has not only no power to declare war, but it has no power to make war against a State. When it enters into a conflict of arms with the people of a State it is not war; it is not the exercise of the war power. The war power is not to be and cannot be legitimately exercised against a State. It is the exercise of the police power against the enemy, however numerous, and whether they are State officials or not, to compel them to obey the laws and authority of the United States, to ground and surrender the arms which they hold in their hands in violent and bloody resistance to the authority of the United States. When that work is accomplished every vestige of power of the General Government, much less of Congress, ceases.

I admit that it is a universal principle of national law that whenever two nations are at war with one another, whether by declaration or proclamation; or war in fact without either declaration or proclamation, the laws of nations treat every subject or citizen of one of the States as the enemy of the other State; but I assert that that principle has no application to the American scheme of government; it has no application in our country. Let me advert to one or two of its absurdities. What is the extent to which this principle prevails according to Vattel and all other writers upon national law and as recognized by the decision of the Supreme Court? I will read only a line or two from a case decided by Chief Justice Marshall:

"Respecting the power of Government no doubt is entertained. That war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found is conceded. The mitigations of this rigid rule, which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice, will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but cannot impair the right itself. That remains undiminished, and when the sovereign authority shall choose to bring it into operation the judicial department must give effect to its will. But until that will shall be expressed no power of condemnation can exist in the court."

The main question in that case was whether a simple declaration of war involved the confiscation of property, or whether it required a special act of Congress. But here is the principle laid down broadly and explicitly:

"That war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found is conceded."

Under that principle what would be the effect upon citizens of Tennessee or Alabama, or any other of the States the people of which were in rebellion, resident in the loyal States? They are enemies without regard to the place that they inhabit at the time. They may live within the United States; they may have any amount of estate, real and personal, in the United States; and yet by this principle they are equally public enemies, whether they are temporarily resident here or whether they are at their homes in the country with which we are at war. That is the principle. Is there any man so mad in his partisanship as to apply that principle to the people of the United States? The Supreme Court have seemingly given it some countenance, but they have done this by the stress of public opinion; by the danger of the success of the rebellion. They were frightened out of their propriety and of their correct legal learning by the immense exigency in which the country was placed.

But I ask the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN,] does he maintain that the national law in relation to war and the subjects or citizens of two independent States at war, both in relation to their persons and property, had application in the late rebellion to the people of the States where the insurrection broke out and existed? Let us examine that position for a moment. There was Mr. Justice Wayne, a member of the Supreme Court, whose home was in Georgia. There was Mr. Justice Catron, at the breaking out of the rebellion a resident of the State of Tennessee. Both States had gone into the insurrection. There was Andrew Johnson, after the rebellion had broken out nominated by the party in power to the office of Vice President. Now, what is the effect of the doctrine that gentlemen contend for? That because those States had seceded and erected the standard of revolt against the Government of the United States every citizen of those States, whether then there or temporarily in this city or in any other friendly State of the Union, was a public enemy to the Government of the United States and subject to all the penalties to which a public enemy is subject! Why, sir, in the case from which I have just read, the case of Brown vs. The United States, Chief Justice Marshall decides expressly that where two countries are at war and a citizen or a subject of one of them is found within the boundary and under the jurisdiction of another he may be proceeded against as a public enemy both as to his person and his property.

Sir, you elected a Vice President, who succeeded to the first office in this country, in violation of any such principle as that. It is no principle. It has no truth; it has no justice; it has no proper application under our system. You permitted Mr. Justice Wayne, who had been upon the Supreme bench for thirty years, to continue in long service in that court to the close of his life. You never disturbed Mr. Justice Catron. What became of the ten thousand soldiers whom the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Rice] said yesterday enlisted in that State into the Army of the United States and rendered service in putting down this rebellion? Upon the monstrous, revolting, shocking position assumed by gentlemen in this debate every one of those soldiers when he entered into the Union Army was a public enemy, and upon his capture by the rebels, according to their principle, was liable to be tried and shot as a traitor to his own country and Government!

Sir, we had the mockery of an impeachment trial against the President of the United States—the most splendid and iniquitous proceeding that was ever indulged in by a great and sensible people. It required two thirds of Congress to impeach him. According to this theory you had a much more plain, direct, and practical remedy. You had only to declare that he was an alien enemy because he was a resident of the State of Tennessee, a State in rebellion. You had a right under this principle to order him to prison, to expel him from the country, and to take all his personal property and real; if he had any, within the other States, and to treat in like manner Mr. Justice Wayne and Mr. Justice Catron. By the same principle you put the brave, gallant, and devoted men who rushed into the Union Army from Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, and the other States in the position of public enemies, and you subjected them to trial as traitors to their own country and cause and to be shot because of the patriotism that they exhibited in rallying to the flag of the Union.

Mr. President, there is a reason in every principle. I admit the principle to be that wherever two sovereign States are at war the national law permits the subjects or citizens of each to be treated by the other as public enemies in all their rights of property and in all their personal rights; but I say that no such principle as that applied to the late insurrection, and I say the Supreme Court have given no such extreme, unjust, and revolting application of that principle. And why is this so? Here is a reason to which I would ask the considerate attention of Senators for one moment: the reason that the subject or citizen of a State at war with another State may be treated, as he is treated by the law of nations, as a public enemy to that State is that the government of that other State has the legal and undoubted power to establish his status. That government has the power to declare war, to make war, to wage war against the other State without a declaration of war. That is a principle which no one will dispute and which the world in every age has conceded. Does any such reason as that apply or can it apply to the case of this insurrection? I ask the honorable Senator from Michigan what power had the State of Alabama or the congress of the southern confederacy to make a true and loyal citizen of the United States, male or female, a traitor? None. The act of the Government as between independent States which gives to every subject or citizen of the particular State the character of a public enemy is an act that is lawful, legitimate, and properly performed by the government of that subject or citizen. That is the reason upon which the whole power is based; that is the philosophy of it. How can you apply that to the anomalous case of the rebellion?

Sir, the State of Alabama had no power to secede. The act of secession was utterly null and void. It had no constitutional or legal effect. The act of the confederate congress was equally void and inoperative. Instead of exercising a power over the people of their States in relation to their position to the General Government and in conformity to the Constitution and laws, they were directly attacking and overthrowing all constitution and law when they sought to sever their relations with the General Government. Can human reason, can the legal learning—constitutional, statutory, and national—of the honorable Senator from Michigan sustain the theory that we have now been discussing by the authority of Vattel and other writers on national law? When they are treating of a war between separate States, war declared legitimately by the proper power, war declared by the power that has the right to command every citizen or subject within the country and to make him a rebel, and to throw upon him all the responsibility of a rebel in case of refusal—has that any application here when the acts of the State conventions, of the State Legislatures, of the southern confederate congress, were all but so many crimes committed by a parcel of individuals who exercised no more constitutional or legitimate power than if they had been self-constituted, self-organized?

No, Mr. President; it was a concession to fear when the Supreme Court intimated any sanction to such monstrous and mischievous principles. As the cause of that great fear and that great exigence begins to pass away the unsoundness, the absurdity, the eminent mischief of this principle will be found from day to day more palpable. It is an interminable source of confusion, injustice, and oppression. The idea that when a set of rebels, traitors, and criminals who may happen to have the ascendancy by military power or force in my State, when my mind is as deeply engrained with the greatness and justice and obligation of the Government of the United States as any man's, when my heart beats as warmly, as truly, as bravely toward the support of that Government as any man's, these wrongdoers, not only against my consent and act, but in defiance of it, can place me in a position where I become the public enemy of the Government and the people of the United States, is too monstrous to receive the sanction of human reason when deliberately and wisely considered. It is a most foul and atrocious heresy.

Why, Mr. President, it would be impossible for a popular system of government to exist under the operation of such a principle. A more daring, violent, revolutionary principle was never announced. Here is the State of Tennessee, whose people voted against secession by a majority of sixty thousand, and yet they were dragged into secession by the State authorities. That those men holding an army organized and equipped, the great mass of the people being unprepared, should have the power to drag this vast mass of people of the State of Tennessee, loyal and true to their Government, into a position where that Government would be bound to recognize and to visit upon them all the pains and penalties of consenting rebels and traitors, is the most monstrous position that ever was promulgated. As the honorable Senator from West Virginia and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin said, if this principle of severe punishment of loyalty and fidelity to the Constitution, the Union, and the enforcement of the laws is to be pronounced and executed by the General Government, for whom and whose continuance and just power the mass of the people of the State have risen and thereby subjected themselves to oppression, wrong, and assault in every form under rebels, the true criminals; if they are inexorably to be treated as rebels by that Government which they rallied to support, and to support which was the dearest object of their minds and their hearts; if when their property is taken for the just uses of that Government and they come to Congress and ask for compensation in the plain, explicit, eternal obligation of the Constitution in the form prescribed, they are told, "You are rebels, you are enemies; your persons and your property were all subject to be taken by us and to be treated as public enemies," as the harshest conqueror of the Old World treats the subjugated countries and provinces over which he marches in triumph with his armed military forces—if this is to be the fate of every man who thus stands for his country, its Constitution, and its people, it is the greatest inducement, the greatest premium to disloyalty and rebellion that I have ever known to be offered by any country. In such a case there would be no safety to that unfortunate class of men except in the success of the rebellion. Such a man might well say, "Here is my own Government; my obedience is to it; my paramount allegiance is to it. No State has a right to command me to alter my position of obedience and fidelity to that General Government. I have resisted all attempts to do this. I have ventured my life, my fortune, my household honor, my wife, my little ones, everything that renders life desirable, in the cause of this unnatural, ungrateful country and Government; and when at length by the feeble aid I have contributed it triumphs, and I ask this Government simply to pay me the value of the property which it has taken for public use, I am answered that I am a public enemy and liable to be treated in my person and property as a public enemy."

"O judgment, thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason!"

Sir, I say this principle is utterly contrary to the decisions of the Supreme Court. My honorable and able friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] one of the profoundest lawyers in this body, knows that no principle is settled by a case before a court except the one that is under trial; that everything else that is said in the way of principle is merely ipse dixit and has no effect. The principle decided in the Alexander cotton case is simply that the repossession and occupation of a portion of the rebel country in the vicinity of Fort De Russey was too ephemeral, too fleeting, too uncertain to amount to a reoccupation of the country by the authority and armies of the United States Government, and therefore that the owner of the property had no right to ask for compensation. But if the case of Miss Murphey, the case under consideration, had been or were now to be thrown before the Court of Claims and on appeal or writ of error was to pass up from that court to the Supreme Court who doubts that the claim would be sustained? In the case of Grant, from which I read, where his mill and all his houses were burned in a country where the contending parties were still in conflict, with flagrant war raging, where neither party had a settled and permanent command, where the mill and the houses and all the stores of provisions and quartermaster and commissary stores that were within them were consumed by the order of an Army officer of the United States to prevent their falling into the possession of the rebels and enabling the rebels to appropriate them to their own use, even in that divided and warring and chaotic scene for contending power and domination it was decided that the owner of the property was entitled to full compensation.

Sir, the case under consideration is greatly stronger in all of its aspects, in all of its principles, in all its policy and justice, than that case. I do trust that this Senate will not commit, in my judgment, the grievous mistake of rejecting this claim. I think every consideration of law, of humanity, of the soundest policy, of justice that ought to rule it in the councils of this great nation imperatively demand that this lady, this loyal, heroic woman, who shed her influence and all her hospitalities around to cheer the Union Army and its officers should be compensated for her property taken for public use. I trust that she will not be so ungraciously dismissed from this most august of all legislative tribunals on the face of the earth. In the name of justice, in the name of the Constitution, in the name of that justice which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, in the name of the highest and loftiest patriotism, in the name of that love and devotion which every true heart in this land should feel toward its own Government, the Constitution that formed that Government and the constituted authorities to execute the principles of that Constitution and Government, I invoke you, I beseech you not to permit this poor, unfortunate, heroic woman to go from these portals penniless, against all the principles of the Constitution and of humanity.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

SPEECH OF HON. GARRETT DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 8, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The plain proposition now before the Senate is a proposed amendment to the Constitution which reads in these words:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Before proceeding to enter upon my remarks I beg leave to propound one question to my progressive and able friend from Nevada. Does he support this proposition under or by authority of the Constitution of the United States, or outside of and independent of that instrument?

Mr. STEWART. In pursuance of the Constitution.

Mr. DAVIS. Very good. Now, Mr. President, after the frank avowal of my honorable friend, I will read the provision of the Constitution under which this proposition is made:

"Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States."

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States is not omnipotent; it is a body of limited and delegated powers, as every statesman heretofore in the United States has conceded. This power of amendment is a limited one. It is to be exercised after a form, and whether the form of its being proposed by two thirds of both Houses of Congress is a compliance with it or not, to which point the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ABBOTT] who has just taken his seat adverted, I will not now inquire. But I lay down the position that the power of Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution is a restricted and a limited power. It is limited by the terms "to propose amendments to this Constitution." To ascertain whether or not a proposition comes within the scope of the power it is necessary to look to the Constitution and then to compare the amendment with the general character and scope of the Constitution and see whether it is a proposition to amend or not.

Mr. President, I hold that under the power to amend the Constitution Congress has no authority to propose to terminate the Constitution. Surely from that position no gentleman will dissent. Congress has no power to subvert the Constitution under the guise of a proposition to amend it. Congress has no power to revolutionize the Constitution and the Government, to change its essential character, and to introduce in its stead a new form of government under the guise of a proposition to amend it.

Let me illustrate this position. Congress has no power to propose an amendment that shall change the office of the President from an elective limited office of restricted powers and of four years' duration to an hereditary Executive with limited or unlimited powers, with an enlargement or restriction of powers. In other words, Congress has no power to propose an amendment that would make our Government a monarchy by making the President an officer for life with his office descending either according to the Salic law or the common law of England to his next of kin or to his next of male kin.

I follow that proposition by another one. Ours is a mixed system, not only of State and of national Governments, but with different characteristics of government reposed in different branches. We have a Senate elected by the Legislatures of the several States, two Senators chosen by each State for the term of six years. Under the guise of amending the Constitution Congress has no power to propound a proposition that Senators shall hold their offices during life, and that their offices and titles, if Congress chose to attach titles to them, should descend to their children according to the law of primogeniture.

Why has not Congress the option and the power, under this authority of proposing amendments, to make either of the propositions that I have indicated? Simply for the reason that the sole power of Congress is to propose amendments to the Constitution, and under that power to amend it has no power whatever to propose amendments that would revolutionize it, change its essential principles and character, and introduce a different form of government, either a monarchy or an aristocracy, in its stead.

These remarks lead me to the conclusion that the power of Congress to propose amendments is a restricted, a limited power, not an unlimited or an illimitable power. It is a power that must be exercised purely within the character and the essential principles of the Government; and any proposition to amend that would change essentially the character of the Government in any of the aspects to which I have referred would be outside of the power of Congress to propose amendments as settled and defined by the Constitution.

Mr. President, we have a mixed form of government in our country, and that mixed form consists of the State governments and of the Government of the United States. What is the proposition that is now before Congress? It is to amend not only the Constitution of the United States, but of every State in the Union. I ask the honorable Senator from Nevada and all the supporters of this monstrous proposition where is the power of Congress to amend or to change the constitution of a State or of all the States? There is no such power in the Constitution. The restricted, limited power of Congress over the subject is to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States. That is the power and the utmost limit of the power of Congress to propose amendments. Will my honorable and candid and able friend from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] assume that under this power to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States Congress has the power to amend or alter the constitution of his State or of any other State? If that is granted it far transcends the grant of power to Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Gentlemen lose sight of the fact, at least they do not keep it in the line of their argument, that we have one General Government, formed by the Constitution of the United States; and then we have the governments of thirty-seven States, formed by the people of those States respectively; that this blended system of State and United States Government is our system; that the preservation of the system and the harmony of the system require that the governments of the States and of the United States, especially in the matter of amendment and change, shall always be considered as separate and distinct.

Sir, my honorable friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] gave us an exposition, historical and upon principle, of the origin of our Government to-day, remarkable for its lucidness, its ability, and truth. He stated that when the work of amending the Constitution was commenced the States were only united by a league and Articles of Confederation; each State was then a sovereignty. I would ask the honorable Senator from Nevada, before this Constitution was framed and adopted by the people of the United States what power had the people of Virginia over the constitution and the government of the State of Massachusetts or of any other State? They were separate, distinct, and independent sovereignties; and as read by the honorable Senator from Delaware the separate sovereignty of each State of the Confederation was expressly reserved and guaranteed in the Articles of Confederation themselves. What was proposed to be done when the Federal Convention was called? Who called the Convention? Did the United States as a nation, as one people, call the Convention of the States by their delegates at Philadelphia that framed the present Constitution? Not at all. The wise and great men of the nation, who had experienced the insufficiency of the old Articles of Confederation, recommended it ex officio and as private citizens to the States. The States as States chose their delegates to that Convention and sent them as their representatives. Each State being sovereign had an equal voice in the deliberations and action of the Convention, though represented by unequal numbers of delegates.

The members of the Convention thus called deliberated as to the form of the Government. The result was the presentation to the States of the Constitution as it is, exclusive of the amendments. How was that form of government submitted? How was it adopted? What power made it a common Government for all the States? It was the States themselves and the people of the States acting as States. In every State of the Union a convention of that State was called to accept or reject this proposed common Government of all the States. What power called these conventions of the States? Did the old Congress under the Confederation call those conventions? No, sir; it had no such power. It was thought advisable that the new proposed Government should not be submitted to the State Legislatures, but should be submitted to the people of each State as a sovereignty entitled to all the powers of government, with full option to choose and accept, each State for itself, or to reject the proposed form of government. Sir, it was in this way that the conventions of the States that passed upon the acceptance or rejection of the proposed Government were called upon and constituted. When they got together they acted as States, united not by a government, united not as a nation, but each State as a separate and independent political sovereignty, with every political power that a State or a nation could possess, and bound together only by a league and Articles of Confederation. The new Government was formed, and after it was formed the States became united under a common Constitution and by a common Government.

Now, Mr. President, I ask every gentleman, did not and do not the States now exist in our form of government in virtue of their original sovereignty? What change does the Constitution make in the condition of the States? It simply divides the sovereignty; that is, each agrees to surrender a portion of her sovereignty for the purpose of having it combined in a common Government. What was the object of this common Government? Was it to create one consolidated Government in which should be combined all the powers of the United States? No, sir. No gentleman will be so extravagant as to assume that position. I have heard State rights denounced, and denounced in a manner that, to my mind, showed an utter ignorance of what State rights under our system of government were. There were two or three objects to be subserved by the States who formed the Government in agreeing to the proposed Constitution that was drafted by the Convention in Philadelphia. What were they? I will frankly concede that the first was a Union to protect the country against exterior assault. The second was a power in the General Government to act not upon the States but upon the people of the States for the purpose of maintaining domestic order and tranquillity. The third was the preservation of the States with a view to the perpetuation of popular liberty.

It would be impossible to have the necessary amount of national strength to protect the country against foreign nations without a Union and a common Government. It would be equally impossible to have a common Government that would have any popular or free character without the intervention of the States and the State governments charged with all the reserved powers that were not expressly conferred by the Constitution upon the common Government, and with all the reserved sovereignty that was necessary to control and manage their own domestic and internal affairs.

Mr. President, I will answer in a single remark a line of argument that was entered upon by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELING-HUYSEN] this evening. He assumed that this question of suffrage for the States was before the Federal Convention and was deliberated upon and debated in that Convention. My honorable friend is a deep reader generally, but in that position he is utterly at fault. What was the business of the Convention? Not to form State governments for the States, not to modify the State governments any further than the States might surrender a portion of their powers for the purpose of organizing those powers into a General Government. The Convention deliberated, debated, and acted upon the restriction of such powers. It provided for that restriction and for that partial surrender; but in relation to the State governments that Convention never acted, never deliberated. There never was a proposition before them in relation to suffrage to be exercised in the States under their own constitutions and in the administration of their own governments.

At that time each State had its Executive, called a Governor, each State had its Legislature, consisting of two branches known by different names. The Governor and the members of each branch of the Legislature of each State were elected by popular vote; in most cases directly, but in relation to the senate in some States indirectly. If the honorable Senator was here present I would ask him, by reference to the proceedings of that Convention as reported by Mr. Madison or to any history of the proceedings of that Convention, to show to the Senate where the subject of electors or suffrage to be exercised by any portion of the people of any State in the election of the Governor of that State, or the senate of that State or the house of representatives of the Legislature of that State ever came before that Convention for its deliberation, for its reflection, for its action. There never was a proposition made in the Convention in relation to the electors of the several States acting under their State governments and in the election of their State officers.

The honorable Senator read from some remarks of Franklin and others. If he reads the proceedings of the Convention carefully he and every other man of common sense, and especially he, with all his ability and legal astuteness, cannot fail to come to the conclusion that every proposition, every speech, every argument, every suggestion, that was made in relation to electors and the right of suffrage in the States had sole and exclusive reference to the right of suffrage that was to be exercised, under the Constitution of the United States, in the election of Representatives to Congress and presidential electors. Sir, that is the truth of history; that is the record of the proceedings of that Convention of illustrious men. Why, sir, I doubt myself whether it ever entered into the mind or the imagination of a solitary member of that Convention to propose to regulate the right of suffrage or the qualifications of electors in the different States where the suffrage was to be exercised in the election of State officers under their State constitutions. If there ever was such a mind, such a conclusion, such an imagination, in that Convention, there is no history of it in its recorded proceedings.

Mr. President, I agree that the subject of suffrage and of the qualification of electors arrested the attention of that Convention and produced considerable debate and an expression of various and discordant views. The proposition most insisted upon was that those who exercised the office of elector under the Government of the United States in the election of members of the House of Representatives or presidential electors should be freeholders. But every proposition, every thought, every suggestion, every argument in that debate which occurred in the Convention related exclusively to the right of suffrage and to the qualification of electors acting in the new Government under the Constitution of the United States simply and singly in the election of members of the House of Representatives and presidential electors. I challenge this position to be refuted by fact or history.

Mr. President, the men who deliberated in that Convention were too much of State-rights men, they were too much devoted to the liberties of the people of their respective States, ever to have proposed, ever to have thought of giving a power over the right of suffrage in their respective State governments to the common Government that was about to be organized by the Constitution. Sir, if such a heterodox proposition had been proposed, one so wholly inconsistent not only with State rights but with popular liberty, it would have been scorned and trampled under foot, or it would have broken up the deliberations of that Convention in twenty-four hours.

Mr. President, here is the error which men slide into sometimes imperceptibly; they confound the State governments and the United States Government. Why, sir, that Convention proposed and organized an Executive not for the States but for the United States in the Government that they proposed, and that Chief Executive they called the President. The State governments then were in existence, in full and perfect operation. The Government formed by that Convention was upon the model of the State governments, consisting of the division and partition of the powers of government into three branches, executive, legislative, and judicial. That Convention deliberated, acted, voted upon, and organized all those branches of the Government of the United States. We have a record of their action in relation to the President, in relation to the Senate, in relation to the House of Representatives, but in none of their action in relation to any of these branches of government did they ever have any reference to or dream of the Executive of any of the States, the senate or the house of representatives of any of the States, the government of any of the States. They had no power whatever. Their action was merely advisory. They were a gratuitously assembled Convention, without authority except so far as they derived their authority from the appointment of their respective States.

The Congress of the Confederation had no power to authorize such a Convention. They acted simply with a view to remedy the defects and the weaknesses of the existing form of government, if government it might be called, and they restricted all their deliberations and all their action to that single subject. They never pretended to interfere with the States, and it was well for the harmony of their deliberations, for the wise conclusion which they reached in recommending a system of government to the people of the United States, and for the adoption of that system of government by the conventions called in the several States, it was well for all these great and inappreciable interests that they confined their action and their deliberations only and exclusively to considering and forming a Government for the United States and forbore all interference whatever with the State governments. I concede that the system of government which the Convention framed recommended that the States in their sovereign capacity as independent political corporations, vested with all the political powers and sovereignty of any State or nation, should sacrifice and surrender up a portion of their political sovereignty for the purpose of forming a General Government, and that is all they did. I will read a short passage from the introductory number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison:

"It has been frequently remarked that it seems to have been reserved to the people of this country to decide by their conduct and example the important question whether societies of men are really capable or not of establishing good government from reflection and choice, or whether they are forever destined to depend for their political constitutions on accident and force."

That was a problem that had occupied the minds of statesmen and lawgivers from the earliest ages of the world to the period when this Constitution was formed. Our fathers attempted to solve the problem, and their solution of the problem is presented in the Constitution of the United States. Every man in this body and in this nation professes reverence for and devotion to that Constitution. In reaching the ends of the country in the formation of the Government it was an evidence of the most signal wisdom, forethought, and patriotism. It exacted from the States the sacrifice of the essential powers necessary to regulate the external affairs of all the States with other Governments; all the powers necessary to preserve harmony and peace and concord among the several States of the Union; and then provided that all the residue of sovereignty and political power should be reserved to the undisputed possession and exercise of the people of the States. I have before me the Commentaries of Mr. Justice Story, and I will read from them presently. He lays down this position, as all our eminent commentators upon the Constitution and statesmen have done, that this Government of ours is one of limited and delegated powers. The most familiar and striking illustration which I can give of it is that it is a political power of attorney from the people of the several States to the common Government and to the men who in the future were to fill the offices of that common Government.

This familiar illustration will bring to the mind of every man of common sense the principle by which it is to be construed. You create an attorney in fact to transact your business; you create that attorney by a written letter or power. What is the extent of his powers? Only such as you have chosen expressly to delegate to him. All that you do not delegate by words you retain; and the truth of that position needs no argument or principle to sustain it. But our jealous fathers were not satisfied with that irrefragable principle of logic and of human reason. They chose to provide expressly that all the powers not herein delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. Judge Story, in his Commentaries, treats it as an unnecessary provision which was only inserted for greater caution to avoid all pretense for the assumption that the States did not retain their sovereignty.

We have heard this Chamber resound, from time to time, with the declaration that there was no State sovereignty; that it was a mockery of terms, and that not only the paramount but all the sovereignty of the United States was vested in the Government of the United States. What says Mr. Madison? In the Federalist, No. 45, that recommended this system of government to the adoption of the people of the several States, I read this passage:

"The State governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government, while the latter is no wise essential to the operation or organization of the former. Without the intervention of the State Legislatures the President of the United States cannot be elected at all. They must in all cases have a great share in his appointment, and will perhaps in most cases of themselves determine it. The Senate will be elected absolutely and exclusively by the State Legislatures. Even the House of Representatives, though drawn immediately from the people, will be chosen very much under the influence of that class of men whose influence over the people obtains for themselves an election into the State Legislatures. Thus each of the principal branches of the Federal Government will owe its existence more or less to the favor of the State governments, and must consequently feel a dependence which is much more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious than too overbearing toward them. On the other side, the component parts of the State governments will in no instance be indebted for their appointment to the direct agency of the Federal Government, and very little, if at all, to the local influence of its members."

Now I will refer to another vital and important matter in which the States and their governments are a necessary and an indispensable part of the machinery of the Government of the United States. Why? Because it is the State Legislatures that are to provide for the election of presidential electors. Another feature and provision of the Constitution is that the Senate of the United States shall consist of two Senators from each State, elected by the Legislatures of the different States. I will give other instances in which the States are a part of the machinery of the General Government. Suppose the States, or a majority of them, were to refuse to send Representatives to Congress, would not that terminate the Government? Suppose a majority of the States were to decline to pass laws for the election of presidential electors? Mr. Madison says that the action of the States is indispensably necessary to the election of a President. There is no substitute power of action by which a valid presidential election can take place. What would become of the Senate, what would become of the Constitution and Government of the United States, if the State Legislatures or a majority of them should refuse to elect Senators? The idea that this Government is a self-preserving and a self-perpetuating power is a heresy. It has no truth in the provisions of the Constitution or any logic that results from the Constitution.

What was the scene that was witnessed in 1801? No candidate for the Presidency got a majority of all the presidential electors. The consequence was that under the provision of the Constitution the election of President was thrown before the House of Representatives and the House balloted a great many times, and that threatened to bring the Government to a close before it succeeded in making a President.

Did not every man then concede, does not every man now concede, that if the House of Representatives by States had continued obstinately to ballot between Jefferson and Burr without giving either of them a majority of the States there would then have been no presidential election, and the Government would have been brought to an end? No, sir. There is no such absurdity as that in our system of government. We have no government of inherent sovereignty; we have no government that does not derive all of its sovereignty and all of its powers from the people. There is no government, State or Federal, that does not require the constant ministration and action of the people of America, acting by States, to continue it in being and in administration; and the withdrawal by the States from the Government of action in various forms would bring the Government to a close.

Why, Mr. President, suppose there should be another election in which any candidate for the Presidency failed to receive a majority of all the electoral votes. The election would be thrown into the House of Representatives. The three highest of the candidates are before the House, and the House of Representatives, acting by States, continues to divide between the three candidates so as to render it utterly impracticable for any one of them to obtain a majority of the vote of the States acting by States. In such a state of case would not the Government come to an end? There might be an irregular assumption and usurpation of power that would continue the governmental action; but that would be essentially as much a revolution as though it was brought about by force of arms.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States might cease to exist to-morrow in any of these modes; would that affect the existence of the governments of the States? No, sir. Our complex system of government was formed upon the principle of erecting and building the Federal Government upon the States. They are the piles driven into the earth upon which this magnificent edifice was reared. When these piles or any of them fall it endangers the superstructure and will bring it to ruin. But the superstructure itself may be overthrown by the blast of revolution; it may be abandoned by the States themselves; it may be abandoned by the people of the States who formed it, and yet it would leave the existing States with their governments in all their perfected organization as unharmed and undisturbed although there had been no such catastrophe to the common Government of the country.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the honorable Senator from Nevada and his able coadjutors what power in the United States forms the State governments? I concede that the State governments, as I said heretofore, were existing in a State organization and perfect operation in 1787, in 1789, in 1790, when the Constitution went into operation. I concede furthermore that so far as powers and sovereignty were delegated by the people of the States, acting by States, to the common Government by the enumerated powers of the Constitution it circumscribed the sovereignty and the powers of the States; but not beyond it. The powers of the States are restricted by the Federal Constitution. The powers of the General Government are restricted by the Federal Constitution; for there are powers enumerated there which the wise and patriotic men who framed it were not willing to trust either to the General or to State Governments. But I ask what was the manipulation of the State governments in their modification by the Convention of 1787? I concede that the States were shorn of a part of their sovereignty and political power; but I say that in the organism of their governments, in the arrangement and powers of their government, they were not only not interfered with by the Convention of 1787, but the people of America without exception would not have submitted a day to any such interference. It is now proposed to put in the Constitution:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

What is the extent and the office of this amendment as it is proposed, to regulate by an amendment of the Constitution the whole force and power of suffrage and of holding office in the different States for their respective governments? Sir, I maintain that Congress has no such power. The miserable negroes whom it is proposed to invest with the right of suffrage by this provision, and which is the chief object of most of its advocates, are utterly worthless in the consideration of this vast, permanent, great matter. The honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] adverted to it a day or two since when he spoke of the tide of emigration that might pour in upon the Pacific States from the surcharged populations of eastern Asia. He adverted to a danger that cannot excite too much alarm. Our Christian civilization and our Government of the people by written Constitution and giving limited and delegated powers could not survive a few great waves from that vast hive of an inferior race. We all know this who know anything of the Chinese. They are vastly a superior race to the negro. There is no nation out of Europe that has as high a civilization as the Chinese. In the arts, in science, in all the achievements of civilization, the Celestial Empire is incomparably greater than the Japanese Islands. Next to the Christian nations in Europe and America it is the highest and much the highest that has ever been reached by any race in the world. We know the efficiency of this race, and we know that if it was to come in its deluge or successive, numberless waves from an empire that numbers one fourth of the population of globe it might well give us cause for alarm.

Our system of religion and government and of social organization is threatened by this wave of emigration from Eastern Asia. Sir, for myself, I would be willing to lay a perpetual and an absolute embargo upon it. If my voice could prevail, not for my benefit or for the benefit of this generation, there never should be allowed the privilege to one son or daughter of the Mongolian race again to put foot upon the shores of America. I want no negro Government; I want no Mongolian Government; I want the Government of the white man which our fathers incorporated. The Declaration of Independence was made as irrespective of the negro as it was of the red man of the forest. It embraced neither. Neither of them was a party to it. Neither had any hand in its organization. Neither was to take part in it; and that truth is evidenced not only by contemporaneous history, but by the act of Congress authorizing the naturalization of foreigners, passed in 1803, which expressly limits the naturalization of foreigners to white men.

Now, Mr. President, I ask you in sober reason, and I ask the Senators here present this question: did an after generation ever owe such a debt of gratitude to a previous one as we do to our fathers who framed this wonderful instrument of government? Was ever such a complicated piece of governmental machinery put together? Was there ever a Government that required so much of human reason and intelligence and virtue to sustain and to perpetuate it? Was there ever a Government so fraught with blessings unnumbered, inappreciable, to those who were to succeed the founders of this Government? Was there ever as important and difficult and priceless an office performed by one generation of men to all the subsequent generations of men?

But, Mr. President, as high a duty as that has devolved upon this generation; and that is to preserve, to perpetuate unimpaired in all their purity, in all of their remarkable distributions and arrangements and checks of power, in all their restrictions, in all the guarantees which they give not only of national strength but of individual liberty and happiness, the institutions they founded. That is as priceless and as difficult a duty devolving upon this generation. I am not prepared to say that the duty and the difficulty of preservation are not quite as great as those of creation and inauguration. What says Mr. Madison upon that point? In the Federalist he says:

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined."

Is there any compatibility between that enumeration of the powers and objects of the two governments and the proposition now under consideration? Sir, what is the great principle, the great force and power of representative government? The first and fundamental is the right of suffrage. Next to that in importance and influence is the right to hold office. Here it is proposed in what is termed an amendment of the Constitution, but what will be a revolution of the Constitution, to take these great forces and powers from all the State governments and for Congress to absorb them. Sir, the very essence of government is contained in these two propositions. The power that regulates the right of suffrage, that decides who shall vote, has an equal right to decide who shall not vote. The power that decides who shall hold office has an equal right to decide who shall not hold office. Then, I ask any intelligent man if these two powers in their double aspect do not combine the very essence of human government? You now ostensibly offer to amend the Constitution of the United States. I concede that you have a right to regulate suffrage in all popular elections under the Constitution of the United States; not beyond. You have a right to decide who shall vote for Representatives to Congress. The Convention endeavored to establish a uniform rule on that subject, but the different qualifications and the modes of election were so various in the States that for that reason, and that reason alone, they were unable to present a uniform rule, not for regulating suffrage in State governments and under State constitutions, but within the Constitution of the United States in the election simply of members of the House of Representatives and presidential electors.

Now, I ask, Mr. President, if this proposition is to be adopted and it is to become a function of Congress to propose, not amendments, not improvements, but provisions that contain the very elements of revolution and destruction of our whole system of permanent State governments; if it is a competent power for Congress to exercise to propose such amendments, where is the safety of the States, where are the State governments, where are State rights? Do you not at once, if you establish this principle and make this precedent, absorb all State rights, all State power? Do you not assume and usurp a perfectly uncontrollable and absolute power to regulate the State governments as you please, to manipulate them, to dictate how and on what principles they shall be formed, and if you choose so to interpose directly to form them themselves? Yes, Mr. President, if it is competent for Congress to exercise the power in this form you may do it in a more summary and effective form. With as much show of constitutional power, with as much justice, reason, and truth, you could present the projet of a permanent form of government, a constitution for all the States, and pass an amendment of the Constitution that that should be the government of all the States. There is no arresting you from reaching that conclusion if you proceed on in these principles, upon this platform.

Now, sir, have you any such power as that? In the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, Chief Justice Marshall said:

"We admit, all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited and must not be transcended. Should Congress in the execution of its powers adopt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution, or should Congress under the pretext of executing its powers pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land."

That position has a strong and irresistible application to the present case. Congress has a right to propose amendments to the Constitution. That is a limited right. Under the guise and pretext of executing that power you have no right to pass other acts with which you are not intrusted. Now, I ask gentleman here at this point, is Congress intrusted with any power to make a State government; or is the provision of the Constitution the only charter of the power of Congress from which such a course can be deduced either by express provision or by any sort of implication? Have you the right by an amendment of the Constitution to say who shall vote in State elections? Have you any right to decide that the provisions of State constitutions which confine the right of suffrage to white men shall not be enforced? May you strike out of these instruments that provision and leave language that will comprehend the black men and the red men and the yellow men? If you have, I ask you to read the provision of the Constitution.

Now, why do you attempt this amendment? It is indirection; it is that you may reach as certainly and as surely the control of all the State elections in the southern States as though you decided those elections by your own votes. You are to do that by the negro vote. You are to do that by giving the right of suffrage to a majority of ignorant, half barbarians, totally unfit; men of an inferior race in some of the southern States and a large proportion in all of them.

I should like to hear a statesman or a lawyer read to me the principles of the Constitution that clothes you with such a power, and maintain his conclusions by any fair logic or argumentation. Sir, there never was a bolder usurpation attempted by men. There never was one more abhorrent to the American mind and to all the fundamental principles of the American system of government. Here is the State of Kentucky; I will put the case of that State because it is my own. We claim the right perfectly, absolutely, under the Constitution of the United States and our mixed system of government, to form our own State government. One of the essential and most important principles of that government, one of the most important forms of that right, is that we shall have the power to decide who shall vote in the State in our State elections. Another one of equal importance is that we claim the right to decide what class of persons, what qualifications our candidates for Governor, for attorney general, for all the high offices of the State and for members of the houses of the Legislature shall have. Now, you can claim not only to share that right with us, but to control it by the action of the Representatives and Senators from the other States. Whence do you deduce that right? Show me your warrant for it. You have no such warrant. Suppose we refuse to submit to it. Suppose the people, who are generally opposed to negro suffrage, refuse to submit to it. How will you enforce it? Oh, by arms! That is the panacea.

Well, now, Mr. President, if that is your purpose, you are forcing the devotees to State rights, to a limited and delegated government, to popular liberty, to one common right upon which all may unite without regard to section or the former existence of slavery or freedom in their States. You force us to a right to question whether Congress shall absorb all the powers of this Government at its will and pleasure, the power to make State governments and declare who shall administer State governments both in suffrage and office; to blot out any of the provisions of the State governments according to your will, and to create others according to your party interests, according to your selfish schemes of ambition and of party power. Whence do you derive such a power as that? You are forcing the free-men of America, the sons of the men who carried our country through the struggle of the Revolution, to occupy a common ground upon that right. If you will have it so, when you all rally to that line, for one I am for making the issue there and fighting it out to the death. I am ready to stand or fall upon that great principle of State rights and popular government. It was for that our fathers fought; it was for that they framed the Constitution; it was for that they preserved the States and their governments as a part of the machinery of the General Government; and you have no more right to cut off a part of the machinery of the General Government in the form of the State governments than you have to cut off Congress or to cut off the Senate.

Mr. President, the English Government is fast assuming the feature and powers of a government of the House of Commons. Its impetuous action is swallowing up the royal prerogatives and the privileges of the House of Lords. So of our House of Representatives. You claim to be omnipotent, at least you act as though you were omnipotent. You strip the Supreme Court at your pleasure of its powers as a coördinate branch of the Government. You invade the Presidency, and you strip the Executive of powers that are as much his as your ordinary legislative powers are yours. Not satisfied with that, you proceed on in the paths of usurpation of power, of oppression, and of error, and now claim the right to stifle the State governments and to say who shall vote, who shall control them, who shall fill their offices, and what their constitutions and laws shall be.

You are doing the true votaries of liberty in this country a great service in making this issue. I thank you for pushing it to such an extreme. The sensibilities of the people have been struck so often and with so much force by congressional usurpations of power and prerogative as to have lost much of their true comprehension of the Government, but it seems to me this will be an electric shock that will give it all of its vitality and energy, and it will arouse itself for your final overthrow; and for one I am willing to accept the issue. If you are resolved to push forward the work of usurpation, of wrong, of violation of the Constitution, of oppression upon the free people of the United States, who have as much right to power in the Government as you have, you presume on their future submission from their past submission; you believe that the people who have submitted to so much will yet submit to more. But I warn you that the operations of nature from which spring forth the earthquake are deep, silent, and seated in the bosom of the earth. They will not be known or seen until the eruption comes with all of its attendant destruction. The removal of Charles X from his throne and of Louis Philippe was almost without popular commotion. The late expulsion of Queen Isabella from Spain was almost as quiet and noiseless. You ought to take caution. Such will be your fate.

But, Mr. President, the vigorous and able Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] reminded us a few days ago that the people had been educated by the war up to certain measures of policy. The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. VICKERS] read extracts from speeches of the honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART], and from speeches of the honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY], and speeches of other Senators, as inconsistent with their present positions and principles on that subject as it is possible for human action to be. The honorable Senator from Nevada explained that he had no such weakness as to pretend to any consistency in politics. The honorable Senator from Indiana says that the people had been educated up to the measures that were enumerated to-day by the Senator from Delaware. Sir, we have heard of educating the hearts of the southern people up to the point of treason and rebellion before the war began by Yancey and others. Such is the progress of human error from boyhood to manhood—it becomes more violent. The highway robber, the burglar, commences his career with timidity, with some compunctions of conscience, but soon learns to stifle all compunctions of conscience. Such is the progress of error. Sir, the progress of all wrong, of all crime, is forward.

Let me read from your platform of 1860. The Democratic party had held, with slight interruptions, the Government and all its great powers from 1824. The Republican party made a most earnest and eventually a successful struggle to hurl the Democracy from power, and by what means and for what purposes as they avowed at the time:

"Resolved, That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Federal Constitution are essential to the preservation of our republican institutions, and that the Federal Constitution, the rights of the States, and the union of the States ought and shall be preserved.

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political faith depend; and we denounce a lawless invasion by an armed force of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

My honorable friend, not now in his seat, from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] I believe was one of the fathers of the Republican party when it first announced its principles. The principles are essentially right. There could be no stronger professions of devotion to State rights than are herein set forth, if those professions were acted on by the gentlemen who made them. This party in Congress passed another resolution in 1861 which has been often read here, but I read it again:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States now in revolt against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not prosecuted upon our part in any spirit of aggression or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of the States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and of the laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

This party had another convention in the course of the past year in which they adopted another platform, one of the articles of which was:

"The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men in the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

Before the election there was no controversy as to the meaning of this plank in the Republican platform. The proposition simply means this: that the States in rebellion had been conquered by the Government of the United States, and that all the rights of conquerors over the southern States belonged to the Congress of the United States as their conqueror, and therefore it was that the Chicago convention justify Congress in having imposed negro suffrage upon the southern States, and having abrogated their proper and legitimate State governments. The meaning of the residue of the plank is simply that as to the States that did not enter into the rebellion, and that therefore were not conquered by Congress and its armies, the loyal States were subject to a different rule than the southern States who had been conquered, and who were at the feet of their conquerors, subject to the same law that any foreign Government imposes upon its enemies when it has conquered them. That is the whole of it. That was your promise to the people of the States who did not enter into the rebellion. You maintained that the right of suffrage was properly given to the loyal negroes of the South. Upon what principle and by what power? Upon the principle that Congress has all the powers of a conqueror, having been by the laws of nations invested by that war with the rights of conquerors, just as any foreign State might have invaded the United States, or any of them, and have permanently conquered a State, having become its masters, expelled its government, and introduced a government of the conquerors. You said that the same rights that the conqueror in that state of the case would have had you have over the southern people, and the same power over their State governments and their institutions; but at the same time you said explicitly that the power, the right to regulate suffrage in the loyal States belongs to those States; and that part of the proposition is unquestionably true. There is no provision of constitutional or national law that can shake it.

You go into Ohio, you go into all the States that were loyal and who furnished the troops that preserved the nation and suppressed the rebellion and perpetuated the Government of the United States, and say to them that you have the power under the guise of amendment to the Constitution to say who shall and who shall not vote in those States, and who shall and who shall not hold office in those States. In other words, you claim a power that subjects the governments of those States to the power of two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States in proposing and passing amendments to the Constitution. Sir, you have no such power. It is as flagrant a usurpation as any party were ever guilty of. It will not be submitted to. It ought not to be submitted to a day or an hour. The people who will submit to it have the spirit of slaves; they will be slaves, and the sooner they are slaves the better for the tranquillity of the country; and let order reign in the country as order reigned in Warsaw.

Mr. President, I protest against Congress assuming any such power. From whence did these vast claims of power originate? In the school of Boston, in Massachusetts. Massachusetts at the era of the Revolution and the formation of the Constitution had great men. Massachusetts was then more States rights than Virginia herself. Some of the most important amendments to the Constitution were proposed by that State. There were one hundred and twenty-six amendments proposed by seven States, says Mr. Madison. To be sure in different clauses of the amendment several of these proposed amendments are to be found. Sir, since the era of the formation of the Constitution Massachusetts has been the hot-bed of political heresy and sedition and disobedience to the country, and of innovations that have threatened to subvert not only the Government and Constitution of the country, but its reputation and credit. Massachusetts in a minority, bound to obey, has always been malcontent and insurgent; in a majority she has always been grasping, usurping, insulting, and rebellious. There is no politician in Massachusetts with whom and with whose writings I am acquainted with a single sound and correct idea in relation to the Federal Constitution, much less the question of suffrage. A recent book that I have read called "the Manual of the Constitution" is the wildest of all the essays I have read, and only equaled by those that I have heard enunciated on the floor of this House by the honorable Senators from Massachusetts.

Sir, what does the honorable Senator from Vermont propose? He speaks of this amendment being submitted to the people of the United States just as all the previous amendments have been submitted. Do we not all know the history of the previous amendments? They were insisted upon by all the people of the States, with few exceptions, before the ratification of the Federal Constitution; and all of them, I believe, without exception, made the adoption of the first ten amendments that were adopted in the First Congress a condition upon which they accepted and ratified the Constitution. Is there any such parallel between those amendments and their modes of adoption and the proposition to submit now this amendment to Legislatures long since elected who were chosen without any regard to the great and vital questions involved in the proposed amendment? Sir, the dominant men of the majority party in the Senate may make loud professions of obeying the will of the people. They are for universal suffrage, that the will and the voice of the people must prevail everywhere in the Government they establish. How is it to prevail? Is there any practical rule except that the majority shall control? The majority in each State ought to control. That is the fundamental principle of our Government.

What would become of this proposition now if it were submitted to the people of the States? Instead of getting three fourths of the States it would not get half of them. Here is Connecticut. There was a proposition made within the past three years to strike out the term "white" from her constitution in regulating the right of suffrage; and it was voted upon by the people of that State, and it was voted down by a majority of six thousand. But my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] proposes that the Legislature elected by the people after such a decided majority had determined against the proposition of negro suffrage—and its Legislature was elected without any regard to that question—when a large majority of the people thought, no doubt, it was settled in the State of Connecticut by that vote he now insists that this Legislature shall act upon the proposition of amendment to the Constitution of the United States here proposed.

Let us examine that just a minute in relation to Connecticut. Connecticut votes by towns. I understand that each town elects two members of the house of representatives. Here is one town with twelve hundred votes that elects two members of the house; here is another with two thousand votes that elects two members. Here is New Haven with forty thousand people that elects two members; here is Hartford with fifty-two thousand people that elects two members. Here, then, are ninety thousand people electing four members of the Legislature of Connecticut, and here are thirty-two hundred people electing four other members. The number that are elected by this meager minority of votes were elected without reference to the proposed amendment of the Constitution that is now under consideration. The honorable Senator from Connecticut wants these thirty-two hundred people to have as much weight as ninety thousand, the majority of whom are opposed to the amendment. By the ratio of population the two towns of New Haven and Hartford ought to elect one hundred and fifty members, while the other two towns should elect but four; but the honorable Senator, with all his devotion to the people, to the power of the sovereign people, to the truism that all the people of the United States should have an equal voice in the government of the country, national and State, insists against the proposition of his colleague, and contends that his side of this question shall have the advantage of four votes with thirty-two hundred constituents, when his colleague shall have the advantage of only four votes with ninety thousand constituents.

The disproportion is enormous. I ask the honorable Senator from Connecticut if the odds were as large against him and his party as they are in his favor would he not sustain a proposition either that this proposed amendment should be submitted to the people or at least that it should be submitted to a Legislature the most numerous body of which was to be elected after the submission was made?

Mr. President, a few more words. In the course of every generation the people of large sections of the United States become terribly disordered in their mental and moral structure about various questions, and these evidences of derangement and disordered intellect and morals are always sure to originate in Boston. They want suffrage; they are not satisfied with that, but they want woman suffrage. Now, Mr. President, I have but a few words to say on that matter. I say that woman now occupies her proper domain. She is the priestess of the altar of the household. She is the source of all the morality and virtue that blesses the world. It is of the utmost importance that this ministering priestess shall be preserved pure. He is a most mistaken man, if not a positive misanthrope, who would bring to that altar the defilements of party politics. There is nothing which partisan politics touches that it does not contaminate and degrade. In Heaven's name let woman, whose proper performance of her great functions and influences in her domain are more important than all the offices performed by man, not be subjected to this defilement.

Why go to the hustings, why go to the polls, to the seething crowd that in uncounted numbers is pushing to the polls amid the influences of passion and liquor, vulgarity, blackguardism, bullying, and threatening? Do you want to drag pure woman into such a conjunction as that? No, Mr. President; a good and a pure woman would turn with loathing and disgust from any such contact. Bad women ought never to be allowed to have a vote. It will be a day of woe, of incomparable woe, when the ballot is forced upon American women. I trust that that sad day will never come.

But, Mr. President, now the madness of the hour seems to be to regulate the right of suffrage, to amend the Constitution. The party in power have torn it and cast it aside as an old, worn garment, and every man thinks that he is competent to sew a patch to it. How long is this process to be continued? Mr. President, the way the party in power are progressing, there remains but one further proposition to amend the Constitution by them, and that is that an office shall be secured to every citizen of the United States without regard to color, race, or previous condition, and when that proposition to amend the Constitution is made I think the glory of this party will be complete. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I cannot conclude, exhausted and feeble as I am, without a most earnest protest against both the power of Congress to propose this amendment and against its most mischievous and destructive policy.

REMARKS OF HON. W. S. HOLMAN,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, up to this hour the faith of this Government has been scrupulously maintained with its creditors. Since the accumulation of this great debt began every engagement with the holders of our public securities has been promptly and faithfully fulfilled. The interest on the bonds payable in coin, and payable half yearly, has been promptly paid, and in some instances actually paid before it became due, and so solicitous has been the Secretary of the Treasury that by no possible contingency should the coin in the Treasury be insufficient to meet the half-yearly payments of interest that $100,000,000 in gold have been kept idle in the Treasury. While the whole country has been oppressed by national and local taxation you have even refused to impose on these bonds a national tax, although the right to do so is unquestionable. You have made your securities so secure and valuable that the bonds which you sold at par for greenbacks are now at a premium of ten per cent.

Such has been your anxiety to promote the interest of your bondholders at the expense of your laboring people that the capitalists of Europe, neglecting the bonds issued by their own Governments, have purchased $800,000,000 of your bonds on which you are annually sending to Europe $48,000,000 of interest, a sum equal to the entire expenses of this Government twenty years ago; the capitalists at Frankfort and other financial centers of Europe having invested in your bonds at forty cents on the dollar. But the bondholders, not satisfied with the unexampled speculation they have made out of the necessities of this nation, now demand a still further increase in the value of their bonds, demanding, indeed, that you make a new contract and agree to pay in coin the bonds which they bought with paper money worth at the time they purchased the bonds less than half the value of gold. And what concession do these gentlemen propose to make in consideration of this? Do they propose to reduce the interest? No. Do they propose to acquiesce in the just and equal taxation of their bonds with other property? No, sir; they propose nothing of the kind. They simply demand that you pay them in coin, dollar for dollar, the bonds which you agreed to pay in paper money, dollar for dollar. Public creditors even in monarchies, where capital is all-powerful and the people nothing, have usually deemed themselves most fortunate if the Government acted in good faith and paid according to the contract. But here the public creditors with refreshing coolness request us to pay twice as much in value as we agreed to pay them. We have all heard of a conscientious Englishman who had purchased his fifty-two bonds at fifty cents on the dollar in gold who has uniformly refused to receive any more than one half of the amount of his coupons, being six per cent. on his investment, and even then receiving just twice as much interest as his own Government pays on her funded debt, but he stands solitary and alone.

If the people of this country pay this great debt, which has made a few men enormously rich and reduced countless thousands to poverty, in good faith, according to the letter of the contract, "letter and spirit," if you please, they are doing all that honor and justice can demand; and this attempt of Congress to compel the people to pay more than they agreed to pay is the act of a tyrant, the old and infamous example of history again repeated, the oppression of labor for the benefit of the rich and the powerful.

There is a grim humor in the title of this bill: "An act to strengthen the public credit." To strengthen the public credit! No, sir; it is not an act to strengthen the public credit, but to strengthen the manacles that bind and prostrate the laboring masses. What does the bill propose? Its purpose is at least outspoken and direct. There is none of the obscurity and double-dealing of the Chicago platform about it, for the occasion for deception has gone by.

It is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

It is not necessary for me to say that this measure only applies to the five-twenty bonds, which constitute the bulk of our public debt, being $1,602,583,350, for the other bonds issued after the legal-tender act was passed expressly specify the kind of money in which they are to be paid. While it is true that the acts authorizing the five-twenty bonds do not "expressly" say in what currency they shall be paid, there is not an impartial judge in the civilized world who would not decide upon the face of the law that these five-twenty bonds are in fact, by the terms of the law, payable in greenbacks, lawful money of the United States. But if it is true that these bonds were sold for greenbacks, and it is doubtful in what funds they are payable, it would be a very pliant subserviency to wealth that would decide that they shall be paid in gold, a money twice as valuable as was received for them.

But the laws authorizing the issuing of the United States notes, commonly called legal tenders or greenbacks, and the five-twenty bonds permit no honest doubt that these five-twenty bonds are in fact payable in greenbacks, and that such is the letter and spirit of the law, although not "expressly" so provided. The first legal-tender act was passed on the 25th day of February, 1862. The first section of that act provides for issuing the United States notes, and declares that such notes shall be received—

"In payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States, of every kind whatsoever, except for interest on bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

Now, sir, if the five-twenty bonds had been issued or authorized before the passage of this act and before the United States notes were issued as lawful money and while gold and silver were the only lawful money there would be force in the argument that they ought to be paid in coin. But the reverse is true. Everybody knows that not one of the five-twenty bonds was issued until after this act of February 25, 1862, was passed. Indeed this is the very act that first authorized the issuing of the five-twenty bonds, and the first section of the act from which I have quoted further provides that any holder of these United States notes may deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of fifty dollars or some multiple of fifty dollars, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall "thereupon issue to the holder an equal amount of bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years and payable twenty years after the date thereof." These are the five-twenty bonds, so that the very law and the very section of the law that authorized the issue of the United States notes and made them a legal tender "in payment of all debts public and private except duties on imports and interest" authorized the issue of the five-twenty bonds and authorized the sale of these bonds at par for these United States notes, thus creating a public debt not excepted from payment in United States notes, and all debts public and private "except duties on imports and interest" were to be payable in such notes. If any debt public or private was payable in United States notes these five-twenty bonds clearly were; this is so clear that it is an insult to common intelligence to discuss it.

The acts of July 11, 1862, March 3, 1863, March 3, 1864, June 30, 1864, and March 3, 1865, under which all of the United States notes and five-twenty bonds were issued, contain the same provisions. By every act the United States notes are made a legal tender "in payment of all debts public and private, except duties on imports and interest." By every act the five-twenty bonds were authorized to be sold for these United States notes, and by every act the interest is payable in coin. By the act of March 3, 1863, the ten-forty bonds are authorized, principal and interest, expressly payable in coin. Thus by a series of acts extending from February 25, 1862, to March 3, 1865, under which the United States notes (greenbacks) were issued and the five-twenty and the ten-forty bonds were issued, the stubborn facts are presented that the United States notes are made lawful money and a legal tender "in payment of all debts public and private, except duties on imports and interest on bonds," and were convertible dollar for dollar into the five-twenty bonds; and that the interest on the bonds and the principal and interest of the ten-forty bonds were made payable in gold. So that during the whole period while these five-twenty bonds were being issued United States notes (greenbacks) were lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts except duties on imports, interest on bonds and notes payable in gold, and the principal and interest of the ten-forty bonds. There are no other exceptions, and nothing but the arrogant effrontery of overgrown wealth could have suggested that the principal of these five-twenty bonds was payable in coin and not payable in the lawful money with which they were purchased. It cannot be pretended that the intention was to pay in coin, for in the act of February 25, 1862, and every subsequent act providing for the public debt, where payment was to be made in coin, that fact is positively expressed; otherwise, by the terms of every successive act, the debt was payable in lawful money.

The interest on these bonds was payable in coin; it was a hard bargain the money-lenders forced upon us. This concession was made to them with reluctance; but your gallant Army was in the field, the Treasury was exhausted, your soldiers had to be paid, supplies for the Army and Navy had to be furnished, and the Government was anxious to avoid an improper inflation of the currency. The patriotic gentlemen for whom so much is now claimed would not advance a dollar without that provision. The Treasury could not raise money on bonds less favorable as to the interest, and even with the interest payable in coin not a bond was sold until you had so inflated the greenback currency that the five-twenty bonds could be purchased at forty-three cents on the dollar in coin, and then these capitalists came forward and promptly took the bonds. They would at any rate receive six per cent. in gold semi-annually on each $100 for which they had paid forty-three dollars on the gold value, nearly fifteen per cent. per annum in gold on their investment. It did not require a very exalted degree of patriotism to purchase the bonds on such terms, and now these gentlemen have the effrontery to claim that not only the interest but the principal shall be paid in coin. I say that not a dollar of the five-twenty bonds was sold until the issue of the greenbacks had greatly inflated the currency. Gold had reached a premium of one hundred and thirty seven per cent. on the 8th day of January, 1863. On that day I introduced the following resolution in this House:

"Whereas it is represented that more than forty-five million dollars are now due to the soldiers of the Army of the United States, and that large numbers of them have not received their pay for more than six months past; and whereas on the 25th day of February, 1862, in addition to Treasury notes, the Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and sell the bonds of the United States to the amount of $500,000,000 to meet the liability of the Government; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the House, at the earliest moment, why his Department has not as authorized by law provided the means necessary to pay the soldiers of the Army and prevent the great public injustice of the unreasonable delay, and that he inform the House why said bonds, if necessary, have not been sold to meet demands so meritorious and so unreasonably and unjustly delayed."

This resolution was adopted; and it was not until after this and when the currency was still further inflated that the capitalists came forward as purchasers of the bonds. I have heard of gentlemen who were so lost to a proper appreciation of what was due to the Army in the field that they have complained that Congress, in order to raise the money to pay the soldier to supply his own wants and the wants of his wife and children at home, yielded to the demand of the capitalists for payment of the interest on the bonds in gold. How fierce must be the indignation, sir, of such gentlemen when they learn that these capitalists are now claiming that the principal of these bonds shall be paid in gold, and that there are gentlemen in Congress willing to yield to this arrogant demand, oppressing the people to gratify this insatiable voracity of men of overgrown fortunes. But these bondholders are here; they crowd every avenue of the Capitol, while the people whose rights are being betrayed are toiling in the field or the workshop. But I trust in God the people will signally rebuke this attempt to give away the fruits of their labor without consideration or even plausible excuse, simply because a few gentlemen of great wealth and large political influence demand it.

Why was not this question honestly presented in the great contest of the past year? How many gentlemen are here from the great West who frankly told the people whose support they were seeking that they would vote to pay the five-twenty bonds in gold? I did not hear of a single instance. But a short time since I proposed a tax of ten per cent. on the interest of the bonds—a tax of but little more than one half of one per cent. on the principal, about one fourth the tax that other property pays—and when I reminded the House that by a large majority we had adopted that proposition last July we were coolly informed by the leader of the House that "that was before the election." It well illustrated, sir, how little the legislation of this Government, with this new political morality, is under the control of the people. We shall see how far the people will submit to this new and gigantic fraud upon their rights.

Capitalists are demanding a speedy return to specie payments. It is clearly to their interest; it would greatly augment their wealth; it would greatly oppress the people. But wealth, which is naturally timid and always apprehensive of popular movements, feels a sense of absolute security under the existing order of things, having for the first time in our history largely controlled a great political contest. Every interest of wealth is sacredly protected, every measure for its aggrandizement is promoted. If there is any doubt how the bonds should be paid the doubt must go to the benefit of wealth and against the laboring masses. Specie payment must be secured by a reduction of the currency. We have two currencies: one of $350,000,000 in greenbacks, the money of the people, lawful money, drawing no interest and furnishing a safe and unobjectionable currency. The benefit of this $350,000,000 goes to the whole people; the other, $300,000,000 of national bank notes, furnished by the Government free of charge to the banks, on which the banks pay the Government the trifling tax of one per cent., nothing more. The whole benefit of this $300,000,000 of currency goes to the handful of wealthy gentlemen owning the national banks. Now, sir, the question is, which of these currencies shall be retired to reach specie payments? But there is no hesitation. The bankers are here in force, and every proposition without one exception emanating from the party in power contemplates the withdrawal of the greenbacks and giving to the national banks, for it is nothing less, this vast sum of $300,000,000 of money. There is not a monarch on the face of the earth who would dare to deal so unjustly with his people; but our people have borne so patiently every successive usurpation of Congress that its leaders have ceased to consider what may be the public will. If the greenback money is retired the object sought by this bill is in fact accomplished. With the specie basis reached by a large reduction of currency the country is still to pay $300,000,000 a year to pay the interest on the public debt and carry on the Government. I have always said, And I again say that in my judgment gold and silver are the best currency, the most reasonable and permanent standard of value, but while at this time it is clearly to the interest of capitalists, especially of large holders of our bonds, that specie payments should be resumed, is such the interest of the people, waiving the question of the injustice of paying the bonds in a currency, twice as valuable as that we agreed to pay? There is said by well-informed persons to be $225,000,000 of coin money in the United States. Specie payments can be resumed with $300,000,000 of paper currency, perhaps $350,000,000, and yet the estimates of our annual expenditure is $300,000,000. Does any man believe that the labor of any country can bear, year after year, taxes to the amount of one half of the entire circulation? It cannot be done, sir. When heavily burdened by direct and indirect taxes the capacity of labor to bear a given tax diminishes year after year, bringing upon a people a hopeless poverty such as we witness in England, France, and Austria, where great debts and heavy taxes have long oppressed labor. To scale the debt and interest to the gold value of the paper money in which the bonds are payable, or meet the debt in the currency in which it was made and is lawfully payable, is the only escape of this nation from the social and political disorders of the Old World, where the overgrown wealth of the few and the squalid poverty of the many fill the whole land with misery.

No, sir; this bill will not strengthen the public credit. The public credit can only be strengthened by a severe and honest economy in the public expenditures, by confirming in the public mind the belief that the millions wrung from labor will be honestly applied to public purposes and not squandered in the base partisan schemes and monstrous frauds which have for years exhausted the Treasury, by satisfying the people that the public demands upon their industry shall be no greater than good faith and even-handed justice to the public creditors imperatively require, and that labor shall be protected against the unjust and voracious demands of capital. With such a policy firmly established there is no danger of the nation being dishonored by repudiation; but all classes of men would resolve that our debt, enormous as it is, unjust as a portion of it is known to be, shall be paid in absolute good faith, dollar for dollar, in gold, where by the contract we agreed to pay in gold; in paper money, lawful money, where, as in the case of the five-twenties, we agreed to pay in such currency. But how can this bill strengthen the public credit? Strengthen the public credit by increasing the public debt? What infatuation has seized these men of capital? Do they hope to enslave a living people, a nation of laboring men who know the value of labor, by a simple, unauthorized, and repealable act of Congress declaring that they shall pay in gold bonds to the amount of $1,602,583,350—more gold than all the civilized nations could furnish—when by their contract they were to pay in paper money at the time of less than half the value of gold? The very attempt to consummate such an act of injustice, this grasping cupidity of the bondholders, this complacent yielding of Congress to a presumptuous demand, will not strengthen, but will shake the public credit. An overwhelming majority of the people of the United States are laboring men, men whose daily labor supplies food and raiment and shelter for their wives and children, who understand the nature and origin of their public debt and are alike jealous of the nation's honor and of their own just rights. Will they consent, sir, in mere subservience to wealth, to impoverish themselves and their posterity for ages to swell the wealth and pamper the profligate luxury that now riots in your great cities? I do not believe it, sir. This gratuitous and naked declaration, if it becomes a law, will not bind them, sir, when aroused to a sense of its injustice, any more than cobwebs would bind the force of a hurricane.

It is said in favor of this bill that its passage will actually and largely increase the value of the bonds; that the quotations of your bonds at the great moneyed centers of Europe and America, where the millionaires who fatten on the labor of mankind congregate, will show a large appreciation of their value. Certainly they will. And why not? If you pass this bill, and the people submit to it, it does actually almost double the value of your bonds, and it does actually and nearly double the public debt; it will increase and perpetuate for ages the tax on the labor of your people, and it will more than double the chances that the laboring man will never be able to drag himself and his wife and children from the merciless grasp of poverty. Is it possible, sir, that monarchies shall be found more considerate of the rights of the people in a contest between labor and capital than a republic? When England found her people oppressed by a great debt—yet a less debt than ours considering the wealth of the two nations and the rates of interest—she reduced the burden one half by reducing the interest one half, while a republican Congress actually, underlike circumstances, increases the debt by proposing to pay in a currency of twice the value of that in which the debt was made and is justly payable.

HO. OF REPS.

Public Credit—Mr. Higby.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

It is said that it would unsettle all values and ruin the country to issue greenbacks enough to pay the five-twenties. No person has ever, so far as I know, proposed to do so. If the currency was kept up to the average of what it was when the debt was contracted—from eight hundred and fifty to nine hundred million dollars—with just economy in the public expenditures this debt would never oppress the labor of the country. It could be substantially liquidated in less than twenty years. The revenues of the year 1865 prove this.

But, sir, if gentlemen are determined to reach specie payments, and are resolved that the greenback currency, the only paper money which any people ever got the benefit of, shall be withdrawn, will you tell me why it would not be just, alike to the bondholders and the people, to scale the public bonds and pay them principal and interest in gold, on the basis of the gold value of the bonds at the time you sold them? The gold value of the bonds was the same as the gold value of the United States notes with which they were purchased. Could the bondholders complain of this? He would get back his money, every dollar of his money, dollar for dollar in value, after having received from year to year nearly fifteen per cent. in gold on the value of his investment. He would have less ground to complain than the English bondholder, whose interest was by an act of Parliament reduced from six and seven per cent. to three per cent., and yet the English debt was made on very nearly the gold basis. Or could the bondholder complain if the right to tax these bonds (a right clearly reserved) for national purposes was justly employed to equalize not only taxation, but to equalize the amount that is being paid in interest in gold with the gold value received by the Government? The just rights of the holders of these securities are readily ascertained. The value on the gold basis received by the Government is not a matter in dispute.

If this debt is to be paid, as is proposed by this bill, a debt of near twenty-six hundred million dollars, principal and interest in gold, the most hopeful patriot must despair of the future of his country. This enormous body of wealth, controlled by a few men ever vigilant to control the affairs of Government, ever seeking to subordinate labor to their own aggrandizement, and ever seeking to make the Government stronger and the popular power weaker as a guarantee of their wealth, would in time and almost imperceptibly enfeeble, if not destroy, the power of the people in national affairs.

In this contest between capital and labor I trust in God the people will be true to themselves and to their posterity, true to the republican institutions of their country, alike just to themselves and just to their creditors, resolved to pay the debt in good faith, dollar for dollar in value, but not one dollar more; that neither the malevolent spirit of party nor the plausible eloquence of the advocates of capital will be able to seduce them into a fatal acquiescence in the policy which is every day more clearly disclosed of placing the whole power of this Government, with all its vast agencies and appliances, on the side of centralized wealth and against the just rights of labor. Wealth as well as power is steadily "stealing from the many to the few." The public debt and the policy of the Government since it was created have already wrought fearful changes in the social condition of the American people. History furnishes no instance where wealth has so rapidly centralized and no instance in modern times where public policy was made to contribute so directly to the personal aggrandizement of a class of citizens to the injury of the great body of the people. Every leading measure seems designed to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. If the people are true to themselves they will demand the reversal of this policy. They will resume the control of their own Government and not leave it to the unbridled will of a few ambitious leaders. "The condition on which God has granted liberty to man is eternal vigilance; which condition if he break, servitude is at once the consequence of his crime and the punishment of his guilt."

REMARKS OF HON. W. HIGBY,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 23, 1869.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin—

Mr. HIGBY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I was highly interested in listening yesterday to the speech made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] upon the bill now under discussion. There was much truth in what he said. His words were solid and full of meaning. I believe the country will thank him for his words of counsel and encouragement. The clouds that have so long enveloped this question are breaking away and the clear sky is visible.

This question has been debated heretofore as though we had no intercourse with other nations, as though paper would serve just as well as gold and silver for our currency.

Were we to cease all financial intercourse with foreign nations the policy so often advocated in this Hall, to pay our debts in depreciated currency, would be a dangerous one to adopt. A debt so vast as our national debt makes it incumbent upon us to keep good and sound the credit of the Government; the citizen should have implicit faith in the integrity and fidelity of the Government. To keep that faith unimpaired it is our duty to aid it to fulfill in spirit and to the letter its pledges. No matter how much wealth the Government may possess the confidence of the people, inspired by its integrity, is worth far more, and renders it stronger and more prosperous without it than hoarded wealth with plighted faith can make it. A debt canceled with a less sum than was pledged to its payment is repudiation to the extent of the difference between the sum promised and the sum paid. That is, such an act in a Government would be repudiation, but in an individual or business firm it would be bankruptcy. Could a business man or firm, possessing sufficient means to pay, who by fraud and chicanery should so cancel his or their debts, continue to have the confidence of the community thus injured? Why should a Government that violated its pledges continue to have the confidence of the people after such violation? The rule will hold good with nations as with individuals.

Mr. Speaker, I do not attribute the present embarrassed condition of our finances to the bad faith of the Government. The present indebtedness the nation could not avoid unless it had yielded up the last best earthly boon to man—free government; neither could it in the emergency avoid a paper currency based upon credit. As yet it has kept good faith when and where able to do so. It has promptly paid the interest upon our great debt whenever it was due, and all its obligations it will perform unless unwise legislation causes it to falter. It is true our Treasury notes, circulating as currency, are at a discount, and will so continue to be until the Government can redeem the promise they carry upon their face, or until we return to specie payment. They are now accrued indebtedness, but will continue at a fair figure and make a very tolerable currency until redemption day arrives if our legislation shall be directed to strengthen credit and the fulfillment of pledges rapidly as possible. But as the bill now under consideration pledges the faith of the United States "to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver," I propose to examine the subject somewhat in detail in the few moments I shall occupy, and show, if possible, the salutary effects the passage of this bill will have upon our credit, and how the Government will be enabled to lessen the burden now weighing so heavily upon it.

"The United States promise to pay." So the words run upon our Treasury notes, and which notes are now the currency of the country. These notes are a part of our national debt, and are so classified in the monthly statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury. We must not forget that while these notes are serving a very good purpose as a currency the United States at some period of time must redeem these notes in coin. They bear upon their face the promise to pay the same as the bonds, and both must ultimately be canceled. Is one class of indebtedness to be paid in a different currency or valuation from another? Is one note taken up by the issuance of another specifying like amount a payment of the first? Does not the second note bear upon its face a promise to pay? So in attempting to pay bonds with notes, is not the payment still an indebtedness against the Government? The intent and purpose to pay or take up our Treasury notes with gold and silver coin is too clear, it seems to me, to admit of doubt, and I believe no one pretends to hold but that they are ultimately to be so paid. Gold and silver coin are the standard of value with all civilized nations. Our nation had no other at the time our Treasury notes were put in circulation and our bonds put on the market; the dollar named in each, unless qualified, is the dollar in coin.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we have in the most solemn manner, as a Government, since our paper currency and our bonds were issued, given our pledge that our national indebtedness shall be paid in the utmost good faith. When the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was under consideration in Congress this question was duly considered, and in clear and unmistakable language became a prominent feature in that amendment. The language is as follows:

"The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned."

A two-thirds vote of this House and of the Senate, and the ratification of the Legislatures of three fourths of the States in the Union, have firmly imbedded this pledge in the Constitution. Is it possible that we can longer hesitate in arriving at a proper conclusion?

Who can doubt? Who will still continue to mar the credit of our Government by declaring that its debts are to be paid in paper, whose value is alone to be found in the fidelity of our Government to pay? The very effort to pay in this manner would at once bring with it dishonor and a discredit that would require many years of the best faith to remove.

Our national debt is over twenty-five hundred million dollars. The interest upon the interest-bearing portion annually is nearly one hundred and thirty million dollars. Whether we lessen the principal sum at present or not our efforts should be to lessen the interest as soon and as much as possible. How is this to be done? Those holding bonds are holding them under contracts which neither the Government nor bondholder can violate. The bondholder can exact no more interest than the bond specifies; neither can the Government fulfill the contract by paying less interest; so that the Government cannot issue new bonds bearing a lower rate of interest and compel the bondholders to surrender the old bonds and take in their stead new ones. Here we have no relief, and, indeed, there is no relief except through the well-established credit of our Government, and in this we will see and value its importance. All five-twenty bonds over five years old the Government has the right to call in, provided Government has the ability to do so. If there is gold in the Treasury to any amount after payment of interest that gold could be used to take up five-twenty bonds. But the experience thus far is that the Treasury furnishes very little more than enough to pay interest, and for the present no relief may be expected from that source. Wealth increases in our country more than six per cent. annually, which necessarily keeps up a high rate of interest. Government must look to a foreign loan. In Europe money is obtained at much lower rates; and if our Government will keep good faith, and can so induce the nations to believe, the interest upon our indebtedness can be much reduced and our financial burdens much lightened.

Mr. Speaker, we have sad evidence of the evil arising from divided opinion how our Government shall redeem its bonds. I need not repeat here what arguments have been used and opinions expressed in this Hall within the last fifteen months. They are known to the country. I shall, though, criticise somewhat the opinion expressed that our bonds, the five-twenties, might legally be paid in Treasury notes. One thing is very clear, our debates have shaken the faith of people at home and abroad to our great detriment. The capital of the country is seeking for more lucrative investments than it finds in our Government bonds, from which cause they have been sold in foreign markets. Over five hundred million dollars of our Government bonds are now in the hands of foreign holders, purchased at great discount, at least thirty cents on the dollar, inflicting a loss upon our country of $150,000,000 at least. British consols bearing three per cent. interest are worth in London over ninety cents—twenty cents on the dollar more than our Government bonds. Our bonds bear six per cent., the interest of each is payable in gold, and the interest on our bonds is paid semi-annually promptly when due; there has been no failure on the part of our Government as yet to pay whatever has accrued of its interest-bearing debt. Our bonds should have sold abroad at much higher rates, and they would have so sold but for the doubt raised by our divided councils how the Government would pay them. If our bondholders could have realized dollar for dollar $150,000,000 would have been saved to the nation to aid in paying the public debt, to help bear the burdens of the Government, and to foster the business of the country.

A new country craves more capital than its ordinary growth supplies. An increase of capital by a foreign loan, to be thrown into the channels of business, would advance individual and national prosperity while aiding to lessen annual public expenses. From a foreign loan obtained at lower rates of interest than our bonds bear two other advantages besides the one just named would be derived—one of the two would be in the reduction of interest to be paid annually, the other in the large amount of home capital set free to enter into the general business of the country. While there is some advantage arising from the fact that a very large portion of the interest accruing semi-annually upon our debt is paid to our own citizens, that advantage is in a measure balanced by the tying up or secluding from business channels of the capital upon which the interest is paid. If foreign loans could be made at three and a half to four per cent. interest, and our five-twenty bonds be redeemed rapidly, as under the law the Government could do so until the $1,600,000,000 now out were redeemed, the Government would save at the least calculation $32,000,000 in gold annually. Should home capitalists desire to take the new loan at reduced rates of interest they should be allowed to do so; but few, though, would be likely to reinvest. Our Government being largely in debt, its credit should be upon a sound basis. It cannot dictate financially. If it has made a hard bargain it must still fulfill its obligations. If we as a nation have not now ready capital for all emergencies our country is full of undeveloped wealth that with marvelous rapidity becomes available. Every decade shows the available wealth more than doubled. Our national credit should be saved from dishonor. Fidelity and honor are above price. No system of logic can lead to the conclusion that a nation destitute of them can prosper or long exist except as a byword and reproach and the scorn of mankind.

Some have advocated in our debates the payment of bonds with Treasury notes. To enable the Government to pay as fast as they become redeemable one of two facts must exist: either the Treasury must have a large surplus from revenue collected, after defraying current expenses of the Government and paying interest, to use for the purpose of redemption, or Congress, if it has the power, must authorize new issues of Treasury notes. Taxation is now a burden to the people, and every revenue bill brought forward amendatory of our revenue laws contains some provision to lessen the burden and still produce revenue enough to defray all ordinary expenditures. The study is to economize as much as possible, and so to graduate taxes as to be least burdensome and still produce sufficient revenue for current expenditures. Revenue from taxation will furnish no adequate means for an immediate redemption of bonds. What encouragement do we find in the proposition—new issues of Treasury notes? Congress claimed the power to issue Treasury notes and declared them lawful money at a time when the nation was in great peril. A rebellion of unparalleled proportions was striving to destroy us as a nation. Every means in the reach of the Government were called into requisition to aid in suppressing that rebellion. The Government was in need of money, and money it must have. Treasury notes were issued under law of Congress as a war measure and an inevitable necessity. By many the right to exercise the power then was denied. While I have no doubt that the necessity of the case gave the power, and that the act was a wise one, I do not believe that Congress would be in any way justified in doing a like thing now that we are at peace within our borders and with all nations.

Gold and silver constitute the true standard of value. They have been the basis of our currency since the foundation of our Government, and in adhering to this standard as a proper measure our Government has but followed in the path trodden by all civilized nations. We have commercial relations with all trading and commercial peoples. We exchange commodities with them; we buy of and sell to them. This interchange has grown to a necessity. Our ordinary needs call for foreign products. By commerce nations are enriched, and arts, sciences, and literature become a greater benefit to mankind. The standard of value must necessarily be the same or the nation that uses any other must be the loser, and the sooner all nations use the same coin at the same value the better. The intrinsic value of gold and silver gives great stability to circulating medium. It is a standard limited in amount. Its intrinsic value being so great, and its quantity so limited, fluctuations are far less frequent and financial prosperity is the rule with very rare exception. Paper currency is convenient and preferable when it will command the amount of specie it promises upon its face. Its value is in the certainty that there is on deposit coin sufficient to satisfy the sum named upon the paper. Coin and paper, then, have the same fixed value, the paper giving no increase to the quantity of currency, but being used as a convenience, a representative of value to facilitate exchanges. Paper currency used without a specie basis, but issued upon the credit of Government and but a representative of credit, is subject to fluctuation in quantity and value.

That nation must be largely in debt whose paper currency is issued solely upon the credit of its Government. The day of payment is future, not present, and no burden is directly felt, as no interest is to be paid. Such currency is easily obtained. Its cheapness encourages extravagance and wild financial schemes, to be followed by bankruptcy and financial ruin. It is well for us that we refuse to allow another issue of Treasury notes. The power is doubtful to do so and the policy a dangerous one. Paper currency has served its purpose in the hour of our nation's trial. Rapidly as possible we should return to the standard we left when the rebellion commenced. Our promises should be brought to par value, and to aid in hastening that condition of things let us unite in support of the measure before us. Let us declare to the nations of the earth, by solemn enactment, that our debt shall be measured and paid by that standard of value known and recognized by them. The sooner we do this the sooner we will undo much mischief already done by unwise debates. We will retrace steps by so doing that have led to financial loss and national discredit. The business of the country will become more prosperous, capital will be set at work with far more certainty of success, and labor will be in greater demand and receive a better reward. I hope this bill will pass by a very large majority—the larger the better—for the good of the country and the speedy restoration of a sound state of the finances of our Government.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment.

REMARKS OF HON. W. HIGBY,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, we are making haste slowly in the right direction. The Committee on Reconstruction have brought forward another amendment to the Constitution, and urged its favorable consideration in clear and forcible language. It declares that—

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

HO. OF REPS.

Suffrage Constitutional Amendment—Mr. Higby.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

The fourteenth article of the Constitution clearly defines who are citizens of the United States:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside."

That is, all persons born in the United States of any and every race and color, whether once slave or always free, and also all persons foreign born, but who have been naturalized under laws of Congress or by treaty stipulations, and who are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, are declared citizens by that article. The amendment proposed does not restrain or enlarge the definition so given of citizenship, but insures certain rights to persons so defined to be citizens, not expressed in any part of the Constitution. They shall not be denied the right to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." While the States are to be deprived of certain powers exercised upon the suffrage question no power is to be given to the United States, for the restraint is to be upon both the General and State governments alike. It takes the power from both to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of the three conditions named. The opponents of this measure cannot with truth assert that power is to be centralized by its success, since power is not given but taken away from both Federal and State governments; but the power to control the elective franchise for other conditions than those named in the proposed amendment is allowed to repose where it now rests. There is little or no danger to be apprehended from the exercise of the powers remaining in the States upon this question, as they will incline to extend rather than restrain the rights and privileges of the citizen. By a comparison between the amendment proposed and the second section of the fourteenth article we find the first a great improvement upon the latter, and that the difference may the more readily be seen I will read the whole of that section:

"Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

Clearly there is an implied authority in the States, from the reading of this section, to control in a greater or less degree the right of suffrage; but that the States might be induced to extend the right to all classes of citizens the right of representation in Congress was confined to the voting class alone. This is very questionable power to leave in the control of the States. If the Constitution of the United States assumes to declare who are citizens it should also define the duties devolving upon them and the rights and privileges to be exercised and enjoyed by them. It will endanger the stability and durability of our Government to allow the States to control the question of citizenship, its duties, rights, and privileges, on any essential point, while the United States provide who are citizens and who may become such by laws of Congress and by treaty stipulations.

The second sentence in the first section of the fourteenth article seems to be full and explicit as to the rights conferred upon those declared to be citizens:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

How comprehensive is this language! It would seem that every right pertaining to citizenship was conferred, and yet the language of the second section implies that a State may deny or abridge the right of the citizen to vote. The amendment proposed will do away with much of the difficulty, confusion, and misconception that have grown out of the apparent conflict between the first and second sections of the fourteenth article, and will secure to the citizen the political rights to which he is entitled beyond legal or constitutional restraint, either State or national. Citizenship will rest where it should, at the foundation of the Government. Upon citizenship free government should be established. The Constitution and laws are but the expressed will of the people; that is, the citizens.

We are slowly approaching a clearer understanding of what are practically the rights of persons. The question has been heretofore involved in mist and doubt. Theories founded in justice have been promulgated and received the approval of all lovers of free government; but their practical application to mankind has been scouted when attempted, and they who have made the attempt have been derided as madmen or revolutionists.

Mr. Speaker, when were nobler and braver words ever uttered than those found in the Declaration of Independence?

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

The public exigency called for outspoken, manly principles, such as addressed themselves to all men as founded in humanity and justice. How grandly does the declaration open:

"When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the Powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation."

Then immediately follows the words previously quoted, namely, "We hold these truths to be self-evident," &c. Sir, do you think that three millions of people struggling to free themselves from the thralldom of a powerful Government, odious as it was unjust in its exactions, a people that in their heavy trial needed the favor and sympathy of mankind, would have declared any but just and true principles? False principles then put forth as the ground of their warfare would have lost to our fathers the cause for which they contended. Justice has in it the elements of strength, and doubly arms the people who war against oppression.

After seven years of privation and sacrifice and a heroism displayed unsurpassed by any people, independence was secured, and our present form of government soon thereafter established. The dangers that threatened had disappeared and peace had returned with its blessings. The favor and sympathy of mankind were not then so essential, nor was foreign alliance needed to aid in perpetuating the integrity of the new nation. The British Government encouraged the growth of African slavery in her American colonies, and when they had acquired their independence the institution of slavery was found so closely interwoven with the whole labor system in many of the States that an immediate change was deemed impracticable. While it was thought that time would work its decay under the Government just established and its removal after a lapse of time be the more easily effected the evil increased in its proportions and took stronger hold. How delusive was this hope! This institution that at the close of the war of the Revolution and for many years thereafter was regarded as a necessary evil, even in the slave States as well as in the free, grew into favor and became a pet institution where it existed, and was there held to be of divine origin. Manual labor was nearly all performed by slaves. Society rested upon and was sustained by the institution in the slave States. Subtle and fascinating in its weakness, it rapidly increased to great power, and became alarming in its proportions, over-exacting in its demands, and ruled with despotic sway. Free institutions were crushed beneath its heavy tread. The more it fed the more ravenous it became. There was no manly independence and no free expression in its presence. Thriving business enterprise had no footing where the institution had sway. The slave was entirely subject to his master, and the master was entirely subject to the institution. Master and slave were both in bonds. The institution made the slave a brute and the master an instrument of cruelty. Reason, justice, and humanity were burned out, and the most hellish passions had rule.

All departments of Government were made subservient to its purposes. Everywhere its baneful influence was felt. Openly and insolently its work of corruption went on. Good men saw the magnitude of the evil, but were unable to retard its progress, for it became the power that resistance could not thwart. Equal rights, free government, the will of the people were themes for theorizing; but the system that held millions in bondage so tainted public morals, benumbed the consciences of men, and perverted their judgment that these themes did not advance beyond theories. The realization of the principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence was more remote after a lapse of eighty-five years than at the time of its promulgation. Through the arts of peace there was no hope of reform. To human ken the dark cloud that had been so long gathering seemed to grow heavier and less penetrable. The wisest and most profound human philosophy was unable to point the way of escape. How could it, when Christian churches were dumb in the presence of this overshadowing power, and in some instances bowed in homage?

Rebellion, the legitimate fruit of the slave power antagonized by free institutions, broke forth with all the horrors of civil war. The death struggle between free government and the slave power came. One must die; both could not survive. The nations stood amazed at the dreadful havoc going on, and wondered what the end would be. Let us leave history to record the scenes of desolation and sorrow caused by the conflict and give all thanks to that Being who aided our patriotic countrymen in the field, in council, and in their labors at home in the common cause to victory over rebellion, and all thanks, too, that in that victory slavery perished.

Mr. Speaker, we can, if we will, now establish true principles of government. Slavery does not exist. We have no excuse for refusing to declare all citizens politically equal, unless our excuse be found in the prejudice fostered within us by the institution of slavery against those who were lately in bondage—a bondage which the bondman could not avoid and for which our countrymen were guilty. The lesson of the rebellion was terrible in its severity. Had the principles of the Declaration of Independence been carried out both in letter and spirit at the outset, the civil strife might have been avoided and our country much further advanced in wealth and power, and free government more firmly established, protecting and blessing more equally all classes of people. "Man proposes, but God disposes." From uncompensated labor man proposed to accumulate wealth. Who can count up the fearful losses the nation suffered during the conflict? Can figures make the estimate? The products of slavery would not compensate for the wealth used and destroyed. But figures would entirely fail when we attempt to estimate the loss from our patriot dead sacrificed to save the nation. We can avoid a repetition of the ordeal by holding sacred the rights inherent in citizenship. Power exercised to withhold rights from any class of citizens, "except for participation in rebellion or other crime," puts in danger the liberties of the people. Power so exercised would be for selfish ends, and not to establish justice.

In the fourteenth article we deny to the common felon and the traitor the right to vote. Why do we deny the right to these classes? In part as a penalty and in part to disarm dangerous men of power. Shall we set over on the side with the felons and traitors any portion of our citizens and deny them this sacred right "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude?" Can we forget the devotion and fidelity of the colored race during the terrible struggle through which our country has just passed? They knew if the rebellion was crushed that slavery would be at an end. To what end have we already declared them to be citizens? What does it profit them to be citizens if they are not to enjoy the rights? They cannot secure to themselves civil rights through the empty name of citizen; their security will be in the protection which the ballot will give them. Will we, now that they have become citizens in name, leave them powerless politically? They would be a powerful and dangerous physical element in time of civil strife or foreign war if opposed to the Government. To attach them to the Government and make them its warm friends and firm supporters they must be allowed to share its privileges or immunities to the full extent, as well as required to share in bearing its burdens. In some way we must so treat the excluded class of citizens that they will become an element of strength at all times. They are in our midst, natives, knowing no other land, and here they will abide for all that we can do, and here they have a right to remain. Let us make them as much interested in the welfare of this Government as we are. This we can do by conferring upon them what we under like circumstances would be justified in demanding. It is not safe, in settling great principles of government, to be led to final action by prejudice. Our conclusions should be based upon unbiased judgment, rising above passion and prejudice. Let us not hesitate to do this wise and just act "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude" of those who are to be reached by this proposed amendment. It is true that much has been said against sharing political rights equally with the colored race; that it would necessitate too intimate social relations between the two races. Can the dividing line between the Anglo-Saxon and the African races be more completely obliterated than it has been in the late slaveholding States under the slave rule? I will not attempt to answer an argument addressed to prejudice and passion, one that history has so incontestably answered. Political rights and social relations have but little to do with each other. I have no fears that placing the ballot in the colored man's hand will be his passport to all ranks and conditions of society. We of the same race, possessing equal political rights, have our social divisions, divisions to which all persons are amenable. Let us dismiss all fallacious arguments, rise above selfish influences, and resolve to do what the times demand. It will be a proud day for free government when citizenship shall be well defined and clearly understood; when in its privileges or immunities it shall not only be beyond the assaults of constitutions and laws, but be itself constitution and law-maker.

REMARKS OF HON. T. L. JONES,
OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 3, 1869,

On the following resolution offered by Mr. COVODE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in relation to the Washington family relics:

Resolved, That the articles known as the effects of George Washington, the Father of his Country, now in the custody of the Department of the Interior, are of right the property of the United States; and any attempt on the part of the present Administration or any Department thereof to deliver the same to the rebel General Robert E. Lee is an insult to the loyal people of the United States; and they ought to be kept as relics in the Patent Office, and ought not to be delivered to any one without the consent of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee to which was referred the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] in regard to the "Mount Vernon relics," I beg leave to dissent from the report and resolution just offered by the committee, and to submit as a minority report the following:

Resolved, That the articles in the Patent Office, which have been identified as the property of Mrs. Mary Custis Lee, and which were taken without authority of the Government from her home at Arlington, as they are of but little value except as heir-loom in her family, bequeathed to her by her father, George Washington Parke Custis, be, at her request, restored to her possession.

I would, Mr. Speaker, be wanting in self-respect and in a proper regard for the high reputation of my Government and country, for its justice and magnanimity, if I did not urge the passage of this resolution. I confess, sir, that my sensibility was shocked in no small degree when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] offered the resolution of inquiry which was referred to this committee, and upon which they have made a report, unanimous indeed, save by my acquiescence. I desire the attention of the House while I make as brief a detail as possible of the circumstances which make up the little history of these Mount Vernon relics. In the spring of 1862, shortly after the beginning of the late unhappy civil war, General Scott, then in command of the Army of the United States, sent a message to Mrs. General Lee that she must leave Arlington, as it would be required for a military station. In the quickest possible time she prepared to do so, and boxing up the smaller articles of her household she delivered the keys to an old female family servant, requesting her to do the best she could under the circumstances, and took her departure, sad indeed, from this splendid ancestral home. Three long years of war and nearly four of peace had intervened, when a few days ago it happened to be brought to public attention that some of these articles were in the Patent Office, in the Interior Department of the Government. How they came there we have no official knowledge except that given by the Secretary of the Interior, who appeared before the committee yesterday and said that all the information he had been able to get upon the subject was that they were brought to the Patent Office by one Caleb Lyons, of Boston.

The private history of the matter, which I have learned from a most reliable source, is that when General McDowell took possession of the Arlington House as a post of the Army the old servant who had care of the place, and to whom Mrs. Lee had given the keys, told him that the soldiers had broken down many of the doors, broken open the boxes, and had stolen many of the goods left in her charge, especially the clothing, which she had been directed by Mrs. Lee to divide among her servants; whereupon the general and his good lady made an examination of the articles still there, which the general ordered to be taken to the Department of the Interior for safe-keeping as the property of Mrs. Lee.

These are all the facts we have been able to learn as to the manner in which these articles were obtained. Some weeks ago Captain James May, of Illinois, formerly of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, an old friend of General and Mrs. Lee, and a man during the war of unquestioned loyalty, being on a visit to this city and hearing that these articles so valued by Mrs. Lee were in the Patent Office, thought he would do an act of kindness to her in suggesting some mode by which they might with propriety be restored to her.

He mentioned the subject to several distinguished gentlemen of this city, among them General Dent, the father-in-law of the President-elect, who, with others, approved the laudable purpose of Captain May. President Johnson was also consulted, but declined to give any opinion or make any suggestion until the matter was before him in some authentic form. Captain May finally addressed the following note to Mrs. Lee:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1869.

MY VALUED FRIEND: I find in the Patent Office a remnant of the articles relative to Washington, and that came from Mount Vernon. Those politically-sanctioned and universally-appreciated relics were placed by the will of your revered father in your custody during the term of your life.

Several prominent gentlemen here express the opinion that a written request from you to President Johnson will induce his executive interference in the premises and restore you to your legitimate rights as custodian of those relics. Therefore I respectfully suggest the propriety of your making such request as soon as convenient.

As ever, your sincere friend,

JAMES MAY.

Mrs. General LEE.

Upon the reception of this note Mrs. Lee addressed the President, as follows:

LEXINGTON, VIRGINIA.

February 10, 1869.

MR. PRESIDENT: Encouraged by your kind attention to a former application, and prompted by my friend, Captain May, I now venture to request that you will direct all the articles taken from Arlington and deposited in the Patent Office to be restored. They are relics from Mount Vernon bequeathed to me by my father, and consequently of great value and interest to his family.

Very respectfully,
His Excellency ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

This letter was directed under cover to Captain May, and by him placed in the hands of Secretary Browning, who said in his testimony before the committee he delivered it to the President in full Cabinet meeting, and upon its being read, every member of the Cabinet agreed that the request of Mrs. Lee should be complied with, and it was ordered that she be informed accordingly.

Mrs. Lee, having been informed of the decision of the President and his Cabinet, and being requested to appoint some one to identify, receive, and receipt for the articles, deputed an old friend, a lady of Georgetown, to accomplish the purpose. Before the transfer of the articles was effected the papers of this city announced what was being done, when the resolution of inquiry was offered in this House, and all negotiation for the articles ceased. It may be interesting to the House and the country to know what these articles are. They are beggarly remnants, broken and shattered, and in real value, as the Secretary said, are not worth what it would cost to transport them to Lexington. The list is as follows:

"One pair of candelabra, a lot of gilded ornaments, 42 plates, 16 dishes, 1 punch-bowl, 3 finger-bowls, 2 vases, 1 looking-glass, 1 table, 1 money-chest, 1 knife-case, 1 case for silverware, 1 box drawers, 1 wash-stand, 1 dressing-bureau, 1 window-curtain, 4 teat-poles and pins, 1 bedspread, 1 blanket, 1 set bed-curtains, 1 pair short breeches and vest."

It is true that these articles, or some of them, were once the effects of "George Washington, the Father of his Country," but it is not true, as intimated by the committee, "that any attempt was made by the present Administration or any department thereof to deliver the same to the rebel General Robert E. Lee." That distinguished and noble gentleman and hero has had nothing whatever to do with this transaction, but in regard to it has maintained the delicacy and dignity which have characterized him through life, and which now especially challenge the admiration of every unprejudiced and manly heart.

These articles were the property of Mrs. Lee, and hers only, for her natural life, to be transmitted as heir-looms to her latest posterity, and she only applied for them at the suggestion of others, and then with that true modesty which adorns her sex, of which indeed she is one of the brightest ornaments. Mrs. Lee is the daughter and only child of George Washington Parke Custis, who was the grandson of Mrs. Martha Custis, afterward Martha Washington, wife of the "Father of his Country." How she became possessed of Arlington House and estate will be seen by the following extracts from her father's will:

"I give and bequeath to my dearly beloved daughter and only child, Mary Ann Randolph Lee, my Arlington House estate, in the county of Alexandria and State of Virginia, containing eleven hundred acres, more or less, and my mill on Four Mile run, in the county of Alexandria, and the lands of mine adjacent to said mill in the counties of Alexandria and Fairfax, in the State of Virginia, the use and benefit of all just mentioned during the term of her natural life, together with my horses and carriages, furniture, pictures, and plate during the term of her natural life."

And in another section he says:

"My daughter, Mary A. R. Lee, has the privilege by this will of dividing my family plate among my grandchildren, but the Mount Vernon plate altogether, and every article I possess relating to Washington and that came from Mount Vernon, is to remain with my daughter at Arlington House during said daughter's life, and at her death to go to my eldest grandson, George Washington Custis Lee, and to descend from him entire and unchanged to my latest posterity."

It is thus seen that these articles were never the property of General Lee, but of his wife, and to be the property of her posterity forever. Arlington itself, that palatial home, was hers only, and for her natural life, and could not justly have been confiscated on account of the acts of her husband. She followed his footsteps, indeed, it may be from inclination, as any true woman would have done; but that she was ordered by the Federal commander to leave her beloved home is nevertheless true. Where could she go but to him who in weal or woe possessed her heart, and on whom she must lean for counsel and support? We may well imagine how in sadness and tears she took her way from this blessed abode, this paradise, her "native soil, these happy walks and shades, fit haunt of gods."

The Government of the United States now has possession of this magnificent domain, and has devoted it to a sacred purpose, but how or by what title obtained? It may surprise all just and honorable minds to know that it was obtained simply by tax title; the property put up and sold for taxes, the friends of General and Mrs. Lee, who were anxious to do so, not being allowed to buy it, but the Government authorities arbitrarily claiming to be the rightful purchasers. We may exist in national glory, and in some instances trace our policy to magnanimous examples among the States of Christendom, but we can only look to heathen nations for deeds like this; and even then we may be put to shame by comparison. Mrs. Lee has thus been deprived of her home, the gift of her father and the descending property of her children to the latest generation. We may not stop to argue that, why or wherefore. A day of reckoning may come as to that; but shall we now withhold from her these mutilated relics of her ancestors, transmitted as sacred trusts to her for the benefit of those to come after her? Many of these articles were the property of Mrs. Washington; some of them, as the china set, presented to her by General La Fayette and given by her to her grandson, who bequeathed them to his daughter. By what right or propriety can we retain them? I am reluctant to believe, Mr. Speaker, that partisan frenzy and hate will go so far even in this Fortieth Congress, certainly not distinguished for its justice and magnanimity.

There is a spirit sometimes among men which refines, dignifies, and exalts them almost to an equality with angels, and there is another which degrades them and would drag angels down, which would pursue their conquered enemies with relentless fury, desecrate their graves, penetrate the tomb, and wreak their insatiate vengeance upon the moldering bones of the dead. I trust we have none of this latter spirit, but that we have learned to be magnanimous from our very triumphs and exaltation. Success should teach us nobility and virtue. How do we stand before the world? The great civil war has ended; our foes were our brothers; it was a family quarrel and warfare; they are vanquished; their camp-fires have gone out; their bugle blasts have died upon the air; their last shouts of battle have ascended to the skies; thousands have gone to a soldier's grave; their wives and mothers and sisters darken the land with weeds of mourning; and they who have survived have borne for nearly four long years the keen anguish of defeat, and with heroic fortitude are now pleading for equal immunities, obligations, and burdens under the old Government of our common fathers.

"Glimpse of the unforgotten brave!
Whose land from plain to mountain cave
Was Freedom's home or Glory's grave!
Shrine of the mighty! can it be
That this is all remains of thee?"

Our own losses and griefs have also been great indeed, but from this mighty conflict we have emerged with a conscious strength and power of which we were ignorant before; the ordeal has been one of blood and tears and death, but it is passed, and we are in part united again, and are moving on indissolubly, I hope, to greater prosperity and renown.

Can we not afford to be as magnanimous as we have been victorious? What so noble in a victorious chief as generosity and kindness to his fallen foe? Shall we not learn lessons from history? When Alexander the Great met and defeated in the battle of Arbela the splendid Persian monarch Darius, and took prisoners his wife and mother and daughters, with all their gold and silver, gorgeous furniture, and spacious apartments, on seeing his chariot they broke out in lamentations for fear he would destroy them and all they had possessed; but he sent Leonatus to assure them that they had nothing to fear from Alexander, for his dispute with Darius was only for empire, and that they should find themselves protected and provided for in the same manner as when Darius was in his greatest prosperity. When Julius Cæsar met his rival Pompey on the plains of Pharsalia and conquered him, gaining the most complete victory of his life, the chief glory of the conquest was the clemency of the conqueror. Many of the vanquished were his own countrymen. He granted them amnesty and took them into his own army, and he gave liberty to the whole nation of Thessaly for the sake of the victory he had obtained that day. The laurels of the hero and statesman were thus blended on his brow.

I need not call to mind other illustrious examples. Shall we not profit by them in this enlightened age? I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] who offered this resolution of inquiry, and who was a conspicuous actor in this unhappy war, if it is not time that the ferocity of the soldier should be lost in the sagacity of the statesman? Much remains to conquer still. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war." Generous actions shed the brightest luster on the shield of glory. The tear that moistens the hero's eye or glistens on his cheek is brighter than the diamond in his coronet; and when he comes to the final struggle of life, when he himself surrenders, as he must, the remembrance of one generous act to the unfortunate, will be worth more to him than all the splendors of the sword; it will be the civic crown of the Roman, and one of his surest passports to immortal bliss.

Can any gallant soldier of the Union deny this meed of justice and courtesy to the wife of the great captain of the rebellion? Can he refuse her her own? Can he withhold from her the broken "plate," the ruined "vase," the tattered "bedspread and blanket" of her great grandmother? I will not believe it. What means the amnesty provided in the amendment to your Constitution held out to those who have borne arms against the Union when you deny simple justice and civility to pure, unoffending, and dependent woman? Would you make the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope? Would you trample the flowers of forgiveness in the dust, and "waste their sweetness on the desert air?" Imitate the example of your illustrious chief, who has just made his way to that proud seat of power he is about to assume with the sublime insignia of peace emblazoned on his banner, now, indeed, enshrined in the hearts of his followers and become their cherished and boasted motto. "Let us have peace!" Act up to that conquering ensign, mete it out in all things, little and great, and you will consummate the end so devoutly wished. If General Grant at the fall of Vicksburg could allow his prisoners to retire with the arms he had subdued, and if he could, with more majestic courage and dignity of soul, on the final field of Appomattox return his surrendered sword to the grand leader of the rebellious hosts himself, can we not find it in our hearts to restore to the unoffending wife of his bosom these poor tokens of peace, the treasured relics of her ancestors? Oh, how glorious to be

"In war renowned, in peace sublime."

It will be holding up the hands and confirming the covenant of your illustrious chief to be inaugurated to-morrow. It will be aiding in his own efforts, as I trust they are, to cluster about his head the martial splendors of Marlborough with the milder glories of the good Prince of Orange. It will be promoting him to the side of Washington himself. This will cost us nothing, and, in one sense, will be the smallest contribution to peace, but it will have a mighty significance.

"Little drops of water, little grains of sand,
Make the mighty ocean and the boundless land;
Little deeds of kindness, little works of love,
Make this world an Eden like to heaven above."

This simple act of justice and gallantry will touch every southern heart, and do more in restoring loyalty than an army with banners. There is not a hero, mother, wife, or child in all that sunny land whose bosom will not swell with emotions of respect for their conquerors and with returning devotion to the Union they could not destroy. It will be sending dew-drops to the parched and withered fields, and will shed a gentle fragrance upon their bleeding hearts; it will be scattering sprigs of the olive branch in all their dwellings, cheering them in their desolation and inspiring them anew in their struggles and prayers for their former and better state.

"With peace and soft rapture shall teach life to glow,
And light up a smile in the aspect of woe."

Let us in this, I beseech you, consult our higher nature; let us be guided by examples of the best and noblest of our race, and not be unmindful of the sublime admonitions of our Divine Master. Let one of the last acts of this expiring Congress be remembered as one of justice and clemency. Let us return these relics where they properly belong. I doubt not, Mr. Speaker, if we could this night summon from the "mansions of rest" the blessed spirit of our Washington he would say to us, Be magnanimous and just, my country-

REMARKS OF HON. C. E. PHELPS,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin—

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, as the vote which I intend to give for the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] from the Committee of Ways and Means will probably place me in a position of antagonism with a majority of those with whom I have been politically associated on this floor I feel it incumbent upon me to state briefly the reasons which have governed my judgment upon this question.

The first section of this bill is on its face declaratory, proposes no new legislation, but professes simply to remove doubts raised by conflicting interpretations of existing laws as to the purpose of the Government in its future dealings with its creditors.

The second section, which legalizes coin contracts, has been virtually superseded by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, promulgated since the bill was reported, has therefore been deprived of significance, and may be passed without comment.

The only serious controversy upon this bill arises from the provision in its first section pledging the faith of the United States—

To the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money, or other currency than gold and silver.

This proposition is the direct converse of that contained in the national Democratic platform adopted by the New York convention in July, 1868, in the following terms:

"Where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they are issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States."

I confess that I had no sooner read the proceedings of the New York convention adopting this proposition than I felt that a false if not fatal step had been taken in thus committing the whole organization of the Democratic party to what I had always considered a heresy, as unsound in principle and in public morals as in constitutional law and public policy, and a treacherous innovation upon the hard money record and traditions of the Democratic party during its entire history. From the enactment of the first of the series of acts of Congress authorizing the emission of greenbacks I had shared in the doubts that were entertained by jurists of both political parties as to the constitutional power of Congress to force this currency upon the people as a legal tender. The Constitution of the United States in express terms prohibited the States from exercising such a power:

"No State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."—Article I, section 10.

The power thus positively inhibited to the States is not to be found among the grants of power to Congress, which is only authorized "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures." (Art. I, sec. 8.) The only constitutional currency, therefore, is "coined money." This is the plain language and obvious import of the document, so held by statesmen of all parties and supported by the uniform practice of the Government, which never until the second year of the late rebellion undertook to declare anything else than coin of gold and silver a legal tender. The attempt to find some constitutional sanction for the financial legislation of 1862 and subsequent years among the incidental powers implied from the express grants "to regulate commerce," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a Navy," and to make all the laws "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the granted powers, including, of course, "the common defense and general welfare," was a lame afterthought, an idea unsupported by sound argument, contradicted by concurrent testimony and practice, and exploded by a reference to the proceedings and debates of the Convention. That record discloses the fact that in the proposed draft of the Constitution, as it was reported from the Committee on Revision, was a provision that—

"Congress should have power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to emit bills of credit."

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS moved to strike out "and emit bills on the credit of the United States."

Mr. MADISON. Will it not be sufficient to prohibit the making them a tender?

Mr. ELLSWORTH thought this a favorable moment to shut and bar the door against paper money. The mischiefs of the various experiments which had been made were now fresh in the public mind and had excited the disgust of all the respectable part of America. By withholding the power from the new Government more friends of influence would be gained to it than by almost anything else.

Mr. LANGDON had rather reject the whole plan than retain the three words "and emit bills."

The vote being taken, the words were stricken from the Constitution by nine States against two.

That the framers of the Constitution deliberately intended to shut the door in the face of any such implication warranting the issue of legal-tender notes, as has been of late years attempted to be extorted from various grants in that instrument, is conclusively proved by Mr. Madison in the note which he appends to the debate from which the above extracts are taken:

"The vote in the affirmative by Virginia, on the motion to strike out the words 'emit bills of credit,' was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, as far as they could be safe and proper, and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender either for public or private debts."

The power to contract an indebtedness involving as an inseparable incident the right to issue to the creditor certificates of that indebtedness, the power to emit bills of credit, was left to be implied from the express grant (art. 1, sec. 7) "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." And the only reason for refusing to embody that conceded incidental power in the form of an express grant was, as evidenced by the uncontradicted authority of Madison himself, in his own emphatic language, "to cut off the pretext for making the bills a tender either for public or private debts."

No argument can be made more complete or conclusive than the argument to prove the unconstitutionality of so much of the act of February 25, 1862, and of subsequent enactments, as authorizes the issue of legal-tender notes. So overwhelming, in fact, was the force of this argument felt to be by the defenders of this legislation at the time that many of them were compelled to take refuge behind the convenient pretext of "necessity," and advocate the emission as a temporary expedient required by the exigencies of a war to "preserve the life of the nation."

But the event has proved for the warning and instruction of posterity that to violate the Constitution in order to preserve it is as mistaken in policy as it is wicked in principle.

The necessity, if it existed at all, was simply the necessity of the famished burglar who robs to keep himself and his family from starvation. His "temporary expedient" may carry him over the emergency of the day, but it lays the foundation for a train of consequences which will in the future remind him to his sorrow of the many inconveniences incident to a willful violation of law.

If at the commencement of the war the honest, straightforward, business-like policy had been adopted by the Government of selling its obligations for their market value instead of resorting, in the first instance, to the banks, and when they were crippled endeavoring to force an unconstitutional, irredeemable paper currency upon the people, no such "necessity" as that pleaded in defense of the latter could possibly have existed. The "obligation of contracts" would not then have been "impaired" to the extent of virtual confiscation of one third the total indebtedness of the country. Whole classes of our citizens would not then have been demoralized by this signal example of bad faith and violation of law at headquarters, and we would have escaped at least so much of that Pandora's box of misfortunes let loose upon the country as is incident to a degraded currency, inflated prices, and the speculation and speculation, profligacy, extravagance, corruption, and fraud which are their inevitable consequences.

Viewing this whole controversy about the payment of the five-twenty bonds from the constitutional stand-point indicated, I could not of course accept any construction of the acts of Congress authorizing the issue of those obligations which would involve the emission of a single dollar of legal-tender notes beyond the limit already reached. Further than this, if there was in reality any ambiguity in the language of those acts raising a doubt as to whether it was the intention of the Legislature to provide for the ultimate payment of those obligations in coin or in legal-tender notes within the amount of those notes limited by law, ($400,000,000,) then my conviction clearly was that the interpretation of those statutes should be made subject to the presumption that the Congress of the United States could not have intended, where they did not in express terms declare, payment in an unconstitutional currency, but must have intended payment in the constitutional currency of gold and silver coin.

It is this proposition, namely, the presumption in favor of coin payments, the act being silent, that I vote for in voting for the bill of the committee; and it is the converse proposition, namely, the presumption in favor of greenback payments, the act being silent, that I emphatically dissented from in the New York platform, as well as from the distinction taken in that platform between "coin" and the "lawful money of the United States." I could never see, even admitting greenbacks to be "lawful money," how gold eagles and silver dollars of the United States, coined under its laws and stamped with its impress, had become unlawful money. And I should almost as soon have expected from a Democratic convention a declaration in favor of the military commission as a substitute for the constitutional trial by jury for civilians, because that institution was made a "legal tender" by the Government during the saturnalia of the civil war, as such an attempt to ignore the constitutional hard money of peace in favor of the bastard progeny of a crazy war measure.

Notwithstanding my want of orthodoxy upon this feature of the Democratic platform I still supported the candidates of that party at the presidential election to the best of my ability as a citizen, although declining to become a candidate for reelection to Congress. Apart from my settled and uncompromising opposition to the Radical theory and practice of reconstruction, which I regarded as, after all, the paramount issue of the canvass, I could find no such unequivocal declaration of the financial policy of that party in its Chicago platform as con-

HO. OF REPS.

Public Credit—Mr. Phelps.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

trusted it very favorably with that just commented on. In fact, the phraseology of both these platforms was so constructed as not to prevent ingenious partisans, whether of the gold or greenback complexion, from standing harmoniously together upon either of them. Both still left open for private interpretation the special question of the true construction of the act of February 25, 1862, and the subsequent fifty-two acts as to whether those acts did or did not contract for payment in coin of the obligations issued under them. The greenback Republican from Ohio or Indiana who believed with Senators SHERMAN and MORTON that both the "letter" and "spirit" of those laws were satisfied by a legal-tender payment was sound enough on the Chicago platform to insist upon "the payment of the public indebtedness," not in coin, but "in the uttermost good faith."

Coming now directly to the question of construction of the original act creating legal tenders, passed February 25, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States:" it provides in its first section for the issue on the credit of the United States of $150,000,000 of United States notes not bearing interest, payable to bearer at the Treasury of the United States, $50,000,000 of which to be in lieu of certain demand notes previously issued, and the whole amount of said notes at no time to exceed the sum of $150,000,000, limited to $400,000,000 by act of June 30, 1864:

"And such notes herein authorized shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

The doubts that have been raised as to the ultimate purpose of the Government, in the payment of the five-twenty bonds authorized to be issued by the second section of the act, and which it is the avowed object of the pending bill to settle, spring from conflicting interpretations of the language just cited from the first section. The advocates of paper money, in and out of Congress, are understood as claiming that this language is express and positive in warranting the payment in legal-tender notes of all debts, public and private, including the bonds issued under the act; and that this language alone embodies the terms of the entire contract between the Government and its creditors.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to admit that if this construction be the true construction of the act of 1862, and the only construction, then the bill now under consideration, if passed, will be a mere brutum fulmen. It will simply be a declaratory statute of what the law was before its passage in the opinion of the present Congress. As such it will have no binding authority upon the judicial department of the Government, to which exclusively belongs the power to construe. It is the alphabet of our system of government, whose powers are distributed and defined, that the power that makes is not the power to construe the law. If the contract between the Government and its creditors be in reality a contract to pay at maturity, either optionally at five years or absolutely at twenty, the face of its obligations in its own due bills, then we have no right to make a present to those creditors of the difference between those due-bills and the solid specie.

But if, as I have always believed, the contract between the Government and its creditors, as apparent upon a true construction of the entire act, is a contract to pay its obligations at maturity in real money, in that constitutional currency of gold and silver coin which is "lawful money" of the highest grade, then it is time that the doubts which have been thrown over the intention of the Government to perform its contracts in honest simplicity, doubts which have notoriously done great injury to the public credit, should be removed by an emphatic legislative declaration.

The process of reasoning which has brought my mind to this conclusion may be very briefly stated. I shall exclude all presumptions founded upon official or unofficial declarations outside the positive terms of the written law. Whatever may have been the understanding at the time, either from contemporaneous debate in Congress, from the language or conduct of financial functionaries, or from authorized advertisements of the agents of the Government while soliciting for the loan, I am willing to concede, for the purposes of this argument, that both the parties to the contract, the United States on the one side and the public creditors on the other, must be held to the expressed terms of the written contract as the only measure of their rights and liabilities.

I begin with a proposition which is not disputed, that there is nothing in the law which prohibits payment in coin. It is admitted that the law leaves coin at least upon an equal footing with paper. I have not yet heard it claimed that gold and silver have been outlawed by act of Congress. It has never been denied, to my knowledge, that a citizen debtor might still, if he preferred, even under the act of 1862, pay his private debts within the country in coin, and that his creditor would still be obliged to accept it as a legal tender, although, I must confess, that no instance of the kind in practice has occurred in my experience. Nor has it been denied that it is still perfectly competent for the United States to pay its obligations in like currency. Here, then, we have included in the contract two distinct kinds of lawful money, two forms of currency, two separate and specific legal tenders, of which the creditor is bound to take notice, and interwoven with them in the same phraseology, two separate and distinct classes of indebtedness, the one public, the other private, "lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States," except duties and interest.

Now, if this language and its immediate context in the first section embraced the whole contract, there might be valid reason to doubt the claim of the public creditor to demand payment in one of these specific kinds of legal tender rather than the other, its equivalent and alternative. Two kinds of currency being available for the purposes of this payment, the one unquestionably lawful money by the supreme and unchanged law, the other attempted to be made lawful by an unconstitutional enactment, the case would then arise for the application of the principle before adverted to, and a forced presumption would have to be made that the Legislature intended a constitutional payment in the currency of the Constitution. Fortunately, however, the contract is not all embraced in the language of the first section, and is not dependent upon the final decision of the constitutional question.

Further on, in the fifth section of the same act, follows a very significant and a very important provision for the purchase or payment of the entire debt of the United States by a specific appropriation, not of ambiguous "lawful money," but of coin eo nomine. The exact mode of the appropriation is indicated in the reservation of a coin sinking fund. This section, in terms, enacts that the coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund to be applied—

"First, To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

"Second, To the purchase or payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall, in like manner, be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

"Third, The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States."

For the purpose for which this section is now cited, it is perfectly immaterial whether its provisions have been regarded or disregarded in practice. In point of fact, they have been up to this date utterly ignored, whether from a difference of opinion between the successive Secretaries of the Treasury on the one hand and Congress on the other, as to the policy of a sinking fund on general principles, or because the indebtedness of the Government continued rapidly augmenting for several years after the act was passed, and its entire coin resources were exhausted in efforts to keep pace with growing liabilities. I will state in this connection that immediately after learning the action that had been taken by the New York Democratic convention upon the bond question, on the 11th of July last, I offered in the House the following:

"Resolutions to carry into effect the fifth section of the act of 1862, February 25, relative to a sinking fund.

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby instructed to report for the action of the House a bill to carry into immediate effect the fifth section of the act of 1862, February 25, providing that the coin received for duties on imports shall, after paying interest on bonds and notes, be applied to the purchase or payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States within each fiscal year, to be set apart, with the accruing interest, as a sinking fund.

"Resolved, That the said committee are also instructed to provide in said bill for the establishment of a board of commissioners of the sinking fund, to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Vice President of the United States, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be, without additional compensation, to make from time to time such lawful rules and regulations as may be necessary for the management of said sinking fund.

"Resolved, That the said committee are further instructed to provide in said bill that all money which may accrue from taxes that may be imposed upon the bonds or coupons of the public debt shall be from time to time appropriated to the increment of the sinking fund, and that all special funds held under the several Departments of the Government, and not covered into the Treasury of the United States, be forthwith transferred and charged to the commissioners of the sinking fund, for the purposes thereof."

(Mis. Doc. No. 164, Fortieth Congress, second session.)
No action has to this day been taken by the Committee of Ways and Means in the direction indicated by these resolutions, which I offered with a view to securing such an expression of a determination on the part of the Government to fulfill its forgotten pledges as would effectually silence such damaging doubts as those to which the action of the New York convention first gave formal and organized utterance. Had the whole contract made by the Government in solemn statute been literally performed upon its part, by simple compliance with the provisions requiring the special reservation of a coin sinking fund for the purchase or payment of the public debt, we would not be here to-day considering how to settle doubts by a declaratory enactment.

What, then, is the attitude of the Government to-day as respects its creditors, fixed by its own legislation?

It has gone into the markets of the world with one hand open to borrow money and holding in the other a statute pledging its coin receipts for the payment of both interest and principal. Under this statute the five-twenty bonds were issued, to be paid absolutely in twenty years, optionally in five, and a tempting intimation thrown in of a possibility of payment by "purchase" even before the five years' option. This is what the creditors understood; this is what they had a right to understand. If the Government has failed to reserve that coin sinking fund its creditors have still the right to insist that the Government shall not at least forget that it was promised. They have the right to insist upon a fair and legitimate construction of the whole contract in all its parts, and are not now to have the legal-tender clause dismembered from its context and thrown separately into their faces while the coin-payment clause is first practically repudiated and then contemptuously suppressed.

It matters not whether the theory of a sinking fund be sound or unsound, whether its establishment heretofore has been practicable or not, whether its failure hitherto be justifiable or the reverse, the coin payment was the real end in view, the coin payment was the essence of the promise. If the machinery devised has failed it has been through no fault of the creditor. No act of omission or of commission on his part has defeated the act of Congress. All that can be said is that for some reason not explained the Government has, without the consent of its creditors, without their fault, and without even an apology, utterly ignored and repudiated an important particular of its contract in the matter of this sinking fund. And now the point is, shall the Government take advantage of its own default by affecting ignorance of the very object for which the sinking fund was devised? Shall it pretend not to see that it ever promised payment of interest and principal in coin, because it has not seen fit to resort to the particular method which it once proposed of making that promise available?

This natural interpretation of the statute, upon plain principles of law requiring that the intention of the Legislature should be gathered from the four corners of the enactment, and that the meaning of contracting parties should be learned by giving full effect to the language of the contract in all its parts, and not by suppressing its terms in any particular, is sustained also by plain maxims of sound common sense and common honesty.

The idea of a respectable Government which has some reputation to sustain seriously proposing to its creditors, by specialty, to give up their obligations drawing interest, and take in settlement its "I. O. U.," and undertaking to call that transaction a payment, has not even the merit of originality to recommend it. It is a tame imitation of the brilliant financial expedient of Mr. Micawber. The boy who got in a basket and tried perseveringly to lift himself up by the handles presented but a faint illustration of the problem in financial dynamics undertaken to be solved by the payment of a debt in due bills.

There seems to be in the human mind, in all ages, an irrepressible hankering after the impossible, well satirized by Dean Swift in his description of the philosophers observed by Gulliver in his travels engaged in extracting sunbeams from cucumbers. Men do not now spend their lives and fortunes in quest of the universal solvent to turn all metals into gold. The search after the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life has been abandoned; there are but few now-a-days who still prosecute the discovery of perpetual motion; but it seems as if the entire class of minds in this generation whose idiosyncrasies would otherwise have led them into these fanciful researches now revel amid the mysteries and miracles of finance. We hear one sect of these philosophers, as yet confined to but one convert, and he the founder of the system, gravely proposing to banish permanently from circulation the constitutional currency of gold and silver, known to our fathers, from father Abraham down, as a vestige of barbaric ages and despotic Governments.

Such I understand to be the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who proposes to shingle the country with shingle-plasters, fundable into unpayable bonds, and these again dissolvable into irredeemable shingle-plasters. By this discovery a currency both elastic and convertible is secured to a grateful people and their posterity, and a reciprocal action established between the national debt and the circulating medium, the debt furnishing the currency and the currency paying the debt, which is to go on ad infinitum, thus realizing perpetual motion in finance if not in physics.

Another sage idea, much more widely ventilated and the antipodes of that just mentioned, is that Congress should legislate the country into resumption by only naming the happy day. Between these extremes a countless multitude of financial schemes have been propounded for the funding of the debt, the reduction of the rate of interest, the resumption of specie payments, and the speedy return of prosperity to the country and relief to the Government, of nearly all of which schemes it is enough to say that those which are honest are impracticable, and those which are practicable are dishonest.

It is time that we stopped entertaining each other with these romantic delusions and settled down upon the hard, dry fact, that for nations as well as for individuals there is no new way to pay old debts. A succession of political follies, blunders, and crimes, from which no party and no section have been wholly free of responsibility, culminating in war, has entailed a mortgage of over $2,500,000,000 upon the property and labor of the entire population of the Republic. There is but one way of discharging this indebtedness, and that is by working it out. Those who talk of repudiation forget that while "private credit is wealth, public honor is security;" and that so long as money is the sinews of war, and credit is the fountain of money, a Government dishonored in the markets of the world and distrusted by its own citizens must expect nothing but humiliation, insult, and aggression.
